78
14

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

STATE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA LIBRARY.
Class Book
v. 105
Acc. 291930

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

UNIVERSITY OF IOWA
3 1858 029 197 674

DATE DUE

APR 10 2012

DEMCO, INC. 38-2931

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The American Magazine

25 Cents; $2.50 a Year

110
42-2

STATE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA LIBRARY

VOLUME CV

January, 1928, through June, 1928

THE CROWELL PUBLISHING COMPANY
250 Park Avenue
NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Copyright, 1928, by
The Crowell Publishing Company
All Rights Reserved

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE
January, 1928
More Than 2,200,000 Circulation

051
A5
v.105
13 Dec '28 dp

I Am Proud That I Was An Orphan!

By William S. Dutton

PITY the poor orphan? No, envy him!

I am an orphan boy, reared in an orphans' asylum, and I am proud that I was. Almost am I tempted to say—since what was had to be—that I am glad that I was. There are advantages in being an orphan, just as there are advantages in having parents. The lot of the orphan is not nearly so hard as folks like to think. It is the boy with parents who often has the harder row to hoe.

I certainly am glad that an orphans' asylum undertook my upbringing and that I was not "farmed out" to sympathetic relatives. That condition would have involved all the disadvantages of having parents, with few or none of the advantages. As it was, in that alma mater of mine I was no worse off than is any rich man's son who is sent away to a private school for his education. I've a notion that I was better off than many a rich man's son—and I know I was better off than untold thousands of poor boys with parents.

Have no doubt, however; had the choice been mine, which it was not, my parents would have lived. No boy in the world could have had finer parents than mine, and no boy willingly could have lost them. What I lost by their going, I don't know, except vaguely. My knowledge, necessarily, is limited to what I gained. All I know surely, after twenty-seven parentless years, is that He who takes is not slow to recompense. I know only that I gained, and that my brother gained, while somewhere back in those years we became unconscious of loss.

There were just the two of us—my brother, who is the younger, and myself. Our father and mother died within a year, before I was eight years old. He was a veteran of the Civil War, a painter by trade who should have been an artist. She had been a most beautiful woman, sought after and admired. The hardest thing that life exacted of our mother was to die in the flower of her womanhood and leave us boys behind. There were times, I think, when the whole town joined with her in her fervent prayer to be permitted to live.

There were debts, the inevitable aftermath of months of illness. The home our father had built was sold. I remember the furniture piled on the sidewalk, the crowd, the cries of the auctioneer. Before that, I remember my heartbreak at my mother's death, the aching sense of being utterly alone; yet before that, the funeral of my father, a gorgeous pageant of marching uniformed men, of drums that did not beat as drums always had, of soldiers firing sternly over a flag-draped grave, and of my brother and I eagerly picking up the cartridges ejected hot from their guns.

A glorious funeral it was, that funeral of my father. In life he had often gone away to decorate churches and lodge rooms in distant cities. This time, my mother assured us, Father was going to the Wonder City of Heaven! We could not understand why those crowds did not cheer as we passed, why the drums did not boom as they did on the Fourth of July. Perhaps, was my thought, these people didn't know of the happiness there is in Heaven.

AT MY mother's going there was a pang, for I was older and had learned selfishness. I had learned to fly to her for protection and to know the warmth of her love; these things were being taken away and I cried out. But to this day I know only pride in the going of my father and in the honor paid him by our town. I can say, as few mortals can, "I've felt the joy of a soul called by its Maker! I've exulted in the passing of a loved one of mine to immortality!"

And before that?

Before that, the death of my father, I have memories perfect and unblemished, such as only an orphan can have. In manhood, with much of the world going wrong, I can look back upon

How This Article Came to Be Written

"HOW did you manage to get such a good start in life?" the Editor asked William S. Dutton.

"Well, I've been an orphan since I was seven years old," he replied, "and we orphans have a certain advantage over the rest of you."

An amazing remark, and out of it grew the remarkable article that begins on this page! For years, Mr. Dutton has been writing about other people—scientists, builders, business men, engineers, farmers, adventurers, laborers, men and women in all walks of life. You have enjoyed his stories of others; now you will be fascinated by his own story! Did you know that orphans almost look down on boys who have parents to decide things for them, to protect them? Did you know that orphans resent being considered pitiful little creatures to be wept and sentimentalized over and treated as objects calling for charity? In this article Mr. Dutton gives you the inside story of an orphan's look at life. "I was nearly grown," he says, "before I learned that I was something to be felt sorry for, and the discovery came to me as a shock. It seemed funny to me, and also it made me mad!"

Mr. Dutton is a reporter of rare ability, and in this, his own intimate story, he has done a particularly effective job.

Gen NOV 10 1928 1.60
Digitized by Google 2.91930
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

two parents who were ideal and without a fault in my eyes. I can recall no word of my father's to regret, no act of my mother's over which to bow my head. They appear to me, these parents of mine, as I last knew them, clothed in the golden glamour woven around them by a child. Maturity and wisdom have not dimmed nor marred the picture—it has come down with me untarnished through the years.

Reason prompts with the reminder that they were human, and therefore with fault; but I laugh at reason. What is reason before fact? I place a halo upon their heads, and there is no imp in my memory to challenge it. And no man challenges it, for the living think softly of the dead.

In the little town of Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania, where we lived, old friends of my father and mother still recite to me their virtues, when I go back. The barber who shaves me leans over to confide that in his home, unchanged, are doors which were grained by my father's brush; and he adds, "This town has never had a painter as fine as he was." The lodge member tells me of a canvas painted forty years ago, and still hanging in its place in the lodge room. An old neighbor recalls the friendship of my mother, an anecdote that brings a lift to my head, and my mother's halo is aglow with fresh glory.

"Aren't you Will Dutton's son?" They halt me on the byway, shake my hand, and there is a warmth in that handclasp begotten of the heart. Never an unkind word, never a sneer, for if ever a cause existed for these it has been long forgotten. It seems that when a man or woman dies only the bad dies with them; the goodness lives and goes on and on. I smile when I hear someone say that it is a tragedy of orphanhood to be without a parent's influence and example. He knows not of what he speaks. Death has merely replaced the imperfect example with the perfect.

IT WAS my mother's wish, when she knew she had to die, that we boys be placed in an orphans' asylum. She and Father had gone over the matter together, even had picked the school to which they wished us sent. It was a school, one of three, maintained by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for the orphans of its soldiers who had fought in the Civil War. "The State isn't dispensing charity there," had said my father, "but is discharging a just debt."

Mother exacted of one of her sisters, who was to become our guardian, the promise that the wish would be carried out. The others of the family rose up in protest and in honest horror. They were able, eager, to take care of two small boys. My aunt Mae, who was childless, begged for me to rear; my uncle Charles as earnestly begged for my brother Hubert. It was unthinkable to them that we be sent away among strangers—worse, that we go to an asylum.

"I've given my word and have no choice," said Aunt Alice, our guardian, and her position was hard. She, too, had no children. Her husband, our uncle Horace, gladly would have taken us both.

I am glad that she had the courage to keep her word. Gentle, lovable, God-fearing Aunt Mae; big-hearted, kindly Uncle Charles! They would have made their homes our homes; they would have given to us from their hearts and done their level best. But our mother had designated the better way, had looked into the future with no small wisdom. Here was a gap which no relatives, however kindly, could fill.

On a day in February, 1902, Hubert and I became wards of the Pennsylvania Soldiers' Orphans' School, at Chester Springs; and we were to remain the wards of the State until we were sixteen years old.

Chester Springs is in the Pickering Valley, not far from Philadelphia. Near by is Valley Forge, steeped in history and in memories of Washington. The old stone school building in which we, the orphans of soldiers, said our lessons, was used as a hospital by the Colonial Army during that winter at Valley Forge. On the floor and walls of the building's huge attic were still to be seen the stains made by the blood of Revolutionary heroes. There wasn't a boy nor a girl in school who didn't know of those stains.

Great trees, a century old, enfolded our dormitories and playrooms and shaded all the grounds about, in which were mineral springs famed for their waters and the beauty of their protecting willows. Like the schoolhouse, most of our buildings were remodeled structures of stone, dating from Colonial days. Covered boardwalks connected them; all about were spacious old-fashioned porches.

Such was our "orphanage," now occupied by a famous art school, in one of the most beautiful spots I have known. There were several hundred of us there, boys and girls ranging in age from six to sixteen. We boys wore blue uniforms much like our fathers had worn, for these schools of Pennsylvania were conducted as military institutions and often headed by former army officers. The girls, who had separate quarters and playgrounds, but who sat opposite us in the dining-room and in class, dressed like the girls of any public school.

Major Holt was in command of the boys. He was tall and spare and bony, and reminded me of an old American eagle peering out from under a broad-brimmed military hat. Our immediate officers were older boys of the school and they were expected to maintain discipline, and did it. They had power to cancel our play periods and to impose minor punishments, such as scrubbing the playroom floor, peeling potatoes in the kitchen, sweeping the porch, and the like. A severer punishment was to stand on a table with arms uplifted "holding up the ceiling." The severest, administered only by old Major Holt, emanated from a worn and ancient razor strop which the major kept hanging behind his office door.

A WEEK or two after our arrival my brother was taken ill with scarlet fever. He was quarantined in the little bungalow hospital, a short distance from the boys' quarters, and I could see him only occasionally through the medium of a closed glass door. I was homesick. At dusk, while the other boys played, that awful emptiness and longing would come over me, and I would crawl away into some corner and let the tears flow as they would. I was strange, the ways of the school were strange, my comrades were strange, and no homeless and lost pup could have been more miserable. I wanted to die—and there were weeks of this.

One evening I was sitting on the porch, hidden behind a pillar, and as mournful as one small boy could be. I had been measured for my uniform, but it had not been delivered as yet. The suit I had on, the same I had worn when I came to school, was in rags. The rough benches of the playroom had played havoc with the seat of my trousers; great holes were in my stockings.

Suddenly somebody spoke at my elbow. I turned to face a red-cheeked, laughing-eyed boy with damp, badly tousled hair. He had been running and was out of breath.

"You're the new feller, ain't yuh?" he said in friendly tone. "My name is Louie Klientop. What's yours?"

I told him, with a gulp, that it was William Sherman Dutton.

"Oh, heck! Bill's enough name," he said. "Homesick, ain't yuh? Everybody is at first." Then, "Say, Bill, we're playin' Injun. I'm the chief. How'd you like to be one of my braves? Come on."

And grabbing my hand, Louie dragged me after him as fast as my legs would go, over the road, down the hill through the buttonball trees and to the open playground beyond. We drew up panting in the midst of a dozen boys.

"THIS is the new feller," announced Louie. "Name's Bill Dutton." And he added with an air that decreed hands off, "He's a friend o' mine."

That night, when tattoo sounded, I was with Louie and three of the most adventurous of his braves in a farmer's apple orchard, which was forbidden territory, scouting to see if any green apples were yet of eatable size. We had to run for it, as I had never run before, to make the playroom where the boys were assembling in line to be marched to bed.

"To-morrow night," was Louie's parting word, "we'll play bandit. I'm goin' to let you be a depity sheriff."

And next day, wonder of wonders, my new blue uniform arrived and I donned it, a full-fledged soldier's orphan at last! I was no longer a stranger, and ceased to be "the new feller." I had friends and was a member of a dare-devil band.

Somehow Louie got himself assigned to the iron bed in the dormitory next to mine. Later we were to sleep together, to sit side by side at the table, to hunt Injuns and trap bandits as brothers-in-arms, and to be thrashed together by the major. We swore everlasting friendship, and in thrilling moments of intimacy talked of running away from school and traveling around the world. Louie taught me the unwritten code of the school.

"Never call a feller a liar, unless you're ready to fight," he said. "Never let any guy call you a liar, either. And when you fight, fight fair. Don't hit the other feller when he's down; give 'em a chance to get up again. Don't kick, or bite, or gouge his eyes, but stick to your fists.

"An orphan," he said at another time, "has got to be man enough to look out for himself. He can't run an' tell his parents when he's hurt. He's either got to swallow it, or lick the other feller. He ain't no cry-baby, and he ain't a tattletale. He's a kid who can give a lickin', and take one, an' keep his mouth shut."

This code and its ramifications permeated the whole school. From first to last, it was a code of honor. The boy was not popular who always carried a chip on his shoulder; nor was he popular who feared to knock another's chip off. It was the worse kind of disgrace to strike a fallen foe; or to cheat, either at play or in the classroom; or to be known as a tattler; or as one who couldn't grin in defeat. No boy was permitted to "pick on" a boy smaller than he; any small boy could call a larger boy to his aid, and get it at once when he was in need. No boy spoke disparagingly of another behind his back; unpleasant things, if they had to be said at all, were spoken face to face.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

AND the code was enforced. The boys themselves saw to that. The school authorities, too, enforced it with stern justice. I shall never forget my first taste of this justice. The charge against me was fighting and thrashing another boy, and his pair of blackened eyes were in evidence against me. In fact, it was the boy himself who was my accuser; he had played the tattler.

"This boy says you blackened his eyes," said old Major Holt. "What'd you do it for? How'd the fight start?"

"He hit me when my back was turned, without reason," I said. "A dozen boys saw him do it."

Out stalked the major from the room and to the broad stairway opening into the playroom. "Attention!" he roared, and every boy in the room stood stiffly erect and silent. "Who saw this fight?" he demanded. A half-dozen boys thrust up their hands, whereupon the major fixed the oldest with his bony forefinger. "How'd it happen?"

The evidence supporting my story, back came the major and closed the door of his office. "Step up here!" he said, cold as ice, and my late opponent and myself strode forward. "We have a rule against fighting," said the major, "but there are times when a boy who won't fight is a coward. This is one of them. Dutton, you may go."

Outside the door, I paused. I heard the major snap, "Take down your trousers, I'm going to thrash you; first, for striking that boy when his back was turned and, second, for not being man enough to take the consequences. If you blubber, I'm going to thrash you a third time."

The ancient razor strap was in vigorous action when I tiptoed on my way. I was proud of myself and looked it. Then an older boy tapped me on the arm. "You did right, kid," he said; but added softly, "Don't let it go to your head."

No, we didn't rejoice over another's misfortune. It wasn't funny when another did wrong. Nor was fighting exalted as such; it was the spirit of the thing that counted above all else. Our superiors, wise in boys, knew that red-blooded youngsters will use their fists occasionally, and instead of denying the fact they faced it and made it a lesson in life, which too is a fight. If I have fought fairly the battles of manhood it is because fairness was drilled into me as an orphan-school boy.

William S. Dutton was born in Philadelphia in 1893. His parents died when he was seven, and he grew up in orphan schools. He has done newspaper work in Stroudsburg, Scranton, Philadelphia, and New York, working for a time as political editor of the Philadelphia "North American." He served throughout the World War with the Rainbow Division, most of the time as Regimental Sergeant Major of the 83d Infantry Brigade. For the past three years he has worked exclusively for "The American Magazine." Mr. Dutton is married, and lives in Philadelphia

I have said it was a military school, and it was. We had military discipline. I was taught to hold my head up and my shoulders back, to keep my shoes shined and my uniform spotless, to keep silent when in line, and to obey an order without "talking back." In the classroom, the standards were high, eighty per cent was the passing mark; and my comrades had little respect for failure.

The food was plain, but we had all of it we could eat. Our beds were clean and our quarters were scrubbed until the boards shone white. We took care of those quarters ourselves, and rigid inspections made us do our work thoroughly; the work, in turn, taught us that life is not all play. I learned more of self-reliance, and faced more of the real problems of boyhood during that first year at school, than I believe would have been the case in five years had my parents lived. And in me began to grow a very tangible pride in being an orphan; the time was shortly to come when I was to regard orphanhood as a superior condition.

CHESTER SPRINGS was one of two lower schools in the State's system of rearing and educating the orphans of its soldiers. The other lower school was at Uniontown, in the western part of Pennsylvania. All children were enrolled first in one of these schools, and upon attaining a certain degree of training were then sent to the higher school, which was the principal institution of the three. This third school, known as the Soldiers' Orphans' Industrial School of Pennsylvania, was located just outside the village of Scotland, in the Cumberland Valley, near Chambersburg. It still exists, though the Uniontown and Chester Springs schools have been discontinued.

It was during my second year at Chester Springs that I was transferred to the Scotland school, where trades were taught. This transfer temporarily separated me from my brother, who did not come to Scotland until a year or two later. Some of our relatives felt that this separation was cruel; but it wasn't. As I was older, my brother was overshadowed by me at Chester Springs. Once "on his own" there, he (Continued on page 109)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Human Nature Ain't What It Ought To Be"

And so Todd Hibbard tried to change it

By Ellis Parker Butler

DRAWINGS BY THOMAS FOGARTY

UNTIL he was eighty-five, old Todd Hibbard was as light-minded as any man in Catskill County and always ready to have his little joke. They still talk about how, at eighty-four, he pulled the rock joke on the fellow from New York.

The mountain farm was still known far and near as the "Todd Hibbard place"—although old Mrs. Hibbard had been dead fifteen years and Todd had deeded the place to his son Ross—and the stretch of brook through the farm was famed as the best piece of trout stream in the mountains.

Ross and his wife took the boarders now, running the old house much as Todd had run it; but everyone said, "Up at Todd Hibbard's." So this New York fellow wrote his letter to old Todd instead of to Ross.

When old Todd got the letter he sat down on his usual chunk of wood out back of the kitchen door, with the chips and sawdust all around, and chickens scratching, and the view of the mountain tops across the valley, and read the letter and chuckled. It was just such a letter as might come from a green New Yorker who had never cast a fly but had heard of the pleasure of fly-casting and wanted to begin.

In those days old Todd shaved every morning. He had shaved every morning for half a century. He said a man was a man, and not a monkey, and he was blamed if he was going to look like a monkey when he could look like a man, and he was blamed if he wasn't going to shave as long as there was a razor left and he could get a-hold of it. "Blamed" was his favorite cuss word, and when he got real mad he said, "Blame blamed!"

If you stop to think of it, you'll see that a man can put just as much cuss into "blame blamed" as into anything else, and it is less risky to use when there are women around. There were always plenty of women around Todd Hibbard's place, too; six or eight of the family folks and hired help and the summer boarders. Old Todd could go blame-blaming around to his heart's content when the other men had to swallow their cussing and seethe like a kettle of hot mush.

The only trouble with old Todd's shaving was that it made him look more like a monkey than if he had let his beard grow. Even when he was a young fellow of sixty-five the weather had wrinkled his face and tanned it, and when he was a few years older and began to be bent in the back and his bushy eyebrows turned white and his mass of hair turned iron-gray, and most of his teeth left him and made him work his lips in and out a good deal, he did look for all the world like a monkey, with his keen little eyes sparkling from under his eyebrows.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

But he got this letter from this New York fellow. It was six or eight pages, part very chesty and part very meek, and the man wanted to know if he could come up to Todd's place and have a week's fly-fishing for trout.

"I wish you would send me a list of what I ought to get in the way of an outfit," the man wrote, "and tell me anything else I ought to do to make a success of fly-fishing. I hear there are two ways of fishing for trout with a fly, the dry-fly way and the wet-fly way, and I wish you would tell me which I ought to use and what the difference is. And, also, how long a pole I ought to get."

Old Todd chuckled over the letter for a half-hour and then he went in and answered it. He knew just what the man must be like when he said pole instead of rod, and he wrote a long letter—chuckling to himself all the while—and he certainly gave that man some instructions. He liked his joke, old Todd did.

Maybe you have fished the Brekkill. It has been famous since the old Dutch days, when it was spelled Broek Kill, and it is a nice stretch of water. It has some fine pools, and there is overhang everywhere, so that the sun does not evaporate the stream, and the trout have plenty of surface feed and know a fly when they see one. Except for the pools it is fairly swift water, but its main feature is its rocks. They call them pebbles up there. Where there is a rounded stone as large as a tank on a gasolene tank wagon the natives say "quite a good-sized pebble." They say the Brekkill is "quite a pebbly brook."

THESE pebbles run all the way from a grain of sand to fellows as big as a house. The bed of the brook is nothing but pebbles, the flats are pebbles buried close together in soil; when a man has plowed and seeded he runs a heavy horse-drawn roller over his field to crush a few million pebbles back into the soil, or he cannot reap his harvest when his grain is ripe. Every field has a stone fence of pebbles, and there are huge piles of surplus gatherings of pebbles in most of the fence corners. The mountains are, of course, practically solid rock with a skim of earth, and there are outcropped knobs of rock everywhere among the trees, forty feet high, sixty feet high.

In the bed of the brook inside the limits of the Todd Hibbard place alone there must be millions—perhaps hundreds of millions—of these rounded stones.

When you look at the fields you wonder how a man can plow them; when you look at the rugged, rocky mountains you think that, whatever may happen elsewhere, these rocks will outlast the world; when you look at the brook you say you never saw so many stones in your life. You would not have believed there were so many stones in the world.

"THE trout," old Todd wrote the New York man, "is a queer sort of fish. They always head up-stream. They like to get in below a rock and wait there for flies to come, and some of the best trout are got when they are lying just below a rock like that. Maybe you had better bring a few rocks up with you for the trout to lie behind."

When the New York innocent arrived at Index, the station nearest Todd Hibbard's place, he had two suit cases filled with second-hand Belgian blocks, which are granite paving stones. He went back to New York on the first train; he had no sense of humor. One look at the Brekkill was enough for him.

That was when old Todd Hibbard was eighty-four, and it may "Agreement nothing!" Ross said roughly. "Suppose you go back to your hen and keep out of this"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Joe Prender was forbidden to come on Ross Hibbard's land, but he managed to see Emmy now and then be that the laying out Ross gave him had something to do with the change in the old man. Ross had more of his mother's characteristics than his father's, both in looks and disposition; but what had been a godsend to Todd in his wife became mean qualities in his son.

If Todd's wife had not been a big woman, and serious-minded, Todd could never have let himself go as he had, having a lot of fun with life. She was the manager for the place; she "put up with" Todd. But Ross was big and black and serious, and a man into the bargain, and he had a thick streak of avarice in him. They said he married Effie Decker because she had a similar keen desire to lay by money.

THEY trimmed the edges pretty close when it came to feeding the boarders who came to the place in the summer, and they were both angered when they discovered that old Todd had driven a prospective boarder away by one of his jokes.

Ross gave his father a great old tongue lashing, and Effie added what she had to say, and it may have started the change in the old man. He began to feel old. When his razor got dull he said, "Blame take the blamed thing!" and quit shaving.

His beard grew out white and rather sparse, which gave his face a rather moth-eaten look, and he became even more careless with his clothes than an aged man should be, and he quit chatting with the boarders and sat more than ever on his favorite stump in the chip yard.

He took a notion that a certain red hen was an especial friend of his, and he called her Culloch or Cullock, because of a sound she made when she was experimenting around, and he fed her and presently had her so she would follow him around or come running when he called "Culloch, Culloch, Culloch!"

Now and then, when there was more than usual quarreling in the kitchen, he would call his hen and pick up his stick and go down across the road and sit by the edge of the brook.

There was a place where the brook eddied back when there was a freshet, and it always left a little beach of sand and fine gravel, maybe four feet wide and six feet long but irregular in shape. It was where the teams were driven down to ford the brook when anyone went across to the woodlot on the opposite mountain, and it was always there, year in and year out.

Women boarders used to bring their babies down there to let them play in about the only nice soft sand anywhere near, and there was usually a rusted toy shovel or an old tin cup or something of the sort lying around.

Old Todd had brought Ross there when Ross was a baby, and he had brought plenty of boarders' babies there, and Ross's kids when they were little tots—Emmy and Roger and the rest of them. It was a pretty place. The one or two trees that were kept cut down to let the team through made it a sort of bower, with branches reaching out over it and over the brook, shady and as cool as anywhere in the heat of the day.

THE way work divided in the house, Ross's wife Effie came to have a sort of general supervision of things and her daughter Emmy ran the kitchen. Emmy was a pretty one and bright and cheerful, talking all the time in a voice with a nice little upward lift, and never being a minute without some work on hand, except when all the work was done and she had a right to rest. She was more like old Todd than any of the other grandchildren were, and she liked her joke as well as Todd liked his. They had some great old private jokes together that no one else understood or cared to understand.

"Well, honey," old Todd might say, "blamed if the tzoozicks hasn't flambastuated again."

"Grandpa! You don't mean it!" Emmy would exclaim. "Don't tell me it had the new chugbuggle!"

"It did, though," old Todd would say, and then they would both laugh as if they had said the funniest things

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He never missed a whack of his hammer-stone as he talked, but he did not let his mountain powdering interfere with his tongue, either mortal could say. All their nonsense meant was that Joe Prender had gone to Index again, and that he had gone in his new automobile.

Their joke language was simple enough if one understood it, as they did, for old Todd had once forgotten Joe Prender's name and said "who's this" instead, which they joked into "tzoozicks," and "flambastuate" was how Joe drove a car, and the car itself could be nothing but a chugbuggle. But old Todd and Emmy had a lot of fun that way, and it did nobody any harm.

At eighty-five old Todd was not supposed to be of much use any more, but he did a lot of small jobs around the place. You would see him on the lawn in front of the house after a blow, picking up the fallen twigs with their leaves attached, or he would go to the kitchen door and take a pan of scrapings and carry them away from the house for the chickens.

You might see him with his stick leaned against a stone wall, picking up a stone almost too heavy for his strength and putting it on the wall in the place from which it had fallen. He was always doing something of the sort, (Continued on page 70)

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

PHOTOGRAPH FROM HAMILTON M. WRIGHT, N. Y.

COURTESY K. P. M. STEAMSHIP CO.

A bridge of rattan over one of the tributaries of the Barito River near Moera-Teweh in Borneo. (At left) A Malay building on the Barito

The Conquering Jungle

"It is always encroaching, never sleeping—Cut down a tree, and three more take its place; make a clearing, and in two weeks it is cluttered with vegetation—Kill an animal and a million poisonous insects are bred; have pity, and you die! The white man will never conquer the jungle"

By Eugene P. F. Wright

I HAVE a deep sympathy with the jungle, yet if I were to try to give you my impression of it in prose you would think me mad. If you understood me at all, you would say that I was trying to convey a mood, and that such a thing should be done through music, or in a poem. I would no more give you a photographic impression of it than I would hold up a glass of water and tell you to look at the sea.

It is of the great Malaysian jungles of Borneo that I speak, for I know no others quite so enchanting, or so depressing. They crawl out of the Java Sea in tangled, odorous masses; and, until they reach the China Sea, a thousand miles to the north, they are labyrinths of lost vegetation, sodden with equatorial rains, and steaming under a tropic sun.

In these jungles, the white man, when he first enters, is as foreign and out of place as a Paris gown. All that he has learned, all that has come to him through heredity, is of no use. He is cut off from his own civilization, and he is without any other civilization. He has not the moral support that the presence of other white men invariably gives. He is utterly alone.

Men who have spent three months or more in the jungle alone are never quite sane. They talk to themselves of little inconsequentialities; they spend endless months in day-dreaming; they lose the habit of reasoning by words, and, instead, wonder over the problems that have puzzled men for ages, over problems that have their ends in space. They become reserved, but intensely sentimental, brutal without realizing it. The jungle captures a man body and soul, and molds him over again.

I am not talking about white men who merely live in the tropics, who work in an office in Kandy, or have an overseer's job on a plantation in Java. Such men are surrounded by all the comforts and influence of civilization, and are secure from

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

COURTESY K. P. M. STEAMSHIP CO.

EWING GALLOWAY

The boat that took Mr. Wright up the Barito River. (At right) Scene on the Bocloengan River, northeastern Borneo

the influence of the jungle. I am talking of men who go alone into the jungle, rare in spirit, and with Adventure written in their eyes. It is only these men who can translate the jungle into our language; it is only to them that you should listen.

IN SOERABAIA I met one of these men who have been changed by the jungle. He was an Australian prospector who had searched for gold and diamonds in every jungle of the Malaysian and Australian archipelagoes. His face was yellow and bearded; but he had the expression of a young boy. He was unconscious of his ill-fitting khaki clothes and uncouth walk. He looked at everything as if he were seeing it for the first time. For three hours we talked on the veranda of a little native hotel, but his talk was a monologue, in which he asked himself questions and answered them, talking to me, yet, out of habit, expecting no reply.

"It was up in that Punan country that I heard about the men with tails. We came across a party of young Dyaks out after heads, and they told us they'd seen the bivouac where these men had eaten and slept. They said they squatted down just like I did when they ate, because there were little half circles in the dust where their tails had wagged . . . just like a dog's tail wags when he's happy. Would you believe that? Well, now of course it mayn't be true, but who's to know what's in those Borneo jungles? Those Dyaks don't know 'em any better'n I, and 'twas the first time they'd seen such a sight. There's jungle there 't will never be seen by man, black or white.

"But did I go up? No, it was off my diamond trail . . . a hundred miles off, and I didn't go. Some day I'll go. Yes, sir, maybe some day I'll go back to find those men with the tails."

Thus he had talked to himself in the jungle, perhaps for years on end. He told of the men he had killed, of the fortunes that he had made and lost, and of sacred places in the jungle where the diamonds lay upon the ground like moonstones: "Big as turtle's eggs they were, and that clear you couldn't see 'em in a glass of water. But it was death to get those diamonds. Yes, sir, it was death to say the word!"

Every experience was followed by reflections upon what other men would have done under the same circumstances. He had lived so long in the jungle that he actually had a perspective of the white race.

I KNOW a Colonial Hollander who goes to Bandoeng regularly every six months, for his "vacation." He is frightened by the taxicabs, and has to have two friends walk on either side of him when he ventures into the streets. He tries desperately to convince himself that he should stay in Bandoeng forever; but although his leave is for two weeks he always returns to the jungle within six days.

I know another white man who spends his leave walking in front of restaurants and through markets, looking at the food; and still another, fresh from the jungle, who stopped strangers on the street and asked them questions: Did they know Bill or Halsey? Did everyone have plenty to eat? What would they do if the rice crop failed? This man could not sleep in a real bed without sitting up half the night looking at it, feeling the clean white sheets, and talking and chuckling to himself. He bought hoards of tobacco, just to "have it on hand," and took a fancy to having his nails manicured regularly.

I have seen yellow-skinned planters and grizzled diamond prospectors choke up with sentiment at hearing a broken phonograph play a popular American love lyric. In a little thatched hut at Moera-Djoeloi, five hundred miles up the Barito River in Borneo, I heard a tiny phonograph play steadily for thirteen days to a day-dreaming lieutenant who was waiting for the river to go down, so that he could start his jungle patrol. I know of a Dutch physician who (Continued on page 74)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A Man With A Face Like Mine Has To Be A Self-Made Man!

By Clarence Budington Kelland

IT HAS been working in upon me for a matter of twenty years that my personal appearance is not an asset. I wouldn't go so far as to say it is a distinct liability. I cannot put my finger on any positive damage it has done to me, or to my family or to any friend. I can't say it has ever deprived me of any honor or emolument to which I might have aspired had I been otherwise equipped by nature and art, but, on the other hand, I can say with conviction that it has been absolutely useless as an ally; that it has never earned its way in life, and that I could have gotten along just as well, and maybe better, if I had owned no personal appearance at all.

There are some people in this world who have been wafted to great heights by their looks. There are bank presidents who have gotten to be bank presidents because that was what they looked like. The surest way of getting to be a statesman is to look like one. Every political party has to have a man who looks like a statesman. He doesn't have to do anything but look that way, and be willing to disseminate his photograph broadcast and be able to learn by heart speeches written for him by intellectual persons who do not look like statesmen.

Having a personal appearance is a profession, as, for instance, being Siamese Twins is a profession. You either have it, or you don't. If you are a pair of Siamese Twins you never have to do anything about it to succeed in the twin business. There you are, and they can take you or leave you. But they always take you. And the same with a Personal Appearance.

All you have to do is stand around conspicuously and exhibit it. If you have enough of it, and the visibility is high. Such men ride through life on the shoulders of their personal appearance, the way a flea rides through life on a dog. The flea is comparatively negligible except on hot days when he gets uneasy; the dog does all the work. These people never have to do any work at all except to be a skeleton to fit their appearance over, and that isn't what you would call fatiguing.

Nobody deserves any credit for anything he does, unless his personal appearance is one of the sort you never mention at all, or else refer to in whispers behind his back. That sort of man—if he gets any place in the world—deserves a heap of credit. You can bet every time, he got what he got by hard work and sterling ability.

In this respect I may claim justly to be a self-made man. I may reasonably be proud of any little successes I have achieved, because I engineered them alone and unaided, without the help of a Roman nose, a statesman's forehead, the grim, determined chin of a fighter, the deep, inscrutable eyes of a thinker, or the firm yet mobile mouth of the man of action. No. What I have done, I have done from within, neither asking nor receiving aid from the heterogeneous array of features and architectural units which made up my outward display.

About all I can say with honesty that my appearance has done for me is to identify me. That is to say, you can look at me and tell it is not somebody else. Which, after all, isn't so much. The trouble seems to be that people look at me and don't care a hang if I am somebody else. There's no money in it.

Not only is my appearance such that I don't look like anybody else, but, search my mirror as I will, I can't see that I look like anything in particular. I don't mean by this that I don't resemble a fairly workable human being, with the correct number of arms and legs, and that you can tell my nose is a nose and that my ears are not artificial gadgets like bilge keels on a boat. I have all my parts, and they are assembled with approximate correctness. But the result doesn't make anybody gasp, either with admiration or horror. What I am getting at is that I don't stand out like a sore thumb. I don't look, for instance, like an author.

I DON'T know just what an author should look like; but he should look like an author because people expect it of him, and especially unreasonable folks like editors of magazines and publishers of books. "Gray's Anatomy" doesn't lay down the proportions of an author; it doesn't give his dimensions and elevations. But if it did, that isn't the way I look. The Editor of this magazine, whose name is Merle Crowell, complains bitterly about this shortcoming of mine.

And, while we're on the subject, if he looks like an editor, then I don't want a cent for writing this piece. Mind, I'm not complaining about his looks the way he does about mine—I'm just stating a fact. I suppose he is so self-satisfied over being an editor who can order authors around, that he doesn't care what he looks like. I try to explain to him that he is running a magazine and not a beauty contest; that what he is buying from me is first-class fiction and not a haughty pose.

But he can't see it that way. He claims subscriptions are canceled every time he prints my picture, because subscribers feel they are being cheated. They read a story purporting to be by an author, and then they look at the author's photograph, and he doesn't look like an author. Therefore he can't be an author. Therefore, the story can't be as good as advertised. But only part of the subscriptions are canceled every time my picture appears, because I write only part of the magazine. I dare him to print his picture and see what happens, because he edits all of the magazine.

Once upon a time, during the late war, it became necessary for me to go to France before it was too late. Even in the emergency, however, the State Department demanded that I get me a passport. Mr. Robert Lansing was then being a very handsome Secretary of State who looked like a well-known clubman and bon vivant. My passport, on which was pasted a photograph of me, was handed to him for his signature. As a matter of fact, he asked for it.

"I've read that fellow's stuff," he said. "Let's see what he looks like."

I am informed that he perused my picture at some length; then he laid it down on his desk with the gesture of a man handling sticky fly paper and spoke two words. "My gosh!" he said.

Now, if that is the language of diplomacy I hope he never starts out to irritate somebody. But at that, it is few authors who have jarred an exclamation like "My gosh!" out of a Secretary of State in the middle of a great war. I'll bet anything he didn't say as much over the battle of Château-Thierry.

Superb efforts have been made to obtain a likeness of me which should look like an author, or, if not like an author, like something admirable. Emissaries of magazines have taken my pictures with cameras using films, dry plates, wet plates. They have photographed me through gauze to get that foggy, far-away look and soften down the knobs and promontories. They have taken me indoors and outdoors, in sunshine and in shadow. But the result always is the same—the dog-gone pictures look like me. That is their one complaint. Probably they would be satisfied if some camera man could press the button on me and get a likeness of Bernard Shaw, or even of Irvin Cobb. Both those authors have personal appearance, and if there is a choice between them, I think Irvin has a little more than Shaw. At least it is thicker.

STRANGELY enough these editors blame me, and not the camera man. All I do is stand quietly to let him work his evil will. It's all one to me whether the result looks like me or like a ring-nosed giastacutus and I offer no resistances whatever. But they complain bitterly to me. As if I could help it. I suppose I could make faces. But even that wouldn't suit them.

So at last they got discouraged with photography, and resorted to artists. I suppose the general idea was that a portrait painter (Continued on page 86)

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I'M NOT so terrible looking as these pictures!" declares Clarence Budington Kelland, "I'll swear I'm not! Still, I'll have to admit that my face has never given me either aid or comfort. Its only service has been to identify me."

A PORTRAIT of Mr. Kelland (below) by Joseph Cummings Chase. "The genius of Chase couldn't hide the real me!"

Photograph by Cassey & Whitney, Lansing, Mich.

Photograph by Peter A. Juley

TWO baby pictures of the author (above). "My ears developed early," he says; "but, anyway, I've had two distinct compliments in my life. Read the article and you'll see." (Right) The author of "Scattergood" as he looked in his college days. "Even then," he says, "I began to doubt the value of my face."

Photograph by C. M. Hayes & Co.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Underwood & Underwood Studios, N. Y.

Edward Eugene Loomis

CONTRARY to old-time tradition, Mr. Loomis rose to the presidency of an important railroad—the Lehigh Valley—by the "white-collar" route. He began as secretary to a railroad lawyer, and passed through several clerkships before he became superintendent of the Tioga division on the Erie, his first tough executive position. Here he gained much practical knowledge about handling men, and here he began to apply his theory that the railroad leader of the future would not be the empire-builder type of pioneer, but the man who turned his attention to the internal workings of his organization. The application of this theory landed him in his present position, and under him the Lehigh Valley Railroad has been made into one of the smoothest-running enterprises in the country.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You've Got To Rub People The Right Way

By Helen Christine Bennett

D'JE see the new boss?"

"Naw, what's he like?"

"White-collar man, used to be a clerk." There was a broad grin on the face of the old railroader.

His companion responded with a second broad grin.

"White-collar man!" he said. "Up here! Huh, last about a month!" He spat, meditating, turning a speculative eye toward a man just issuing from the company office.

"That him?"

"Yeh, name Loomis."

The railroader appraised the new superintendent. Tall, well-knit, pleasant-looking fellow, gentlemanlike; but what did he want up here in the toughest section of the Erie? He shook his head.

Trouble started within a few days. Hardly had the new boss taken his place when a driver boy in a nearby mine, which was railroad property, was discharged for beating a mule. A committee at once waited on the new superintendent, and demanded that the boy be taken back.

The new boss refused. He was pleasant, but decided.

"Then we'll order a strike," said the chairman.

"I'll be sorry to see a strike," said the new boss cheerfully.

"Well then, you'll be sorry," prophesied a member of the committee as they filed out. The new boss followed them outside the door. There was a bulletin blackboard at the right, fastened to the wall. He stopped before it and wrote. Then he crossed the track and jumped on a waiting train and rode to Elmira. The committee, still conferring, walked back to the board and read

These Mines Are Closed Until Further Notice

This was calling their bluff with a vengeance. The new boss had teeth. It did not suit them at all to stop work. They consulted again. The boy had disobeyed orders; mule beating was forbidden. They wired Elmira. When the superintendent stepped off the train there the wire met him. They asked another conference. He summoned the committee. It was still stubborn. But the new boss was easy to talk to.

"See here," said one of the men. "We don't want to stop work, but this boy is one of us. Now what can we do?"

"Well," said the boss, "if you feel responsible for him you might pass the hat and get enough for a ticket and a new start somewhere else." They passed it, and the boss chipped in, which tickled them mightily. The boy went, the mines opened. The new superintendent had scored.

"Kind of like him," said the second old railroader, when the story of what happened at the mines became known. "Got grit. And it was funny, the way he did it."

"Wait a little," advised the first railroader. "Just you watch."

The town watched and waited. In that day the superintendent of a railroad division on the Erie was almost a czar. At Arnot the company owned coal mines and lumber mills and yards. It sold the employees their food, clothing, and supplies, and the price was deducted from their wages. The superintendent also held court once a week to settle disputes both in the company and out. If there was a family quarrel both husband and wife might turn up and ask to have the tangle straightened. Loomis reveled in his new supremacy. It was sheer fun. He intended to be an economical administrator, and he set about finding ways to reduce expense. All the lumber yards were well policed to prevent pilfering. He ordered the watchmen off and gave them other employment. Men of the town of Arnot twisted grim lips.

"That's a smart boss we've got," the word was passed. "He's taken the watch off."

DURING the following month shadowy forms were seen in the vicinity of the yards on dark nights. Then fences, hitherto left unrepaired, were suddenly mended; dog kennels and a number of chicken coops were built in back yards. Boards were renewed in porches and steps. But all the month Loomis went about smiling, cheerful, greeting the men with no sign that he saw anything. By the end of the month the pilfering was getting general. This new superintendent was evidently blind.

Pay day came. As the men received their envelopes and pondered over the charges against them their faces lengthened. For upon every pilferer's bill was an exact account of the feet of lumber he had taken, and the price had been deducted.

There were hasty conferences. How had the boss known, and how had he figured so exactly the amount taken? There was no error. It was the veteran railroader who explained.

"All month," he said, chewing complacently, "I've been a-measurin' the new material by day what you took by night. And bein' a boss carpenter by trade I measure exact. I missed nothin'." Despite themselves, the men grinned sheepishly. They had been caught, but nicely caught, and they had not been punished, only warned.

"A smart boss," said one with feeling. "Yeh, we said he was smart and he is!" Manlike they acknowledged that they had been outwitted and manlike they liked it. There was no further pilfering. If the men had to pay for what they got, it might as well be delivered to their doors. What was the sense of lugging it home at night? The new boss certainly was a rare one.

IT WAS in these two victories that Edward E. Loomis passed his novitiate as a manager of men. He had met the issues squarely and disposed of them as squarely, with a touch of whimsy that tickled his workers' sense of humor. Just so has he met and disposed of issues since, always firmly, always with that distinguishing touch of whimsicality. To-day the Lehigh Valley Railroad, which he heads, stands out in the transportation industry as a unique organization of workers, created by its president upon new lines which have proved unusually effective.

"I know every road in the East," said an executive in an organization which includes all the roads, "and the Lehigh Valley is credited all over as the best-oiled machine now functioning. Loomis has built the organization out of his own ideas, and if there is a discontented man on his lines he's hard to find."

The same sense of humor that has helped to make the Lehigh Valley Railroad a smoothly functioning machine makes President Loomis a difficult man to interview. He is easy to see, and friendly. As I sat with him in his modest New York office and realized that here was a man with neither pose nor front, who seemed genuinely desirous to do all that I wanted, I anticipated an easy time. But before he had talked three minutes Loomis was restless. He rose and began walking about the office. I tried another tack, but in about three minutes more he was off again.

"See here," he said, "I'm not much help. I've been wondering for the past twenty-four hours why I agreed to this interview. When I get to telling about myself I feel foolish. Then I quit."

He did just that. In the middle of a sentence he would become self-conscious and stop. We reached a compromise.

"You find out about me from other people," he proposed, "and I'll talk about the road and the theories we work with. I think I can manage that."

He was a little better than his word. Occasionally as we talked of the road he gave me a glimpse of himself.

"I think the thing any man or woman needs most in business life as it is conducted to-day," he said, "is a sense of humor. We are all trying to travel ahead as fast as we can. As a result, there are times so tense (Continued on page 80)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Israel Pritchard's face became hard and bitter. "Oh, she's sick, is she? And wants to come whinin' home?"

Helga Lind And The Bright Noël

A Story

By Nelia Gardner White

ILLUSTRATED BY VICTOR C. ANDERSON

I WANT to tell this story very quietly: but when I think of what happened up Sweden Hollow that Christmas season I am lifted out of the dull routine of my thoughts into a place of belief and beauty almost too bright to be borne, and my own inner quietude turns to singing. We have, maybe, grown used to miracles, and it takes one of especial greatness to move us.

This happened the sixth Christmas after Helga Lind became carrier for the Sweden Hollow Route. Helga was twenty-six years old then, and a woman of strength and beauty. Not a beauty, perhaps, that everyone would see. It had grown out of being hurt and of having that hurt healed from within; out of having compassion for people, and letting that compassion show in quiet deeds; out of loving and of being loved greatly.

She had never cut her hair, and I think the fair braids wound about her head set her somehow apart in her beauty. It was a symbol of her indifference to the small things small people fuss and fume over. I presume more people have come to Helga Lind in her six years on the Route than have come to all the rest of the folks up Sweden Hollow in their lifetimes.

In late November, just after Helga had taken to horse and buggy or cutter for the winter months, she came up from the post office one night after the early dusk had settled. There was no snow yet, and the whole world had put on a dull brownness that softened into gray in the evening. The wind was making a low moaning across the fields—the moaning that only November knows.

But it was not drear to Helga. She loved this time of year passionately. She loved it to-night with an especial warmth. In the pocket of her short jacket was a letter from Rush Sloan. He was coming for Christmas.

"And, please God, next Christmas we'll be together, Helga," he wrote.

They had waited a long time now. But he'd be here—Christmas!

It was as Helga thought of Christmas and Rush Sloan's coming, that she saw ahead of her by the roadside a figure stumbling along over the rough, frozen

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

231930

earth. It was a slight figure, weighted down with a suit case and a bundle. Helga knew everyone along the Route, but she was puzzled now. She did not know this person. Who could it be? Helga saw suddenly that the figure swayed sickly, and she pulled her horse up abruptly.

"Want a ride?" she called out into the grayness.

Then the girl turned. She put down the suit case, and seemed unable to lift her body again after the downward movement. But Helga saw her face dimly through the night, and gave a start. It was Abbie Pritchard!

"Why, hello, Abbie; I didn't know you were home!" she said cheerfully. "Where you bound for? Aren't your folks home?"

The girl stood there a long time, it seemed to Helga, gray against the gray of the fields, before she answered. When she spoke, her weak voice had a quality that startled Helga:

"Yes—they're home all right. . . . I dunno where I'm bound for. I meant to go toward town. . . . I guess I dunno what I'm doing!"

And Helga thought—"Why, she's sick!"

"Well, get in," she said aloud. "I can take you to town if you need to go."

She got down and picked up the suit case. But she saw Abbie reach out her free hand in a blind, groping gesture, as if she had to have something to cling to, and she came close, let Abbie cling to her. Then she saw Abbie's bundle.

"Why—you have a baby!" she exclaimed.

"Yes," said Abbie in that weak, numb voice; "he's five days old."

"Five days?" Then, as Abbie's hand clutched more tightly at her arm, "Get in, Abbie; I don't know what's the trouble, but I know you're sick, and I'm going to take you home with me!"

She helped Abbie in and spoke to the horse. They went on up the Hollow. The grayness was almost blackness now.

The baby began to cry.

"There, honey! Don't cry!" Abbie said weakly. "I guess he's hungry," she said to Helga.

Most folks would have begun to ask questions then, harry Abbie, for the sake of the gossip involved. But not Helga Lind. She felt Abbie's slim body shake once, against her, and she hurried. At the house she helped Abbie out, and called to her father to take care of the horse.

"I hadn't ought to bother you," Abbie said. "But I dunno as I can go any farther!"

"It's no bother," said Helga. "Let me take the baby—you're sick, Abbie!"

Helga saw ahead of her a figure stumbling along over the rough, frozen earth. It was a slight figure, weighted down with a suit case and a bundle

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She got Abbie up-stairs and into her bed. She saw that Abbie's clothes were shabby and that she was terribly thin. The baby cried again.

"I don't seem to have any milk for it," said Abbie.

"I'll fix a bottle," said Helga.

Still she kept from questions. When she came up with a bottle, Abbie was asleep, and her thin face had a look of such utter weariness that Helga felt a sharp pity.

When she went down to supper, John and Hulda and the rest began to ask questions.

"I don't know—I don't know anything about it," Helga said. "I just caught up to her in the road and she was sick and seemed dazed; so I brought her home. She looks awfully sick to me, but maybe she's just tired. I asked if her folks weren't home, and she said, 'Yes, they were home, all right.' It must be they had some trouble. . . ."

"Israel Pritchard's a hard man," Emanuel Lind said slowly. "And he's said hard things to the neighbors about Abbie since she ran away. It may be he wouldn't take her in."

"Oh—but, Father—with a little baby!"

"He's hard," Emanuel Lind said again.

"But not that hard, surely!" exclaimed Helga.

Emanuel Lind only shook his head.

Once, in the night, the baby cried again, and Helga got up and fixed milk for it. Abbie tried to rouse, but she seemed half-dead from exhaustion.

"There! Don't wake up—the baby's all right!" Helga assured her.

The next morning Abbie couldn't lift her head.

"I don't aim to put you out so," she said in a whisper. "I didn't suppose but what Pa'd let me come home—when he saw the baby. But he said he wouldn't—I'd ought to have known!"

"There! Don't worry about it!" Helga said gently. "Don't worry, Abbie! Just rest and get well! It was too much for you—coming so soon."

"I—couldn't pay—any—more—board!" said Abbie, and closed her eyes.

HELGA caught her breath. She had come, because she couldn't pay any more board! And it had been true—Israel Pritchard had refused to let her in! Helga remembered how, once, Israel Pritchard had said certain words about a fence, and how the matter had gone to law before the words were unsaid. But Abbie—their only daughter—sick—with a baby!

She looked at Abbie. Heavens, how thin she was! She had been pretty, in a bold, bright way. But all the boldness had gone out of her now, all the prettiness too. Helga sensed, without quite knowing, that Abbie Pritchard had gone through some pretty terrible months of living since she had run away from Sweden Hollow.

At noon—it was Sunday—she called Doc Davy. When the doctor came, he looked sharply at Abbie. He began asking swift, kindly questions.

No—no, she didn't go to the hospital—a woman across the hall came in for a couple of days. . . . No, she wasn't sick, not really sick. She—she guessed she was just hungry . . . only she couldn't seem to eat. She guessed she'd gone without too long. How long? Well, since the baby came she'd just had a little . . . the woman over the hall brought in some soup two or three times. The baby's father? He—he—

"I dunno where he is," she said in a whisper.

Doc Davy shook his head pityingly.

"Poor child!" he said gently. "Poor child! Well, Helga'll take good care of you. I'll be up again to-morrow. Don't try to sit up any, and take this medicine once an hour. You have a dandy baby there, Abbie!"

For an instant Abbie's face glowed with something that was almost beauty, then dimmed again to weariness.

But, down-stairs, Doc Davy shook his head.

"You've got an awfully sick girl up there, Helga! It's going to be nip 'n' tuck with her, I'm afraid. She must have been pretty hard put to it to try to get home with a five-days-old baby. She's starved, you can see that; and her heart's bad, pretty bad. Here's some medicine. If she gets faint, give her this. She's apt to. What's the reason she isn't home?"

"Her father wouldn't let her in."

"Thought as much! He ought to be lynched, Israel Pritchard had! Wouldn't mind taking a hand in it myself. Well, don't talk to her about him, just let her rest. I'll be up to-morrow."

THERE followed, after that, strange days for Helga Lind. Every night she hurried home from the Route to that little room under the eaves, fearing, each day, that when she came her mother would tell her— She had wanted to get a substitute on the Route, but Anna Lind had said:

"No, Helga; I'll look out for her, and the girls can 'tend the baby. It'll be good for them, at the Christmas season."

Anna Lind had understanding beneath her quiet.

So, each night, Helga went in and sat by the bed, and talked gently to Abbie. She told her all the happenings up Sweden Hollow. About the tow-headed Larsen twins and the new teacher at Number 7, and the romance of Sary Overhiser and her widower. They had painted the schoolhouse last fall, and they had parties there every two weeks. The young folks liked it. Last week, after that fall of snow, they had all gone out and coasted down Kollop's hill.

And Abbie lay still, too still, and watched Helga's face as she spoke, watched it so hungrily that more than once Helga found her lids smarting as she talked. At first Abbie didn't talk much herself; but, after a few days, bit by bit, the story of her last months began to unfold. It was only by sentences, but sometimes the starkness of those sentences was almost too terrible to hear.

"I wrote 'im—I guess six times—but he never paid no attention. I guess it was nothing to him if he did have a baby!"

And once:

"I hadn't ought to have ever gone away—only Pa wanted me to—to marry Jim MacFarlane—'n' it scared me—I was just a kid—'n' Pa'd always bossed me so. But seemed to me I couldn't stand it to be bossed into getting married!"

"No, no, of course not!" said Helga pityingly.

Why, Abbie had been only seventeen when she went! Helga thought of her often, then, as she had been—and wondered that she had not seen, beneath Abbie's boldness, the frightened, desperate fluttering of her young wings.

"I was just a kid!" Abbie had said. She was not quite eighteen now! But Helga could not smile even at that. For she knew that Abbie was quite grown up now, that she had said that sentence from the full knowledge of maturity.

And, once, Abbie sat up in bed, with her eyes a little mad:

"But you gotta stay, Ernie! The baby's coming! You gotta stay!"

But, it seemed, Ernie hadn't stayed.

And there was talk, too, about some factory. Poor little farm-bred Abbie, in a silk mill!

ONE night Helga's mother met her at the door.

"Abbie's been crying all day," she said. "And she won't talk. Maybe you can quiet her."

And Helga went up and found Abbie crying quietly into her pillow. Now and then she caught her breath in a little sob. When Helga touched her, she turned quickly and pulled herself up in bed so swiftly that the color drained from her face.

"Is that you, Ernie?" she asked. "Is that you, Ernie? Ernie—I wisht I could go home—I wisht I could go home!"

"Well, here you are at home," Helga soothed her gently. "Don't cry so, Abbie! It hurts you!"

But Abbie went on crying.

The next day Helga stopped at the Pritchards' on her way to the post office. She saw Israel Pritchard coming in from the barn, and she stood in the barn road and waited for him.

"H'd'do?" he said shortly.

Helga nodded briefly.

"Mr. Pritchard," she said, "I suppose you know Abbie's up at my house. I wish you would come up to see her—she's awfully sick!"

Israel Pritchard's face became hard and bitter.

"Oh, she's sick, is she? And wants to come whinin' home? Well, I told her she could rot in her grave before I ever turned a hand to help her again—and what I say I stand by!"

"But she's sick—and there's the baby—it's such a nice baby!"

"That's got nothing to do with it! I said as she'd made her bed—let her lie on it! I brought her up good, she had all she needed, 'n' then, just as she got of an age to be some help, she up 'n' run away. 'N' now she's in trouble, she comes whinin' home! Well, she can whine, fer all I'll listen!"

Helga looked about at the farm.

"It's lonely for a girl on a farm," she said quietly. "Most girls feel bound down by it."

"H'mph! If they 'tend to their knittin' and don't put their mind on gaddin' all the time, they're content enough!"

Helga looked at him a steady moment before she spoke again.

"I wish you'd come up and see Abbie," she said, almost with gentleness in her voice. "She's too sick to be moved home; but I think she's homesick—she'd like her mother, I know."

Israel Pritchard reddened angrily.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Helga stood there before their startled eyes a moment, holding the baby in her arms. "It seems so strange," she said, "that at the blessed Christmas time, with all the world giving and loving, anyone could come home—to Sweden Hollow—and find no welcome for herself or her child!"

"Well, she can't have her mother! She ought to have thought of that before!"

Helga saw it was useless, and she turned, without answering, and went back to her buggy. She felt a sharp impatience with Abbie's mother, so under this man's thumb that she dared not come, either. She thought of the tired figure of her own mother—why, she would have braved armies to come to one of them, in trouble! It seemed that all mothers were not alike. She was unusually tender with Abbie that night.

But, the week before Christmas, Doc Davy paused, with his hand on the door.

"Helga," he said, "I'm sorry; but I don't believe Abbie's going to get well. She was too far gone when she came. She can't pull herself back, even for the baby. I think life's been pretty cruel to that child—doesn't seem quite just, does it? She was a cheap little thing; but she's not cheap now. . . . It kind of breaks me up!"

Helga bit at her lip.

"Yes," she said. "It seems to me I can't bear it—not at Christmas time!"

She went up to Abbie's room with tears in her heart.

"Try this soup, Abbie," she said gently. "You want to get stronger, so you can take care of the baby."

Abbie took the spoon, put it down.

"I—can't eat," she said. "It seems like it chokes me!"

"Oh, just a little!" insisted Helga.

But Abbie couldn't.

"Funny," she said weakly. "I used to stand by the restaurant windows and watch the chickens turning 'round, 'n' I was sick with wantin' 'em—and now I just can't eat—it's funny!"

"No—not (Continued on page 106)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Three rousing cheers

Why I Don't Go To Church

By W. O. Saunders

PHOTO BY HAMBLIN, SUFFOLK, VA.

W. O. Saunders is one of the best-known country editors in the United States. The fearless manner in which he has conducted his newspaper, "The Independent," of Elizabeth City, North Carolina, has attracted wide attention, and so have his many magazine articles. He is an untiring fighter for the right, as he sees it, and has kept himself in hot water a good part of his journalistic career. Mr. Saunders is forty-three years old, and has served in many public positions, including that of chairman of the trustees for the State Normal School for Negroes

I DON'T like to go to church. I never did like to go to church. I don't think I ever shall like to go to church. I would much rather lie abed on a Sunday morning after the week's grind, or putter around the house in my old clothes and feel that the Sabbath is indeed a day of rest, a day made for man; or, when the outdoors is calling me, take to the open road. Six days in the week I have had my nose to the grindstone, meeting my routine obligations to the social order under which I live. If I haven't lived to suit God on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, I have no idea that I can make up to him by forced behavior on Sunday.

I feel no obligation whatever to go to church. I do not recognize any divine right of the church to demand of me that I attend its services, subscribe to its creeds, submit to its discipline, and contribute to its support. I believe in Jesus and the things He taught. Very heartily do I believe in Him and His teachings. But just what has that to do with the church, or the church to do with that? There is no necessary connection between being a Christian and attending church—none that I can see for myself, at the least. (And let me say once for all, that in this article I am speaking for myself alone. I do not care if every other person in the world is a member of a church. I have nothing against church members, and nothing against churches, except as they judge me for not conforming to their viewpoint as to membership.)

My wife is a church member; many of my neighbors are. Which is all well enough with me. All I ask in return for my attitude is my own right to remain outside if I care to, and not have that fact held against me. I do not believe in the right of the mass to bludgeon anyone into church membership, or lodge membership, or membership in any other organization that does not appeal to him.

THE church, as I understand it, was established by men for the purpose of teaching Christianity as the church fathers conceived it. But these fathers were not infallible. The custom they set, the institution they established, may be all right for many people, but it is not necessary nor obligatory for everyone. Church attendance, I think, is a matter of individual choice, not a matter of fundamental morality. As I have said, it is not, for me, a necessary part of Christian faith or life.

I feel no need of what the church has offered me for forty years. I get a greater spiritual thrill, and feel more reverence in the presence of the breaking of the dawn on my native sand dunes and marshes than in any mass or vesper service ever staged within the somber walls of man-made houses of worship, as I know them. In the crash and reverberations of thunder in the heavens God speaks to me. I get more uplift, more inspiration and more faith in an hour with a volume of Emerson, or, say, with Will Durant's "Story of Philosophy," than I get in months of sermons such as I have heard.

And, then, I do not like to go to church because the church has ever seemed more intent on bending me to its will than in making me a convert to a higher faith. I got my first rude jolt from a Sunday-school teacher, when I was a boy in knee pants. The Sunday-school lesson was on Noah and the Ark, and the teacher was impressing us with the miracle of the Lord placing a rainbow in the heavens as a covenant with Noah. I asked him if it wasn't a fact that rainbows had been appearing in the heavens right along from the beginning of things. "Shut up," said the teacher; "you're an infidel."

He didn't mean to be unkind, but he gave me an uneasy feeling that led me into a curious interest in this thing called infidelity. It wasn't long before I was reading Paine's "Age of Reason," and Ingersoll's "Some Mistakes of Moses." I just had to know more about infidels.

When I began the publication of a weekly newspaper in Elizabeth City, North Carolina, about twenty years ago, I became the target of abuse from numerous pulpits in the town and surrounding country. There were some who didn't want another newspaper in the town. Certain ministers were persuaded that a free-thinking newspaper in the town was a menace to be summarily dealt with, and they began to preach sermons about me. I had not attacked the church, nor had I used the editorial columns of my paper to air my personal views on the subject of religion. But the church in my town, in those days, was full of that peculiar crusader spirit that denied to anyone the right to be different from itself.

Being young and red-blooded, I fought back at the preachers and I wasn't particular as to choice of weapons. The pastor of one of the biggest churches in town began a series of sermons on me. When I opened my guns on him in reply, he didn't do a thing but call upon the "Christian manhood" of his congregation "to rise up in its might and purge the community of this infidel." The attempt at purging took the form of a mob demonstration in front of my home that Sunday night. There was an exchange of pistol shots, and I disregarded a notice to leave town within twenty-four hours.

AS LATE as the autumn of 1924, a professional evangelist came to town with a high-pressure soul-saving organization. A tar-paper tabernacle seating more than four thousand was erected for him. He announced that he would accomplish two things while in Elizabeth City: for one thing that he would drive every bootlegger out of business, and, for the second, that he would bring me into the church. Drive me into the church was what he meant.

The evangelist made good his threats with respect to the bootleggers. He hadn't been in the town three weeks before he had the backsliders down on their knees in his confession room. They told him about their liquor drinking and named their bootleggers. Armed with this information, the evangelist visited the head of our local bootleg ring in person, and gave him his choice of hitting the sawdust trail or of being prosecuted by nineteen representative citizens, who were ready to go into court and swear that they had bought (Continued on page 101)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Why I Do Go To Church

By Edgar A. Guest

I GO to church and contribute to the support of a church because I believe in churches. I would not care to live in a city or a state or a nation in which there were no churches and no churchgoers.

I am not a religious fanatic. I have yet to quarrel with a man regarding his choice of a religion; but I would rather have churchgoers for my neighbors than non-churchgoers.

I would not say that all the good people go to church and that all the bad people stay away from it; but I do say that if my new neighbor has a church affiliation and respects it, the chances are greater that he will be friendly and thoughtful and more considerate of my rights and feelings than would a non-churchgoer. For the man who assumes that all religion is a mockery and a sham is likely also to assume that all other restraining influences which would interfere with his personal pleasures may be disregarded.

I am not a regular churchgoer in the sense that I attend every Sunday, rain or shine. I do not attend church from a sense of fear or from a sense of duty. I do not believe that God will love all those who go regularly to church, and make outcasts of all those who do not. I believe that the future life is founded on something more liberal and more human than that. I think life on this earth would be intolerable if all had the same opinion and all followed the same rigid course. And I am of the opinion that the fine soul which stays out of the church will be as richly rewarded in the hereafter as the fine soul inside the church.

I have been bored in church. I have been annoyed; I have been made angry; I have encountered in church men for whom I had lost all respect; I have heard things uttered in church which have disgusted me; but I have never lost my faith in the purpose of the church, nor in its ministry as a body. Furthermore, on the whole, I believe in the people who support the church.

ONCE, as a reporter for the Detroit "Free Press," I heard a member of the clergy make this prayer:

"O Lord, put it into the hearts and minds of the people here to give liberally to our support."

I almost laughed in his face. If anything could have driven me away such a prayer as that would have done it. But I didn't blame the church for the foolish man who had strayed into its pulpit.

I am not of the opinion that the church exists to please me. It is here for my guidance and my instruction, for my help and my comfort in times of sorrow. I do not go to church expecting to be pampered or praised. If the minister be worth hearing at all, I fancy he will now and then remind me of my shortcomings.

Most folks who have been angered by ministers have had to listen to something which they did not like to hear. The same people hear things they don't like in theatres, but they keep right on going to them. They have been bored by inferior shows; they have had their intelligence insulted by low comedians who have sneered at them for their failure to appreciate their stale jokes; they have had their pet weaknesses mirrored before their eyes; they have sat with their wives and children and witnessed obscenity portrayed, but they continue to help support the theatre.

They have seen bad baseball, and they still go to baseball games.

They have drawn bad cards, but they still play bridge whist.

Business has been bad at times, but they still keep at it and still continue to hope. Friends have cheated them, but they still look to friendship for the lasting joys of life.

The only thing they can't stand for seems to be a minister who doesn't suit their taste. They fail to find perfection in the church, because the sort of perfection they seek is that particular type which agrees entirely with their own notions and conduct in life.

I HAVE only sympathy for the members of the ministry. Theirs is the toughest job I know, bar none. Their work is never done, and, what is more, I fancy it is never done entirely to the satisfaction of all the members of their congregations.

I go to church because I believe in the ministry as a whole. I have never been able to bring myself to believe, as some do, that rector, minister, priest, and rabbi have adopted that profession solely for the salary it pays. You could never convince me that Leo Franklin and Merton Rice and Lynn Hough and Bert Pullinger and Dick Command, and the late beloved Father Van Dyke, all of my town, deliberately elected to become clergymen merely because they thought it an easy and a paying profession.

Father Van Dyke, of St. Aloysius Church, in Detroit, was nearly eighty years of age when he died. If ever a Christlike spirit walked this earth, it was he. The poor knew him better than the rich. His little, old-fashioned down-town home was the calling place for thousands. Everyone who tapped at that door found a friend within. His birthdays were the occasions for the gathering of Protestant and Catholic citizens to do him honor.

I know dozens of men who are giving their lives, as did he, to the service of mankind.

Of course they draw salaries for their toil, but no such salaries as they might draw for such brilliant labor in other fields.

PHOTO BY GUY ELLIS

There is not a more popular private citizen in America than Edgar A. Guest. His verses and humorous sketches, printed daily in hundreds of newspapers, have endeared him to people all over the country. Mr. Guest was born in Birmingham, England, in 1881, was brought to the United States when he was a child, and he has been on the staff of the Detroit "Free Press" since 1895. On one of his recent birthdays he received thousands of messages from readers he did not know personally. He is in great demand as a writer and as a lecturer

I go to church because I want my children to go to church. I want them to know something more of this life than business, sport, and self-amusement. I know only one institution that will teach them that they are divine.

The church will interfere with their pleasures at times, but their mother and I sometimes have to do that, and we hope that they will love us none the less because of it. The church will mystify and puzzle them and seem irksome to them now and then. But all things that are worth while demand something of us in sacrifice. I believe that the church and the things it stands for are necessary to our well-being.

I know that scoffers have become believers, and believers have turned to scoffers, but I cannot bring myself to think that all the millions of people who have given us our churches were fools, and that all the non-believers were wise.

There is room for a difference of opinion; but the man who stays out of church entirely, good (Continued on page 104)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The place whereon thou standest is holy ground

Seeing Things

By Julia Peterkin

ON THE bright June afternoon when I came, a bride, to be the old plantation's mistress, everything seemed to be making the best of the day's last beautiful sunlight.

The dark richness of the smooth red fields, the long green cotton and corn rows, the wide stretches of ripe small grain, were all covered with thin yellow gold. Trumpet vines flaunted scarlet blossoms from every old hedge row. Partridges whistled blithely. Redbirds and thrushes called. Field larks fluttered up and sailed about.

At the end of a long avenue stood the Big House, my new home, silent, glowing white, its height strangely magnified by the brilliant west behind it. Great live oaks and cedars, shining with light as their branches bowed and waved in a soft summer wind, filled the driveway with mottled black shadows. Tall magnolias clicked leaf against leaf as their creamy full-blown flowers dropped floods of heavy perfume, half drowning the delicate scent of feathery pink mimosas. Squirrels frisked about on their paths through the tree tops. Rabbits peeped out from the shrubbery. Pigeons wheeled in low circles.

Scores of the plantation Negroes, all dressed in their Sunday best, were waiting to pay their respects to my husband and me. Their voices were warm with kindliness as they gazed at me and made frank, enthusiastic comments:

"Lawd! Looka we new Miss!"

"Us Cap'n is got a fine wife, fo-true!"

"Jedus! What a fine dress e have on!"

"Now don't all-two look nice!"

"Us Cap'n sho is had luck!"

To the younger people, he was invariably "Cap'n," to the older ones "Son;" but to one very old man, Uncle William, the oldest of them all, he was "Da boy." But they all called me "Miss," somewhat gravely, I thought.

It was delightful to receive the simple courtesy of these friendly, good-mannered people. The women made low curtsies, the men graceful bows, as each one expressed a fine wish for our happiness.

Many of them wished we might always live like Isaac and Rebecca. A few who were bolder, flashed fine smiles as they wished us joy, a gal and a boy.

Every one brought a present. White cloths bound new-laid eggs into neat clusters. Tin pans brimmed full of ripe strawberries or early peaches. Fat pullets were given with the suggestion that they be kept for seed, since they came from a line of fine layers or good mothers. Others were given to be eaten. A frizzled chicken, with its feathers all turned wrong because it had backed out of the shell instead of coming forward properly, was presented with the assurance that it would keep hawks away from the premises, and a blue hen was brought to give the fowl yard luck.

The whole world seemed suddenly to have changed. Here was an altogether new manner of living and thinking. Even the current speech, the words in commonest use, sounded new and strange, as if a mixture of English and French and African accents were sliding lazily, musically, off the lips of these black people. It was fascinating, yet vaguely perplexing.

Before many days passed, it became apparent that this plantation was a world complete in itself, amazingly independent of outside things. The cotton, ginned and packed into bales right at home, yielded money for needs that could not be filled here; but the swamp, teeming with fish and game, and the pastures where cattle and sheep throve, together with the fields and orchards and gardens, provided abundant food.

There was almost nothing for me to do except to amuse myself, for the housekeeping at the Big House had been well organized for years, and each department was in the charge of an expert individual, so that nobody interfered with another's task.

Daddy Champagne, who cared for the vegetable garden, was an authority on weather lore. He knew everything, from how to plant the different seeds on the different moons, to reading the signs given by the sky. He showed me his fenced-off enclosure with obvious pride, explaining how each thing grew best and when it needed to be planted; but I found out that if even the cook dared to pick as much as a sprig of parsley without his permission, the old man's displeasure was keen.

GEORGE tended the cows, fed them, milked them, helped them to find their lost cuds; but Maum Martha strained the milk and skimmed the cream and churned the butter. She also made the pickles and the peach preserves; but Maum Lavinia made the wine and the fig preserves, for they required longer patience than Maum Martha had.

I had several recipe books, but these old women frankly mistrusted printed words. They carried their

There's Something Here That's Worth Learning

JULIA PETERKIN is a farmer's wife. She lives on a big South Carolina plantation, miles from any city, a plantation somewhat hemmed about by the great Wateree River swamp. As a bride she came to this place.

"Isolated! Cut off!" Such was the verdict of some thoughtless acquaintance.

Twenty-five years passed, and then this same Mrs. Peterkin found herself suddenly the most sensational new figure among American writers. "Black April," her first novel, sent the critics on a hunt for fresh adjectives of praise. It is a book in which no white character appears; a rugged, powerful work of art. But Mrs. Peterkin had never intended to become a writer! Until her boy was grown to manhood, she had never even tried to write, or cared to. Her interest had been in making a home for her husband and their son, in attending to housekeeping details, and in meeting her friends when she could manage it.

How did a great novel grow out of such an experience? The answer is that Mrs. Peterkin opened her eyes and saw the life around her; saw it with bafflement at first, then with understanding. And with love. She might have fought her environment, as many of us do. She might have lived a routine, lazy mental life, as still more of us do. But she was eager to make her life an interesting adventure in understanding. "I soon discovered," she said, "that all well-being depends upon seeing things, and that the ability to see is an acquirement."

Mrs. Peterkin is a great writer. More than that, she is a woman who has learned one of the biggest things in the world—to see, to understand, to love. And to the person who acquires this spiritual gift, no location is isolated, no event is dull. The thing to learn from Mrs. Peterkin is not how to write a novel, but how to live!

THE EDITOR.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

recipes in their heads and a few experiments proved that theirs were as good as any I could find.

One woman washed and ironed the clothes and another woman mended them. Every task had a master, and each season its round of work. Things that I considered commonplace chores were held as arts. Each person had some especial talent or gift. Those blessed with skill or knack in one line lacked a good hand for doing something else. It was the plantation's way.

When winter brought the right moon and cold for hog-killing time, Maum Lena came to make the sausages; but Maum Anaky tried out the lard.

Old Chance trimmed the hams and packed them into salt; but Brer Bee smoked them and finished them off.

Nothing seemed left for me to do, but there was no reason to change the routine established, for the black people who conducted the affairs of my home were trained and experienced, while I was so new to it all that, somehow, my best efforts managed to make sad work of themselves.

The consciousness that I had no knowledge of practical housekeeping became annoying. My pride was hurt, and I secretly subscribed to a correspondence course in domestic science. I strove faithfully to master the matters of calories and balanced rations. When the course was done, I went to the kitchen and tactfully suggested to the cook that we have toast for breakfast the next morning instead of waffles. She listened patiently to what I said, then she shook her head. She said she had used those same waffle irons herself for over thirty-five years; they had been tried and tested. No toast could be as good as the waffles they made. Of course, if I insisted on toast, she would carry out my directions, so that I could see she was right. But I lacked the moral courage to argue the matter with her.

We had waffles for our next breakfast, not toast, and surely no waffles ever were better. But the incident was disheartening. It left me with a sense of defeat. I began to realize definitely what had been up to then a vague suspicion: that I was shockingly ignorant of everything that was useful here, and that I was familiar with only useless things, and, furthermore, everybody else knew it.

PHOTOGRAPH BY D. JAY CULVER

Julia Peterkin, wife of William Peterkin, of Fort Motte, South Carolina, is the author of "Green Thursday," a collection of Negro stories, and of "Black April," an all-Negro novel that brought her wide literary fame

The span of the plantation days was markedly different from those to which I had been accustomed. Weeks became appallingly long. Hot blue summer noons stretched out through hours and hours of time. Rainy days loitered and dallied, winter evenings tarried, well-nigh endless. Instead of trying to use my time, I strove to spend it, for so much leisure was hard to fill. None of the diversions I knew best were in reach of me. There were no parties or teas or lectures or concerts. No moving pictures or theatres. I was thrown on my own resources, and I found them surprisingly deficient. Boredom troubled me. Life threatened to stagnate. Sinister questions without answers crept into my mind and rankled.

One question that persisted was, how could the Negroes, people whom I pitied as ignorant, poor, dependent creatures, be so contented, so happy and care-free, here, where my days were often tedious and dull? They were pitifully destitute of material things; they had to work constantly for life's necessities; few of them could read or write; and not one of them had what is commonly regarded as education. Yet, for the most part, they were not only cheerful and merry, but they met what life sent with courage and grace. Why couldn't I do it as well as they could? What ailed me?

Five of their week days were filled with work. The men, and often the women, were kept busy from dawn until sunset, and in cotton picking time even the children were out in the fields betimes too, everybody taking dinner buckets along, so that only a little while would be lost at noon when eating was done.

The songs of the plowmen floated into the Big House, full of curious harmonies that sometimes blent into tuneful cadences, and at other times rose full and clear in a brazen dissonance hard to understand. The stillness brought in the laughter and chatter of the women field workers as they chop-chopped with their hoes, hour after hour, or moved slowly up and down the long rows, picking the cotton.

Sometimes a sharp, bitter clatter of high-pitched words told of quarrels; or shrill yells and screeches of fights. Long, terrible wailing shrieks announced to the world that Death had come and taken somebody away. For the plantation has no custom, or convention that requires the machinery of Life to be hidden or kept secret. Love, Birth, Death, Joy, Sorrow, all walk stark in the open here with an arrant frankness. It was often shocking, and yet, against the vivid, colorful lives of these black people, my quiet, orderly, idle, peaceful existence began to look strangely drab and dull.

I resolved to find out what was wrong with me, and I soon discovered that none of my senses was really trained. These black people had eyes that could not only see but also distinguish; their ears knew how to hear, and their bodies had been taught to serve them.

The little black children knew every beast on the plantation as well as they knew the people. The grown people were acquainted with every living thing in the whole neighborhood. I couldn't tell our own mules apart.

When the plantation people were ill, they sent to the woods for roots and herbs and made teas and medicines that cured them. I hardly knew all the flowers and trees.

But perhaps the thing that stirred me most was the discovery that among the plantation traditions was one that touched me personally: the belief that this plantation had never tolerated a mistress who could not "dominize" it. Long ago, when the first white man ever set foot on it, the Indians who lived here had a woman chief who stayed at home and ruled the tribe's affairs when the men were away hunting or fighting. It had always been so. It would (Continued on page 115)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"John," he began, leaning sidewise over the arm of his chair toward him, and speaking out of the corner of his mouth, "do you want my resignation?"

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"You got to make some enemies, only see that you make the right ones"

Big Matt

By Brand Whitlock

ILLUSTRATED BY T. D. SKIDMORE

Synopsis of the Preceding Instalment

"WELL, John, here we are!"

They were the words of Big Matt Holt, first visitor to the new Governor's office on the morning after his inauguration. And they cast the first shadow over that new career. Just what did Matt mean by "we"?

The trouble was that the Governor—elected by an overwhelming majority—knew what Matt meant. He, John Wesley Blake, was governor because Big Matt, political boss, had made him governor.

On the night of his inauguration a new vision had come to Blake, looking out at the State House dome, remembering the enthusiasm of the people. He was going to show them that an old machine politician could serve the people, as well as anybody else. How easy it had seemed that night—and how hard he was finding it!

Big Matt, his friend, expected to be made Commissioner of Public Utilities. Senator Morris, machine politician, and all of Matt's friends, expected it. Mills, of the Anti-Saloon League, Senator Pedley, all the "reform" elements bitterly opposed it. And in his heart Blake knew that they were right. Matt wasn't fit for the trust involved.

Attorney General Fenshard warned Blake against a split in the party; but, not knowing what to do he let things drift until the report spread that he had broken with Matt. In his trouble, he had no help from Grace, his wife, who was deep in social activities. His only comfort was his lovely daughter Joyce, and she was showing plainly her interest in Laurence Price, an idealistic young "reform" senator.

The Governor had almost reached the point of giving in to the reformers (and his own best conviction) when Squire, his secretary, ushered into the office Barney McGuire, political boss, crony of Matt Holt.

And with one phrase of Barney's all his resolutions were shaken to their foundation.

"There's nothin' in it for me, y' understand," Barney said. "But listen, Guv'nor, you can't afford to have the boys, the regular fellows, think you'd throw down a friend!"

IF THERE were only someone with whom he could talk it over—someone who was disinterested, and anxious to help him out. No use to discuss it with Grace; she wouldn't understand in any event, and just now she was too much engrossed by society, always on the go, overcome by her new situation as mistress of the Executive Mansion.

There, of course, was Joyce; but she was the one pure, sweet element in his life; he wasn't going to let the realities of politics touch her. Politics were dirty business; she mustn't be defiled by them. And, besides, he didn't like to risk the chance of marring that ideal figure of him which existed in Joyce's imagination. But Joyce knew more than she let on.

"Worried?" she asked, that very evening, as he sat before dinner by the great fire in the library. She perched on the flat arm of the morris chair, put one arm about his neck, and with her cool, soft hand smoothed his brow. "It's this bothersome business of Mr. Matt Holt, isn't it?"

"How did you guess?" he asked.

"Oh," she said, pretending to smile mysteriously, "something told me." And then she added seriously, "Is Mr. Holt such a bad man?"

"I don't think so. What do you think?"

"Of course he's not what you might call refined; but he has a good heart, and I've always liked him because he was your friend—and because he was always so good to us as children."

Blake winced a little.

"Yes, my friend," he said; "so he is. But the question is, ought I to appoint him to an important position just on that account?"

"Not if he isn't fit for it," replied Joyce promptly.

"You think Matt isn't fit for it?"

"Laurence Price says that he isn't."

AS SHE said this, Joyce's voice suddenly fell on a lower tone, a tone that had in it a certain soft, indulgent, almost caressing quality, which, since it was employed to utter the syllables of Laurence Price's name, startled Blake and seemed like a new and unexpected menace to his happiness. He glanced swiftly up at her, and her gray eyes fell.

"What has Price got against Matt?" he asked.

"Nothing personal, I'm sure," Joyce replied. "He thinks that personal considerations oughtn't to weigh in public affairs."

"Oh, oughtn't they!" exclaimed Blake, the old practical politician within him bristling up at this sudden challenge of the spirit of reform.

"Mr. Price is a man of high ideals, Papa," Joyce reminded him, "and he thinks they ought to apply in politics, as everywhere else."

"No doubt," said Blake. "Only you know, Joyce, these reformers always think that the only way to show your high ideals is to turn down your friends and appoint somebody who'll be for them and not for you when the time comes. You haven't got a candidate for the job, have you, Joyce?"

"No, dear," she said. "And you know this, that, whomever you appoint, I'll be for you just the same." She laughed, and gave his head a hug.

Mrs. Blake, just then, came in, dressed for dinner but, always busy, with a paper and pencil in her hand.

"John," she asked, "tell me, do you think that I've really got to have Mrs. Fenshard pour on Thursday?" She put the point of her pencil to her lips and studied her paper.

"How should I know?" Blake replied impatiently. "What difference does it make?"

In Blake's mind the political world and the social world were two widely separated and wholly unrelated realms of human envies and ambitions; and he was just then too much absorbed by the important problems of the one to care much about the trivial questions of the other.

Now that Grace had come in, he could no longer talk freely with Joyce, and as he didn't have to think when he talked with Grace he allowed his mind to wander off in search of someone whom he might appoint Commissioner of Public Utilities, and please the reformers, the party, the people—everybody—and at the same time balance the ill effects that would follow a break with Matt Holt.

"I should think you would ask her." He was dimly conscious of Joyce's voice saying this.

"Oh but, my dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Blake. "You know she is so impossible! And I do want my first reception to be nice—to set a kind of tone. I can ask her later, don't you think, John?"

"Oh, I guess so," replied Blake, indifferently.

"Well, I'm glad you agree," said Mrs. Blake. And with an almost vicious gesture of satisfaction she struck a name from her list.

BLAKE thought that night of Joyce's words, and tried to recall the new vision, his new ideal of public service. It had grown rather dim, of late; he couldn't recapture it, see it quite so vividly as he had on that night of his inauguration.

"Not if he isn't fit for it," Joyce had said. But then there were those words of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I'm glad you agree," said Mrs. Blake. And, with an almost vicious gesture of satisfaction, she struck a name from her list

Barney McGuire's, "Throw down a friend." He tried to think of some way in which he could live up to this new ideal, and at the same time not throw Matt down, and gratify his old political associates, the regular fellows.

Confound it all, if only he didn't have those doubts about Matt's honesty! Doubts? No, that certainty; he hadn't "trained" with Matt in politics all these years without knowing pretty well what Matt would be likely to do in a position that gave him a controlling influence over the public utility corporations of the state.

There, in the darkness of the night, while the thawing snow fell drip-drip from the roof, and now and then slid off the roof with a rush and fell with a slap on the ground, he looked over the years, at all those trades, bargains, deals, shady combinations that he and Matt had made.

Not if he isn't fit for it! But who, of the fellows he knew, was fit for it? He himself, for instance; was he fit for it, fit to be governor? There were a lot of temptations, and Matt was poor as a church mouse. Perhaps the kindest thing he could do for Matt would be not to appoint him, not to expose him to all those terrible temptations. But imagine offering such an explanation to Barney McGuire—or to Matt!

AND yet, there was what Joyce had said; Joyce was right; Joyce knew better than any of them; there was only one way, and that was to send for Matt, and tell him, squarely and frankly, that he couldn't appoint him; he might have anything else, except the Commissionership of Public Utilities. It would be hard, but it must be done.

He would send a telegram to Matt the first thing in the morning, summoning him to the capital.

He dreaded to see Matt. All that day he watched the passing hours, swift as the train on which Matt was rushing to the capital. By way of preparation for the ordeal, he acted a part all day; he adopted and, as it were, rehearsed a dashing, independent manner; he had never been so decisive, so authoritative and final; he was almost domineering. But down in his own heart Blake knew there was no dashing and headlong courage, but only a fear, a sense of shame and ignominy in turning on this old friend by whose help he had risen to this place.

The day was nearly over at last. He glanced at the clock; four-fifteen; Matt's train was just pulling into the Union Station—unless by some lucky chance it was late. He flung up the window and inhaled a few deep breaths of the wintry air. It was dark. Electric arc lamps were spluttering under the bare trees. The noises of the street had fallen on that note of weariness and exhaustion which comes to a city at the close of day. . . .

And then, there was Matt, standing in the doorway, his large, reddish face wearing an eager, expectant, and yet slightly uncertain smile. Blake flung down the window sash, and turned to greet his old friend. There was a slight constraint in their meeting which Blake's handclasp and his simple "Hullo, Matt," hardly dissipated. Matt sat down, and said, simply:

"You sent for me, Governor?"

"Yes, Matt. I wanted to have a little talk with you."

"All right. Here I am."

"Yes," said Blake, musingly, turning away from Matt, and gazing abstractedly at a winking sign away across the street.

"A little talk won't do any harm," he said presently. "So much has been said, there have been so many misunderstandings—"

"Pardon me, Governor," Matt suddenly interrupted him, laying stress on the "me," "but there's been no misunderstanding on my side."

"But, Matt—"

"Listen," Matt insisted. "If you're troubled about this here Public Utility appointment, why, don't consider me a minute. I don't want to embarrass you. If you think that Matt Holt ain't fit for that job, that he's the kind of fellow some of the papers make him out, why, don't say anything more. We'll forget all about it."

BLAKE felt immensely uncomfortable. The dashing, bold, and independent manner that had served him well all day in those preliminary practice rounds with weaker opponents quite deserted him; it would not serve with Matt! Matt adored him, looked upon him as one of the great men of the Republic, destined to high things. "What a President he'd make!" he had overheard Matt say.

Matt had worked for his advancement, unselfishly; there was something touching in his affection. But as Blake watched him now, covertly, he saw suddenly, that this character, this personality, which in Matt's mind was John Wesley Blake, was, for the first time in his life, questioned and doubted and, as it were, placed on trial in the forum of Matt's opinion.

Matt sat there and looked at him, his eyes fixed in a wide, intent interrogation that confused Blake; he could not remember what he had intended to say; Matt had generously offered to withdraw his claim to the place, but, somehow or other, instead of making the problem simpler, that only made it harder—Blake scarcely knew why.

He could not think, he could only feel—feel Matt's eyes upon him, feel Matt's personality expand and fill the room and lay its queer spell over him.

"Well, Matt," he found himself saying, and even then he did not know just how he was going to put it; "I sent for you because I thought that before I appointed you we ought to talk the matter over, to discuss the situation somewhat, to determine what policies should be followed in the conduct of your office."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

While he was pronouncing these words, Blake had stiffened into an attitude of firmness and command; he leant forward in his chair, and was going on when Matt, his eyes wider than ever, but now with surprise and a slowly dawning joy, said:

"You mean, Governor, that you are going to appoint me Commissioner of Public Utilities?"

"Why, of course," exclaimed Blake, with a scowl of irritation and an impatient shake of his head, as though the question were absurd, as though there never had been any doubt of his intention. "Don't you know me after all these years?

"No; listen, Matt," and Blake, still more erect, still more firm and dominating on the edge of his chair, scowled and, clenching his hand, laid his fist on the table. "I want these public service corporations to understand that they've got to be on the square!" And he struck the table a vigorous blow with his fist.

"I want them to understand that they can no longer exploit and rob the people the way they've been doing all these years, watering stock, and rigging the market, giving poor service and charging extortionate rates, and generally acting as if they owned the cities and the state and the Government and the people." The strong fist thumped the table before him with emphasis at each phrase.

"The thing has gone too far, and it's got to stop! And I'm going to stop it!" He brought his fist down with a blow of irrevocable determination. "Do you agree with me?"

"Sure," said Matt.

"Well, then," said Blake, "that's the policy I want the board to follow."

Matt sat there before him, his face somewhat dim in the failing light. Blake wondered what Joyce would say. But then, no use to worry about Joyce; she would be for him, just the same, no matter whom he appointed.

A warm, comfortable feeling was created in the gathering darkness. Blake could feel that Matt's mind and his were in harmony, unity, once more.

Old Fox, the negro messenger, came in and switched on the light, and Matt was sitting there, his large face illumined by an expression of gratitude and relief. His eyes were fixed on Blake with a look of adoration, as on his hero. Matt waited until old Fox had gone out, then cleared his throat and spoke, humbly, with a slight embarrassment; it was rather hard for Matt to express his feelings.

"I won't try to tell you now just how I feel," he said. "I won't try to thank you. It isn't the job, so much, that I wanted—though I needed it. It was the recognition by you. I wanted to be able to say that I'd held office under the best and greatest Governor the old State had ever had!"

"Oh, that's all right, Matt; don't mention it."

A great sense of magnanimity, generosity, and relief pervaded Blake; he felt that he had been strong, courageous; that he had asserted his will by what he had said to Matt and by striking the table with his fist. He felt well pleased with himself, and fonder than ever of old Matt.

"And now, Matt," he said, "you must come over and have dinner with us." As they sat, late that night, in the library at the Executive Mansion, talking over old times, Matt, in a lull, looking rather dreamily into the fire, said:

"You don't know, John, what this place means to me. I've fooled away my whole life in politics; no," he hastily caught himself up, "not fooled it away, if it's been any use to you; but I've never saved a dollar. I was down to my last cent, and was thinking if I didn't get this place, I'd go after the nomination for sheriff next fall."

When Blake announced the appointment of Matt Holt as Commissioner of Public Utilities nothing, to his surprise, happened. The storm of criticism that he had dreaded did not occur. Indeed, he felt that his reputation had been rather enhanced; he was regarded as a man who knew his own mind, a strong and loyal man, not afraid to brave opinion and stand by his friends.

He was still in the

(Cont'd on page 135)

He loathed those hulking and impudent venders of papers, gloating over his trouble and pain

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Turn Your Handicap To Your Advantage

By Louis E. Bisch, M. D., Ph. D.

PHOTOGRAPH BY IRVING CHIDNOFF, N. Y.

Dr. Louis E. Bisch, consulting specialist in psychology and diseases of the nerves, is professor of neuropsychiatry, New York Polyclinic Medical School and Hospital. Doctor Bisch's books include "Your Inner Self," "The Conquest of Self," and "Clinical Psychology." He is forty-two years old, and lives in New York City

NOT an individual living is absolutely free from handicaps. Some of us are physically disabled, others are mentally harassed, hundreds suffer both. We struggle with deformity; we fight disease; we wrestle with doubts, fears, feelings of inferiority, over-sensitiveness, uncontrollable temper, all sorts of distressing disabilities. Even the greatest among us are handicapped like that. Every human being is prevented somehow from fulfilling his highest destiny.

But this need not be. Handicaps need not stand in the way of our progress and happiness. There is no valid reason why handicaps should any longer hold us back or pull us down. Indeed, thanks to modern science, handicaps are actually being turned to our advantage. You can even convert incurable ailments into lasting triumphs.

In order to prove this astonishing principle, which can be applied universally to all varieties of handicaps, whether they be serious and obvious or, relatively speaking, disguised and less damaging, I have purposely selected illustrative cases which, on their face, are striking and unusual. A decade ago one scarcely could have imagined such utterly devastating handicaps producing any effect other than complete defeat for the individual so afflicted.

That day, however, is past. Nowadays, the worst possible handicaps merely challenge us to combat. No longer need we be afraid, come what may. No matter what the handicap may be, whether it be big or little, no matter how much it threatens to overwhelm us, we are enabled now, in these days of scientific enlightenment, to face it calmly, to conquer it, to force it to do our bidding.

What has always stuck in my mind with unusual vividness is an incident that occurred in my office about a year after I had hung out my shingle.

I had just said good-by to my last patient for the day when in rushed an intensely agitated woman, reporting that a terrible accident had occurred, and requesting that I hurry to her home as speedily as possible.

And a terrible accident it really turned out to be. Her husband, a man of forty-six, had been cleaning his clothes from a large pan of gasolene. Thoughtlessly, he struck a match to light his pipe. There was an explosion. You can readily imagine what happened.

The pain and the face burns were not, however, the worst this unfortunate man had to endure. There were long torturing weeks of treatment, to be sure. But what was going to be the result when the bandages finally would be taken off? What damage had the explosion done to his eyes?

The day before the scheduled time finally to remove the dressings we were sitting alone in his modest little living-room with the shades drawn to shut out the light. Seeing him there in the dimness, so downcast, so utterly helpless, gripping the chair with all his strength to try and sustain his courage—well, I have seen many tragic figures since, but this one still appeals to me as the most pitiable of them all.

"Doctor," he finally began, "to-morrow comes the big test. I hope I shall be ready for it." His voice choked with emotion.

"Come now," I said, with as much assurance as I could reasonably muster under the circumstances, "perhaps things won't turn out as badly as we fear, after all. In any case, you must not allow that wonderful grit of yours to desert you?"

"I know, I know," he replied. "But can you imagine what it means sitting here day in and day out, wondering whether I really am going blind? And that is not the worst of it. I have already prepared my mind for that, if it must be. I have saved no money. I carry no accident insurance. I am in debt. What is to become of my wife and three children?" He broke down and cried like a child.

And the following day the worst really did happen. A film of scar tissue had grown over each eyeball and completely blotted out his vision. The patient was stone blind, and doomed to remain so for the rest of his life.

Now, here was a problem, a vital, gripping problem. The man had been a bookkeeper for twenty-odd years. To work at figures again was out of the question. His accustomed means of livelihood was lost. What was to be done? What could be done to help this man rehabilitate himself, and at the same time preserve his self-respect?

TWENTY years ago, the very magnitude of such a handicap would have baffled us. Pity would have been about the best we could have offered. In those days, any sort of a drawback, however insignificant, foreshadowed serious possibilities. We stood helpless and hopeless before disability.

But that time happily is past. Thanks to science, no handicap can floor you any longer. No handicap should even alarm you. All you have to do is study the principle that underlies the conquest of all handicaps. The nature of the handicap is of no importance, nor its origin.

If your handicap be a small one, you can conquer it easily. If it be a large one, even if it rob you of an important sense organ as in the case just cited, be calm,

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

think, apply the principle. There is no "if" or "but" about it. Each and every handicap actually can be turned to your advantage.

The scientific principle about which I have been talking is based upon certain laws of psychology and physiology. It states that if one sense is maimed, or destroyed, or otherwise disadvantageously affected, other senses develop more fully, become more acute, and are able to function with a greater degree of efficiency. This principle is known as the principle of compensation.

Should you lose your right hand, for example, your formerly awkward left hand will gradually take on all the abilities that used to belong to your right. Should your vision in either eye be destroyed, or the hearing in either ear, the other eye or ear will soon be able to do the work of the two former healthy, normal organs. Take one sense away, and others will flourish as never before.

IT IS this principle of compensation that gave the hint as to how my patient's tragic loss of sight might be remedied. What is more, by applying the principle with thought and planfulness, the handicap of blindness not only was robbed of its terrors, the prospect of destitution and black despair were not only overcome, but the handicap was actually turned to the patient's advantage!

At the outset, attention was centered on the man's touch sense. We developed his touch sense deliberately, and we started to do so just as soon as it was learned that the blindness was incurable. Within a few weeks he had learned quite easily how to distinguish between various degrees of smoothness of sand when rolled between the thumb and forefinger. A little later he began to practice with flour. And with astonishing rapidity he learned how to distinguish and name various brands of flour, even when only the very slightest differences of smoothness existed.

Then a position was secured for him. He became a flour tester. Flour testers sort and grade flour by sampling it through the sense of touch. Specially interesting was it to observe how quickly he outstripped his colleagues in expertness. Their touch sense, keen though it was through training, could not compete with that of the patient's. In him the touch sense could be, and was, developed far beyond normal limits as a compensatory reaction to his loss of sight.

He soon regained his feet financially. He paid off all his debts. He was able to afford more luxuries for himself and family than ever before. He felt proud of himself, happy over the obstacles he had conquered. It gave him great satisfaction to think he would be able to send his children to college. Indeed, as a flour tester he earned five times as much as he did while a bookkeeper!

MANY of our greatest men were handicapped by disease, and somehow surmounted it. Milton and Handel were blind. Beethoven was deaf. Stevenson and Keats had tuberculosis. Pope was deformed. Cæsar suffered from epilepsy. Lamb and his sister were subject to repeated attacks of insanity. Fielding wrote his rollicking book, "Tom Jones," while melancholy. Florence Nightingale did some of her best executive work while bedridden. The list, indeed, is a long one. These people achieved in spite of a handicap.

This, however, is something quite different from the point I wish to make. The case I have just cited was more than the mere overcoming of a handicap. That, in itself, is a wonderful achievement, I admit. But even more marvelous are the possibilities we find open to handicapped individuals of actually converting what would ordinarily be a serious drawback in life into a positive advantage, one, indeed, that could not otherwise be obtained except for the presence of that particular drawback. In (Continued on page 112)

If You Ask Me:

Here's a chance for you to write your own text

NOT long before his recent untimely death I was talking with Arthur Jeremiah Roberts, president of Colby College, a rather small institution on the bank of the Kennebec River in Maine. In nineteen years of inspired intelligence, Roberts has left his mark on Colby, and on the entire system of higher education in New England.

"How have your athletics been going lately?" I asked him.

"Fine! Very fine!"

"Been winning some state championships?"

"A fair share of them. But we've done something bigger than that!" His eyes glowed behind his glasses.

"What is it?"

"We've made two great discoveries: One is that we don't have to win. And the second is that when we lose we lose nothing but a game. We don't lose our college pride or our self-respect, for example.

"The same thing is true all along the line," he continued. "Take our debating teams. We have been winning a lot of intercollegiate debates. But we could have won even more if all we thought of was victory. As I saw it, our debates were held for the purpose of training young men in public speaking, and not just to see what laurels we could bring home. Last season we had two or three outstanding debaters. Did we use them all the time? We did not. In every debate some of our best men were sitting on the side lines because we wanted to give everyone on the squad a chance to develop his talents under fire. If we lost the debate, the debate was all that we lost!"

A MAN hit me for a job one day last week. Two years ago he was the star feature writer on the leading newspaper of a Middle-Western city. But he wanted new and greater fields to conquer. So he came to New York.

The grass had looked green on the other side of the fence. And it was green. But it was also full of hidden snags. For some time he made a precarious living by free-lance writing. At last he got a position as associate editor of a trade publication. After a while this publication went out of business. And he hadn't been able to get another job.

"Why don't you go back to your home paper?" I asked him.

"And let the home folks know that I lost the only job I was ever able to get in New York?" he said bitterly. "Why, I couldn't look them in the face!"

"But it wasn't your fault," I reminded him.

"No; but they wouldn't know that. And I'd feel like a cur."

That whipped look was still on his face as he left my office. I felt infinitely sorry; but I could see little hope for him unless he could somehow learn to look at life's values with different eyes.

"WHAT's the greatest satisfaction you've got out of life?" I once asked a successful engineer.

"The knowledge that I've always done my damnedest," he shot back. "Sometimes I've won and sometimes I've lost—but no one can say that I wasn't always out there trying. And let me tell you, young man, that there's a whale of a lot more satisfaction in trying hard for something and losing it than in getting some reward you know you don't deserve."

Take these three little anecdotes and stir 'em up for your own sermon. I'm a reporter—not a preacher.

Merle Crowell

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Six Best-Loved Characters On The American Stage

They are not men of action, and they are not very heroic, but they have humor, cheer, and they embody many of the best-liked human weaknesses—We love them because through their own hearts they appeal to ours

By Walter Prichard Eaton

IF YOU want to know what a people are, in their hearts, you can probably learn more by watching them at their play than at their work. What they do with their leisure is more indicative of their real selves than what they do with their working hours. That is why, of course, history has always paid far more attention to the art of ancient nations than to their industries. More could be learned from it.

Going to the theatre has always been a pastime of our leisure, from the earliest days of our Republic. It still is, though in many sections outside of New York the motion picture has largely taken the place of the beautiful art of the spoken drama. Down through the years there has been in every generation at least one performance by an actor or actress which captured the imaginations and affections of us all, which was rewarded with universal admiration and became, as it were, a sort of national heritage. Whatever the character impersonated, this imaginary man or woman seemed more real to most of us than our neighbors, and was always spoken of as if he drew the breath of immortal life. So our fathers and mothers spoke of Jefferson's "Rip Van Winkle." So we today speak of Arliss's "Old English."

Suppose we consider a few of these outstanding and beloved performances, and see if we can deduce from them anything about ourselves—not about the theatre, the art of acting, but about ourselves as Americans, who have chosen, in our free leisure, these performances to witness, and by admiring them have presumably disclosed some of the things that in our heart of hearts we deem admirable. The task is not so easy as it looks; it is complicated by many elements, not the least being the fact that it is easily possible to admire things in art which we would not admire in real life. But it is interesting, and we may learn a little, at least, about ourselves.

First, what are some of these outstanding theatrical performances, known from coast to coast and taken to the popular bosom?

There was E. A. Sothern's "Lord Dundreary," first disclosed in New York in 1858, in a play by an Englishman, Tom Taylor, and called "Our American Cousin." Sothern built up the character from nothing at all, the leading part being that of Asa Trenchard, acted by Joseph Jefferson. Ultimately, the play became merely a frame for the eccentric Lord, and Sothern acted that rôle for the rest of his life.

There was Joseph Jefferson's "Rip Van Winkle," first disclosed in London in 1865, and acted by Jefferson almost until his death in 1905. Several actors had essayed this rôle before him, including James H. Hackett and Charles Burke, Jefferson's half-brother. But it remained for Jefferson, with the aid of Dion Boucicault, to make a play from the story which hung together, and to embody the character in such a way as to capture the popular imagination and affection.

There was Maude Adams's Lady Babbie in Barrie's play made from his novel, "The Little Minister." In the years when Miss Adams acted Babbie (and also Barrie's "Peter Pan," and Maggie in "What Every Woman Knows") she was the best loved and most popular actress on our stage. But she attempted many plays in which she failed. She never failed, however, as Babbie. She could be playing it still if she chose.

THERE was David Warfield's Anton von Barwig in "The Music Master." Warfield has now retired, a rich man, on his profits largely from this play. He could still go out in it from coast to coast and pack every theatre.

There was Frank Bacon's Lightnin', in his own play of that name, which held the long-run record in New York until the advent of "Abie's Irish Rose." When Bacon, an elderly actor who had spent most of his life in comparative obscurity, left Times Square to go on tour, a band escorted him down Broadway! His tour was a triumph, and would still be going on if his untimely death had not cut it short.

There is, today, the Old English of George Arliss, in Galsworthy's play of that name. Arliss may not elect to continue in this rôle another year, having carried it in triumph across the continent. But there is no doubt that if he chose he could play it as long as Warfield played "The Music Master." The American people have taken it to their bosoms.

This list, of course, might be considerably extended. There was, for example, Denman Thompson's Josh Whitcomb in "The Old Homestead," James A. Herne's Nat Berry in "Shore Acres," Edwin Booth's Hamlet, Billie Florence's Judge Bardwell Slote in "The Mighty Dollar," and William Chanfrau's Mose the Fireman, back in the days before the Civil War. If we omit Hamlet, a character which does not belong to the English race any more, but to the world, it is interesting to note that all these characters in our supplementary list are native American types, and have certain traits in common. That, as we shall see, is perhaps significant.

BUT let us take the six outstanding impersonations we have selected—Sothern's Dundreary, Joseph Jefferson's Rip Van Winkle, Maude Adams's Lady Babbie, David Warfield's Anton von Barwig, Frank Bacon's Lightnin' and Arliss's Old English. What have they in common? What element is there in all of them which has captured our admiration, and so, perhaps, disclosed something about ourselves? The characters differ widely, and so do the personalities of the players. There is as little in common between Dundreary and Old English as there is, in personality, between George Arliss and Maude Adams.

Well, one thing all six of these impersonations have, or had, in common—they were supremely efficient. That may mean more than it appears to at first reading. When a younger actress than Miss Adams two or three seasons ago revived "The Little Minister," she failed ignominiously; the public would have none of it. But when another younger actress, Helen Hayes, revived "What Every Woman Knows," she was acclaimed all over the land. She did it well; she got the real meat out of it. Every actor has a personality of his own, and to be popular this personality must be a winning one.

But personality is not enough for greatness or for abiding popular success. The actor must find a part which his personality can illumine, and then must have the artistic skill to weld the two together until no joints show, until there is a complete illusion of spontaneous life. In every one of the six famous impersonations we have named, the actor did just this—with consummate skill he (or she) made the happy marriage between the actor's natural personality and the character portrayed, so that on the stage this character actually came to life; it wasn't an acted fiction, it was a living person. That much, certainly, the six have in common. Their popularity surely represents the conscious or unconscious tribute we pay to perfection in art.

For the most part the tribute is, I think, unconscious. Few (Continued on page 96)

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Albert Davis Collection

JOSEPH JEFFERSON, the beloved actor, as Rip Van Winkle (above), a part he played for some forty years.

MAUDE ADAMS (in oval), as Lady Babbie, in "The Little Minister." In this and other Barrie plays, she became the most loved actress on the American stage.

C. H. Hayes & Co., Detroit

Albert Davis Collection

E. A. SOTHERN (above), as Lord Dundreary in "Our American Cousin." E. H. Sothern, the Shakespearean actor, is his son.

Wide World Studio

GEORGE ARLISS (above), as Old English, in Galsworthy's play of that name, a drama which the American people have taken to their bosoms. If he chooses to do so, Mr. Arliss can no doubt continue in this rôle indefinitely.

FRANK BACON (right) as Lightnin' in his own play of that name. Bacon had spent most of his life in obscurity before he created and acted this magic rôle. He might still be playing it but for his untimely death.

Albert Davis Collection

Brown Brothers

DAVID WARFIELD (left), as Anton von Barwig, in "The Music Master," a part he made famous, and in which he has reached the hearts of countless theatre-goers.

Photographs supplied by The Culver Service

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Photograph by Lewis Hine

Albert Edward Wiggam

MR. WIGGAM is widely known through his many magazine articles, his books, and his Lyceum and Chautauqua lectures. His specialty is translating the technical language of science into popular language. Two of his books, "The New Decalogue of Science," and "The Fruit of the Family Tree," have had extraordinarily large sales. Mr. Wiggam was born in Austin, Indiana, in 1871. Before he turned to writing and lecturing, he worked as a mine superintendent in Colorado. He now lives in New York City, and in Vernon, Indiana.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Five Rules For Rational Living

By Albert Edward Wiggam

WHEN I was a boy on the farm in southern Indiana, we had a hired hand, named Billy, who was always afraid that something would "knock him plum sensible." Since he was struck twice by lightning without any immediate visible improvement in his mental agility, I pretty nearly gave up my faith in education by concussion.

That was forty-five years ago. And while I wonder, Billy, if all the knocks and boosts, the criticism and praise, the miserable failures and moderate successes I have had since then, have really knocked me sensible, my belief in education by concussion has been bolstered up. We can get information and knowledge out of books, but it takes life to knock us sensible and teach us the true wisdom of rational living.

I doubt that the several dozen psychologies I see on my bookshelves, and the scores of biologies and other ologies I have studied have brought me any better rules of rational living than one or two, which you, Billy, in your simple-hearted fashion, gave to me in those far-away magical days of boyhood.

When you would try to teach me how to turn the mules at the end of the corn row, so as not to trample down the corn, or how to back them astride the wagon tongue for hitching, without getting the lines in a tangle, I would say, as a small boy naturally would, "I just can't do it." And you would always reply, "You mustn't say, 'I can't'; fust thing you know, you'll get yerself in the habit of can'tin'."

That's the first rule Billy taught me, and it has stuck by me to this day. In fact, this expression became a proverb in our family. And, after all, it is just about what Professor William James, the great Harvard psychologist, remarked in his famous chapter on habit. Only Professor James put Billy's maxim in a positive instead of a negative way, when he said, "Guard against the habit of failure and cultivate the habit of success."

I remember a boy who sat opposite me in school who perfectly illustrates this point. It was after my family had moved from the old farm at Deputy, Indiana, to Vernon, a few miles away. This lad was the most bashful boy in school. He would blush and his voice would tremble every time he was called up to recite. He thus got into the habit of failing, and it came near making him a failure at everything else.

But he was a wonder at machinery, and later on his father sent him to a technical school where he was graduated to become a fine mechanical engineer.

But with all his mechanical learning, he had got so into the habit of failing to express his personality that he rusticated on the old farm for two or three years, afraid to go up against a corporation president and ask for a job.

One day, however, a farm implement agent came along and persuaded this young man that he could go out and sell plows to local farmers. I have often wondered how he screwed up his courage to start; but it was a glorious day for him when he did. He sold three plows the first day. When his tongue got loose, he knew more about plows than any farmer. He had designed plows, built plows, thought plows, and dreamed plows.

By the second week he was going so strong that he went farther afield and sold plows to people he had never seen before. In a little while he was selling self-binders and threshing machines. If there had been dirigibles for farmers, he would doubtless have been selling them.

I saw that boy about three months after he had started out, and the change in him was truly astonishing. He had developed poise; there was a power and decisiveness in his voice and an improvement in his manner that was amazing. He could sit down and talk to you quietly and convincingly, and he had also grown much better-looking. As one of the neighbors said to me, he "sure looked a heap starchier."

Within a few years he was placed in charge of the foreign business of one of the great machinery companies, and has just completed an intensive inspection for his company of farm conditions throughout the countries of Europe.

This boy was not an unusual case. I can call to mind at least a dozen timid, bashful lads, afraid of themselves and everybody else, who went off to Indianapolis or California and became salesmen or public speakers or executives. I have seen the same thing happen to timid boys who stayed in the old town and county. They are now the leaders of their communities. And I can recall two or three that never turned a trick, but who, I am convinced, would have become well-known men if they had got hold of the right string in character building and pulled it as hard as these other boys did.

GOING back to this first young man, just what was it that happened to him?

It is evident that for the habit of failing he had substituted the habit of succeeding. That is to say, he had learned the art, not of selling plows but of selling himself.

Anybody can club the other fellow into doing something against his will; but true salesmanship, whether it be selling shoes or inducing your community to put up a new school building or, getting yourself elected to office, consists in compelling the other fellow to do something he doesn't want to do, and then making him glad that he did it.

We used to believe that we could "discipline" or "train" our minds as a whole. For instance, we believed that if we went through what we called "mental drill" in algebra or Latin or some other "cultural study," it strengthened or improved our minds in a general way, so that we could better solve the problems of the farm or store or machine shop. Modern psychologists have compelled us in the main to abandon this notion.

They believe that if we drill our minds on one subject, this exercise or training does not, to any great extent, transfer itself all through our brain and give us greater mental power for all sorts of problems. However, this theory applies more directly to what we call our intellectual habits, and happily these constitute only a small part of our whole mental life.

PROBABLY the biggest thing in your life —indeed almost all of your happiness— is bound up in what is called your moral or emotional or volitional traits and habits. These are such things as determination, stick-to-it-iveness, will-power, generosity, friendliness, courage, tactfulness, coöperativeness, and the like.

Now, the grand and fortunate thing is that if you train any one of these traits it is more likely than algebra or Latin to spread to other brain centers, and thus give you general strength of character. The reason for this is that the whole emotional tone is favorably affected, and creates a tendency to set up an ideal.

For instance, if you train a boy to admire a particular hero, or to meet the Boy Scout hardships with courage, you tend to set up inside of him a general idea of courage. You may not need your algebra or Latin twice in your whole life, but we need courage all the time. If you train yourself to make quick, energetic decisions, even about small matters, such as writing the overdue letter, or keeping a disagreeable engagement, or doing your daily dozen, you see yourself idealized as a decisive, energetic character. And the more you picture yourself as a person of strong character, the more you will want to measure up to it.

If you succeed in resisting the extra cup of coffee or cigar to-day, you have more strength to resist them to-morrow. Gradually you acquire the habit of succeeding at little things. Soon the habit of succeeding at little things broadens into the habit of succeeding at big things. And, with time, succeeding becomes your second nature and knits itself into your very being.

This is why it is (Continued on page 130)

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"After a man's been married six years, he doesn't look a compliment in the mouth;
he just swallows it, hook, line, and sinker!"

The Song At Midnight—

A story of Dot and Will and New Year's Eve

By Fannie Kilbourne

Illustrated by T. K. Hanna

NOBODY in Montrose knew exactly what it was that started the feud. Not even Mrs. Frank Kirsted and I, who had been right there when it began. Mrs. Kirsted and Dulcie Lane and I were all down on Rosemary Merton's porch, mending and keeping a weather eye on our various babies and children on the lawn and talking about how conceited husbands are, which, heaven knows, is a safe enough topic of conversation for a bunch of married girls.

We were giggling about the guileless way men, especially husbands, fall for every bit of flattery they hear.

"Goodness knows," said Dulcie, "I like flattery myself. But I don't believe it all!"

"Neither do I," said Mrs. Kirsted. "But men do. If a girl tells a man he's a good dancer, he thinks that she thinks he is a good dancer."

"Yes," said Rosie; "and when his wife tries to tell him, purely for his own good, that the way he jiggles up and down went out with the Boston, he just figures that she doesn't appreciate him, and goes right on thinking he's a regular Valentino and jiggling like the steering wheel of a flivver."

"Mercy," I said, "can't you remember when we were all in high school, how the married crowd used to look to us, at dances? The wives kidding themselves into thinking that nobody knew that their white crêpe de chine evening dresses were their wedding gowns going into the fourth year. And the husbands! Having a married man ask you to dance was just one faint shade better than having to sit it out. The most you could say for them was that they helped fill up the picture and make you look popular!"

We all laughed.

"Howard never picks a popular girl to ask," said Rosie. "He'll ask some wallflower, who's so glad to get a chance to dance at all that she'll say anything! He actually told me with pride that Girlie Whittaker said that the dance she had with him was the best one she'd had that whole evening. It was probably the only one she'd had that evening; but after a man's been married six years, he doesn't look a compliment in the mouth; he just swallows it, hook, line, and sinker."

We all laughed again. Everything was gay and friendly and confidential, the way it is when a bunch of girls who are really crazy about their husbands knock them a little, just for fun. No four human beings could have been further from a quarrel.

At that moment, we saw Frankie Kirsted, who, as a child, is a total loss, turning on the water in the hose—and as my twins were right in line with the nozzle, both Mrs. Kirsted and I rushed down to stop him. It takes quite a little while at best to persuade Frankie not to do anything he has decided to do, and then, to make sure, Mrs. Kirsted and I stopped to disconnect the hose and roll it up and put it out in the garage and lock the door. Altogether, though, it couldn't have taken us ten minutes. It may not have been more than five that Rosemary and Dulcie were left alone there on the porch.

Of course, if it had been Dulcie and Mrs. Kirsted what followed wouldn't have been surprising at all. They get along pretty well in a crowd, but leave them alone together at any time and ten minutes is plenty long enough for starting trouble. But Rose and Dulcie! Why, they've been friends ever since we were all in infant class. And though they might criticize each other once in a great while, like any other friends, they never really meant anything by it, and always did it behind each other's back. I would have sworn that neither one of them would have said anything to hurt the other's feelings for anything.

AND yet in that brief ten minutes, at most, something had been said or done. Both Mrs. Kirsted and I could feel it as we came up the steps. It was as unmistakable as a sudden fog. Rosie was as red as a fire box and Dulcie was white. And there wasn't one bit of pleasantness left. They were both being polite. Unpleasantly, icily polite.

Dulcie was gathering up her mending and getting ready to go home, though it was only half past three, and Rosie had said she had some lemonade in the ice box and was going to cut the sponge cake she'd made that morning. We had all planned to stay till five o'clock at least.

Dulcie said very formally that she'd forgotten that her mother was coming over that afternoon, and that she must get back right away. Rosie didn't say a word. She was very distrait and absent-minded after Dulcie had left; but though Mrs. Kirsted hinted and gave her every chance to tell what had happened, she didn't. It was a stiff, uncomfortable hour and a half for us all before we finally left.

I told Will about it at supper and he was quite interested. Men make me laugh, the way they love to pretend they're miles above petty gossip, and then fairly lap up any juicy bit that comes their way.

DULCIE came over the first thing the next morning, all primed to tell me about it. I knew what she had come for, of course, though she pretended it was only to borrow my vacuum, hers being on the blink because she never can remember to oil it. But Will was there. He was going to drive a prospect out to show the Chesterfield farm, and as they were leaving at half past nine he didn't bother to go down to the office.

Dulcie was quite taken aback to find him at home, drying the breakfast dishes for me. She stuck around for a few minutes, waiting to see if he wasn't going, but when he didn't seem to be she took the vacuum and went back.

Then I ran into Rosie in The Busy Bee that same morning when we were both doing our marketing, and she was on the very point of telling me. She'd got to the "Of course, you live right next door to Dulcie, but—" when Mrs. Kirsted came in and she stopped. I had got quite curious, naturally, but I figured I'd get it sooner or later so I didn't take to biting my finger nails with excitement while I waited.

Mrs. Kirsted was actually pathetic, she was so crazy to find out what had happened, and she didn't have any patience at all. She couldn't call me up about it, Dulcie and I being on the same wire, but she drove down late that afternoon and was nearly wild when she learned that I hadn't heard anything yet.

And by the time I got to see Dulcie alone, which wasn't till the next day, she'd evidently thought better of it, and decided not to tell me at all. I saw Rosie the day after that, and she didn't say anything about it, either, so I thought they'd probably made it up already. But I was wrong. And it was Mrs. Kirsted

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

In that brief ten minutes something had been said or done. Both Mrs. Kirsted and I could feel it as we came up the steps who told me about the next that happened.

"What do you think!" she gasped in The Busy Bee while our orders were being put up. "Their husbands are in it too!"

"They are!" I exclaimed, amazed. I knew, of course, that she meant Rosie's and Dulcie's husbands. When Mrs. Kirsted is interested in anything, she thinks and talks about it every waking instant.

"Yessir," Mrs. Kirsted said. "You know, Howard was making a bridge for Dulcie—it's a funny thing for a girl of her age to have to have a bridge in her mouth, isn't it?" (Mrs. Kirsted and Dulcie being the two prettiest girls in the young married crowd, either one just loves to see signs of decay in the other.) "And he'd taken the impression and was working on it. And now Dulcie isn't going to have him finish up the work; she's going to leave him and go to Doctor Griffin. Howard is furious about it, says he has the bridge practically done, and that Roger will have to pay for it whether Dulcie has it or not, and you know how close Roger is. He says he'll pay for no bridge that his wife doesn't have."

"MY SOUL!" I exclaimed. I could just see what trouble that would make. Both Howard Merton and Roger Lane have stubborn streaks when they get roused. It was very evident that the girls hadn't made it up.

I had decided to ask them both flat out what the trouble was, but I happened to mention it to Will and he said he wouldn't, if he were in my place.

"I wouldn't go getting mixed up in any neighborhood row if I were you," he said.

"Just knowing what the trouble is isn't getting mixed up in it," I said, "and it isn't any neighborhood row, anyway. At worst, it's just the Lanes and the Mertons."

"Well, if you're smart, you'll keep right out of it," said Will.

I admitted that there might be some truth in what he said, though if either of the girls had volunteered to tell me what had happened in that ten minutes I certainly wouldn't have stopped her. But neither of them did volunteer, and I controlled myself and didn't ask.

I don't think either of them told anybody else either but the news spread anyway. Dulcie had a little bridge party for Ruth's cousin, who was visiting Ruth, and she didn't invite Rosie. She asked Corinne of course. Then Corinne wanted to entertain for this same cousin, and she wanted to invite Rosie. Rosie said she wouldn't go if Dulcie was going to be there, so Corinne said all right, she wouldn't ask Dulcie. Which, of course, made Dulcie furious, she just having had Corinne at her party.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Dulcie told Ruth about it, and Ruth was very sympathetic, and said it was very bad taste of Corinne, that Corinne should have invited Dulcie and given her the chance to decline. It got to Corinne, of course, that Ruth had said she didn't have good taste, and Ruth said that anybody who had overstuffed furniture in her sun parlor, the way Corinne did, was a hot one to talk about taste. Which got back to Corinne, of course. So Corinne had a bigger bridge party than either of the others, and didn't ask either Ruth or Rosie.

This hurt Ruth's feelings terribly, because it looked so queer to her cousin. So she gave a luncheon for her cousin, and didn't ask hardly anybody who had been at Corinne's bridge. Some of the girls who had been at Corinne's didn't know what it was all about, so they felt that Ruth had snubbed them without rhyme or reason, and they said that Ruth's cousin's hair was dark at the roots.

I had never noticed that it was, and anyway, I'm naturally broad-minded. I say that if anybody is fool enough to think that bleached hair is pretty, let them bleach theirs.

It really did make things awkward, though. None of the girls knew what had originally started the trouble, but our whole crowd was getting split right in two. One half wouldn't go to the other half's parties.

IT WAS about this time that I had what I thought was an inspiration. I decided that, not having taken any sides, I would be the peace-maker. I decided to have a party for Ruth's cousin and ask everybody, just as if there wasn't any trouble at all. Both Rosemary and Dulcie, and Ruth and Corinne and all the girls who were just a little mad. I thought it would be a sweet, tactful way to make things up.

Of course I realized it might not work out well. That some of them might be stiff and formal, and that it might be a little difficult. But I decided to mix them up at the bridge tables just as though there'd never been any trouble at all, and trust to the fact they were all polite, and were, in spite of everything, all old friends, to carry things off. It did occur to me that I might possibly not be able to effect the peace as I hoped, or even that one half, finding that the other half had been invited, might not come.

WHAT actually did happen would never in the world have occurred to me. Each half found that the other half was invited, and neither half came!

I had invited twenty-four girls, bought the prizes for six tables, engaged Ella Crowninshield to come over from Verblen to serve the refreshments and everything. Ella had bought a new waitress' apron just for the occasion and, instead of just calling up the girls to ask them, I had sent out the cutest invitation cards, some I had bought when we were on our vacation in Chicago.

Of course I had asked Ruth and her cousin first of all, the cousin being guest of honor, and they had said they would come. Then the regrets began coming in. I never saw such thin alibis in my life. It was plain as a road sign why the girls were declining. There wasn't one good sound regret in the bunch. The only living soul who accepted was Girlie Whittaker, who lives out in the country, and probably hadn't heard about the row.

Moreover, Girlie is so unpopular that when she does get an invitation she fastens onto it with a death grip. I had just asked her because I was sorry for her, and because I felt so broad-minded that I thought the peace and good will I had planned for shouldn't balk even at Girlie.

Well, I was really in a very unpleasant situation. If I had only called up the girls as I had at first planned, it wouldn't have been so bad. I might have called up Ruth and smoothed it over some way, and the four of us could have had a game of bridge and a simple cup of tea, as

There was something queer and

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

though that were all there was meant to be to it. But I couldn't get away with that now. It will certainly be a lesson to me never to put anything in writing again.

Ruth had thought the invitation cards were so cute that she had shown hers to Miss Waters, who runs the social column of the Montrose "Monitor," and Miss Waters had put all about my party in the paper. She had called me up to ask me about it and had gone on in the paper in that playful way she has of writing, "A little bird has hinted to me that the decorations are going to be autumn leaves, and that there will be prizes unusual enough to tempt our young bridge experts to their cleverest game."

It was ghastly! There, with nobody but Ruth and her cousin and that awful Girlie Whittaker coming, I had to go right ahead and make it a regular party. I even had to trim the living-room with maple leaves, and I couldn't so much as call off Ella Crowninshield, on account of her having bought her apron. I hope never to feel like such a fool again.

The four of us, all dolled up in our best clothes, played bridge at one table with tally cards and candy wafers and a prize wrapped up in tissue paper and gold ribbon, and then Ella, dressed up like a parlor maid in a play, served elaborate party refreshments, salad and sandwiches and coffee and pistachio ice cream and little iced cakes and salted nuts.

WILL was perfectly disgusted with the whole affair.

"If that isn't just like a bunch of women!" he would say. "I'm glad I belong to a sex that's got some sense. How long would business go on if men made such monkeys of themselves!"

I called it to his attention that Roger Lane and Howard Merton weren't a bunch of women, and that they didn't seem to be on any too good terms.

"Mert's all right," said Will defensively. "All he's doing is holding out for getting paid for honest work he's done. And Roger'd be all right too, but Dulcie's got him under her thumb."

It was naturally something of a satisfaction to me after that, when slowly the men began to get mixed up in the row. I must give them the credit of doing their best to keep out of it. At the golf club and at church affairs or anywhere that both the factions naturally met, the husbands of the opposing lines made a great point of it.

They laughed more and louder than they would have naturally, and kept clapping each other on the back till they must have been black and blue. But in spite of all the "Hello-there-old-scout" stuff they could pull, there was a decided strain. And when two of them met with their wives, and the girls didn't speak, there was a certain sheepishness about the boys.

It made a nervous, unnatural atmosphere in which something was bound to happen. On account of the way men stick together and seldom tell things on each other, I never knew many of the details. But I noticed that the back-slapping became almost hysterical, and then, here and there, stopped suddenly.

Inside of a couple of months, Will couldn't be so superior about his sex. I admit that the men didn't get to the point of actually cutting each other, but so far as the truth of things went, they might just as well have. I wouldn't have believed that practically a whole town of old friends could suddenly have split into two sides that seemed actually to hate each other.

IT SIMPLY ruined what we had expected to be one of the gayest winters we had ever had. Almost everybody was doing well in a business way. It was good times. Howard Merton was getting a dandy start in his own dentist office. The new bond firm Roger Lane had gone in with was doing well, and Roger was making more in commissions than he'd ever dreamed he would when he left the bank. Real estate was going fine for Will.

Everything was looking up. We had expected to have a lot of informal parties, and have fun in our clubs, and have a generally happy, friendly, easy-going winter. And look at us!

Not that there wasn't plenty of social life. It was perfectly hectic. I never knew so many parties or such grand ones to be given. But they weren't nice, friendly parties (Continued on page 90) goose-fleshy in that waiting stillness

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You Can Work For Yourself While Working For Someone Else

By Neil M. Clark

THE vice president of the big bank seemed a rather crabbed individual, and the young man sitting opposite, not being in the habit of transacting business with officials, was greatly impressed, even awed. Not so much so, however, that he lost track of what he had come for. Of the facts which he was presenting, he was absolutely sure. He explained them patiently and precisely, and not one of the older man's numerous questions tripped him up. At last the latter relaxed a little in severity, and said:

"All right, young man, the statement seems to be correct. I'll accept the check. Here is your receipt."

The hard-bitten official appeared almost cordial as he signed and handed it over, and the young man, for his part, felt considerably elated. When he stepped outside he breathed with relief, and reflected:

"He's only human after all; I got along with him all right."

A rather startling idea burst into his mind on the heels of this reflection.

"Why," he thought, "it's possible for me to become the vice president of a big bank like that!"

The idea was a new one, and landed with such impact that the young man stopped to ponder it while the stream of traffic flowed all around him. Years later he was able to point out the exact spot where he had stood.

Now, there occurred a strange sequel to this little incident, a sequel partaking of the nature of things that people imagine in day-dreams, when they arrange their lives to suit themselves. For twenty years that young man did not set foot again in that bank; when he did, it was because the president had sent for him to ask him to accept a position as vice president!

That young man's name was Eugene Morgan Stevens. It was thirty years ago that he had his talk with the rather crabbed vice president, and ten years ago that he was invited to become a vice president of the bank; and early this year, on the fourth of February, 1927, he was elected its president.

The story of how it came to pass is one of the romances of opportunity that can happen to ordinary men in these United States. The position Eugene Stevens holds is of enormous importance in finance and business. The bank which he heads is the Illinois Merchants' Trust Company of Chicago, one of the ten largest banks in the country, with deposits close to four hundred million dollars. Yet when he started to work at his first job in a little Minnesota wagon factory forty years ago, he was just a country-town kid whose father was dead, and whose mother sometimes was forced to take in roomers and boarders to make both ends meet.

Mr. Stevens insists that there has been nothing spectacular in his career. In a sense, he's right. But in that fact lies part of the message and meaning of his story. How did an ordinary boy, whose schooling stopped early, land in such a big job? This was the question I asked him, and we sat and talked through the hours of an afternoon and of another morning, carefully reconstructing the steps and the reasons, in the hope of making clear that little and easily-understood things had more to do with his advance than special ability.

"I got a firm grasp of a few commonplace but fundamental ideas, and stuck to them," Mr. Stevens began; "and that is all I did.

"I early became convinced that a man can accomplish almost anything he wills to undertake. If I could implant the idea, in even a few discouraged breasts, that that is what counts most, I think it would be a bigger accomplishment than engineering some deal by which this bank would make a million dollars. We can always make money; and I do not mean that the making of money is a cheap job, to be despised. But the making of men, getting them to do their best with the talents they have, is, to my mind, the biggest job in the world. If I am sure of one thing, it is that the way to great accomplishment lies open to virtually all who will learn and do the necessary things."

BLANK & STOLLER

Eugene Morgan Stevens is president of the Illinois Merchants' Trust Company, one of the ten biggest banks in the United States. He was born in Preston, Minnesota, in 1871, and began work when a youngster in a wagon factory. He was elected to his present position early in 1927

THOUGHTFULLY, earnestly, Mr. Stevens tried to outline those necessary things for the readers of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, illustrating his points with references to his own experience and knowledge. The atmosphere of his office is not that of speed or huge deals. Big, straight, husky, he is; gray-haired, dark-eyed, with an Irish tilt to his nose; unhurried, friendly. "His responsibilities sit lightly on him," his friends say. He likes people, and is liked. His interests are numerous. He is a director in a number of large companies. Music is a delight to him;

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

as a boy he played several instruments and sang, and later was a founder and for years a director of the Minneapolis Orchestral Association. Though not college-trained, he is a member of the Board of Trustees and treasurer of the University of Chicago. He is an avid reader. From youth he has found recreation out of doors, and until a very few years ago he was a baseball player of ability. Not infrequently he goes for a week or so to some cabin in the remote woods, where he lives "on his own" in old clothes, with, perhaps, a fishing rod, or a pack on his back.

The outline facts of his life are neither numerous nor complicated.

"I was born," he told me, "in Preston, southeastern Minnesota, in 1871. Our home town was Rushford, in the same county, and we returned there a year later, after my father had finished serving a term as county treasurer.

"My father was half-owner of a wagon manufacturing establishment. When I was seven years old, the factory burned down during his absence on a business trip, and it just happened that the insurance had expired and his partner had neglected to renew it. Most of his fortune, which was a comfortable one, went up in that blaze.

"NO DOUBT he could have reëstablished himself, and he was well on the way to do so when he contracted a cold which developed into pneumonia. The illness proved fatal. He had not yet recovered financially from his fire, therefore my mother was left with nothing except a little insurance money, and with four children, ranging from four to twelve years of age. I was eight.

"I suppose I was about twelve when I began to comprehend how hard a task my mother had bringing us up and keeping us in school until we got fairly well along. So I undertook to do what I could by working summers and at holiday times around stores and at odd jobs. During the summer of my fifteenth year I worked in the office of the wagon factory that my father had started to build when he died; and that fall, when it was time to go back to school, the company asked me to stay. My mother was opposed to it, but I persuaded her to let me do it. I was paid twenty dollars a month, and for that I was janitor, office boy, errand boy, and odd-job man. I washed windows, opened mail, built the fires, carried out ashes, licked stamps, filed letters, and did many other tasks."

Stevens stayed with this company for five years, advancing to a job as bookkeeper and a salary of forty-five dollars a month. It was a small concern, not overly prosperous, and his prospects were none too bright.

"I was twenty," he continued, "when I went to Minneapolis for a vacation trip. I had no special intention of looking for work there; but on the street I met a chap I had known in Winona.

"'Why don't you get a job in Minneapolis?' he asked. 'There's nothing ahead of you where you are.'

"I agreed with him there.

"He went on to say that late in the summer, about harvest time, the big grain companies would be hiring additional help, and probably I could get work with one of them. Following the suggestion, I applied to two of the largest of these firms, F. H. Peavey and Company, and another, asking to be taken on as a bookkeeper. They assured me my application would be filed, and if an opening occurred, they would let me know. I considered it a polite turn-down, and expected nothing to come of it.

"One week later, however, I received a letter from F. H. Peavey and Company, offering me a position at seventy-five dollars a month, and asking me to wire at once if I would accept.

"I immediately wired my acceptance.

How Long Has It Been Since You Learned Something New?

"YOU cannot expect to advance," says Mr. Stevens, "unless you are mentally alert. You must be learning something new all the time. I always made it a practice, and found it profitable, to learn all I could about the jobs ahead of mine; I wanted to know why those jobs existed, and what was required of the men who filled them. This form of study kept me mentally prepared for a step upward. Every man, I think, should ask himself once in a while, 'How long has it been since I last learned a new thing?'"

"My new employer, Mr. Peavey, exercised a profound influence on me in a number of directions."

F. H. Peavey and Company at that time was the largest grain handling firm in the country. Within a year, Stevens was promoted, becoming Mr. Peavey's confidential bookkeeper, and later his general auditor.

STEVENS had excellent prospects with Mr. Peavey, but had always felt a liking for banking and finance, and knew he would not be entirely happy until he went into business for himself. When he was thirty, therefore, and with no capital except one thousand dollars of borrowed money (for he had been helping support his mother), he left Mr. Peavey and established a company under his own name, dealing in commercial paper and bonds. This, in the next dozen and a half years, grew into the largest of its kind in Minneapolis, and he laid the foundation of a modest fortune. He continued in the business until he was forty-six years old.

Then, at an age when most men are content to consider themselves settled in their niche, he took the radical step of giving up his own business, and, largely with a boyish desire of seeing whether he had the stuff in him to "play in the big league," accepted a vice presidency in what was known then as the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, of Chicago. Within a few years this bank was merged with two others to form the present great Illinois Merchants' Trust Company, and Mr. Stevens, who handled most of the details of the merger, was first made executive vice president of the new institution, and three years later was elected president.

That, briefly, is an outline of the facts. Behind them, of course, lies the significant factors that enabled "Gene" Stevens, the country-town boy, to become the head of a bank dealing in hundreds of millions. Those factors Mr. Stevens undertook to analyze.

"I think it is possible," he said, "to outline a definite program of accomplishment. The main difficulty with such a program is bound to be that it seems too simple. I was talking once with a young man about his advancement, and mentioned accuracy, an acquired habit which played a bigger part than I can easily explain in my own promotions.

"'Yes, Mr. Stevens,' he said, with a wise smile, 'but what is the real dope?'

"THE 'real dope' is made up of simple things. I am satisfied these are the essentials of such a program as I mentioned:

1. The question of a goal
2. Confidence, or self-belief
3. Determination
4. An understanding of the differences between "how" and "why"
5. Accuracy
6. Attitude of mind
7. Physical preparedness
8. Mental preparedness, alertness, keeping out of ruts
9. The habit of work
10. A sense of dignity, of responsibility
11. Patience
12. The understanding of life and its problems that matures with sympathetic effort.

"The question of a goal is essential, because it helps a man with the decisions he must make, day in and day out. It is a sort of measuring stick. 'Does this lead toward my goal?' he asks. If so, the decision is yes; if not, no! Without a goal, he is adrift in a sea of indecision.

"My own early goal was not a particular job, rather it was a field of work to which I was attracted, and an ideal. I early made up my mind that when I was fifty years old I was going to be somebody, and occupy some position of importance. That was my ideal. I did not pick a particular job—jobs change anyway, while fields of endeavor remain pretty constant—but I did have a bent for finance. I remember how, when very young, I used to find peculiar fascination in 'playing bank,' cutting out paper 'money' for the game. Merely going into a bank gave me a sensation of adventure; in much the same way, I imagine, as pirate ships locomotives, fire engines, and other things gave a similar sensation to other boys. As I grew older, I felt pretty certain that I wanted to (Continued on page 126)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Haven't You Felt That Mystic Lure About A Bridge?

By Archibald Rutledge

ONE day, on a stone bridge, the high arches of which sprang gracefully over a wide creek, I met a tramp. After a few sly and circumspective surveys of each other, we spoke greetings, and straightway fell into a conversation. His first words amazed me, coming as they did from as forlorn a figure as my pity ever beheld.

"I love the beauty of this bridge," he said; "I cross it twice a year, and have done so for nine years. I always stop here. I can't cross a bridge without stopping. I used to know what beauty is, and my feeling for it comes back as soon as I get on this bridge. Many is the time I've watched the sunset burn in the water here, and fade."

I asked him to tell me about his life, but he was reticent. Indeed, we did not become better acquainted than his first speech had made us. And had I met him on the highway, he probably would never have spoken to me as he did. A bridge has a way of tempting the heart to utter itself. Lovers know this. Countless courtships have been begun and consummated on bridges; countless pledges made; quarrels made up; lives planned. A bridge is a place of union, of communion; seeming to unite only two parts of the earth, it often helps to perform the marriage of souls.

I walked at daylight one morning in early April to an ancient bridge spanning a broad creek about two miles from home. I did not meet a soul on the way; the road was really a country lane, overhung with blackberry. In the young wheat beside the road, upland plover, busy with their plans for nesting, gazed at me with shy, effacing alertness. From the very tip of a towering oak a brown thrasher, probably second only to the mockingbird as an American grand opera singer, poured forth heavenly melodies.

Reaching the bridge, I sat on one of the massive old copings and looked down at the water; then through the glimmering trees through which the dawn was fast brightening. Far off I heard a farmer calling to the team that he had begun to drive afield for plowing. A bobwhite whistled from a stretch of green meadow. The veiled and silent modesty of night gave place to the dazzling azure beauty of the day.

LOOKING down at the water and noticing with what patient insistence it finally found its way through grass-grown channels and past obstructing rocks, I thought, "Here the stream is victor over its own difficulties." And then it came to me that the only real victories we know in this world are those over our own weakness. To win over one we love, or merely esteem, is ever a sad victory. Indeed, to achieve any advantage at the expense of any other human being is, in a sense, to frustrate the heart.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

We win when we master ourselves; often, when we master others, we lose.

Again I thought, looking at the tireless stream, there's a power in gentleness that is formidable; a power that we hardly dream of when we are young. And again, life often offers us the choice between the possession of power and the possession of joy. It is not often that the mighty can enjoy peace of heart.

Such were some of the random thoughts that came to me on that sequestered bridge. Perhaps they are worth nothing; but they did shape themselves there, and on my long walk homeward through the sunlit morning I could think of nothing more inspiring than possible methods of meeting some accounts long past due!

WITH bridges we may rightly associate not only quiet reflection but also much of the pathos and the heroism of life. I think of the talented Eustace Budgell, who, after the death of his cousin and intimate companion, Addison, plunged from London Bridge to try to end his sorrow.

But better I like to think of the desperate fealties wrought at bridges: of Horatius, Herminius, and Lartius, on the narrow bridge before Rome, holding at bay the entire Tuscan army until the city fathers could hew down the bridge, and thus save from capture and sack the Eternal City. I like to think of the young Napoleon at the bridge of Arcola, standard in hand, leading his troops against an enemy powerful and intrenched. And I never stand on Burnside's Bridge, on the field of Antietam, without honoring in my heart the gallantry wrought at that fatal place by both the Blue and the Gray.

Yet perhaps in even a loftier sense a bridge represents the heroic; for the building of it may represent the projection, in palpable form, of some human dream. I never look upon some majestic span without thinking of the conceiver and the builder. It was necessary for him to imagine like a Titan.

Perhaps a man cannot leave a more graphic symbol of his own spirit than a splendid bridge, beautifully fancied and nobly executed. Such a bridge is nothing less than a tremendous vision, brought from conjecture to reality, stalwart now in the placid, solemn strength of stone.

BENEATH some bridges there is a world entirely different from the world above them. I know of an old wooden bridge beneath which I have spent many a curious and happy hour, observing the quaint life visible there. This bridge is perhaps ninety years old; it takes a country road over a trout stream; and so well was it built that the original hewn runners are still sound. It is only about thirty feet long and fifteen feet wide. Beneath it, between the piers and the brook, there are sandy slopes, on which particles of mica gleam and wet pebbles shine. Through cracks in the bridge the sunlight sifts down with dim radiance. Here is a tiny dream world sheltered inviolate for nearly a hundred years.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

One day under this bridge I saw a phœbe bird begin her nest, plastering a bit of mud against one of the monstrous old beams. Then came lichens, then tiny rootlets and skeletonized leaves. Delicately, in this secret place, she wove her fairy bassinet for the little princes of the woodland that were soon to be hers. The phœbe is one of the most noiseless of birds; but in this home-building she was in an ecstasy of delight. I could see her tremulous joy reflected in the clear water. In the deep pool beneath the bridge I could clearly see a dozen brook trout, some of them of fine size. Occasionally they would warily venture as far as the broad strip of sunlight beyond the bridge's shadow. But it was apparent that this cloistered green silence was home, and the region beyond the shelter of the bridge was foreign country. While watching the trout, I noticed a ripple washing up among the grasses. Then a brown form appeared, with eyes like shoe buttons, with tiny feet that paused, shadow soft, on the grass. Limpid as drops of spring rain the water fell from his coat. He did not see me. But he had seen an enemy. In the meadow below the bridge I saw a spaniel prowling about. Here was a muskrat, come under the bridge for sanctuary. He turned to watch the dog. His black nose twitched uncertainly. Then into the friendly water he stole, glided swiftly into midstream, humped a brown back, and was gone into that netherland that lies beneath all water.

Under almost any bridge, I think, there will be found a quaint community.

IN OUR daily life we are constantly referring to bridges; we say that we must not cross them before we reach them; we declare that we have burned our bridges behind us; and we say that if we stay on the bridge, we shall cross the river. Though we may believe ourselves intensely practical, we think in terms of poetry. The efficiency expert and the statistician in us will, at unguarded moments, make way for the poet. The symbol of a bridge satisfies the astral demands of our imaginations. Nor does a bridge ever seem to fail to awaken fancy. I remember riding one day on a train behind a very tired and stolid family. It consisted of that sad alliance—a man and his wife who seem to have nothing to say to each other. I had been feeling sentimentally sorry for them, when suddenly the train, apparently lying almost on her side and taking a curve at cyclone speed, brought us within sight of a bridge, a superb structure spanning the broad, rambling waters of the Susquehanna. All three of us were electrified.

(Above) One of the many beautiful scenes along the Columbia River Highway—a picture taken in California. (Right) A bridge in Barcelona, Spain

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Oh, a bridge! a bridge!" the woman cried delightedly, seizing her husband's arm. "Isn't it romantic?"

It does not appear to be in man's nature always to make the adequately graceful response to the appeals of romance, especially if it has to be made in public; but this gentleman did rather well. I saw the lines on his face soften; the hard stock-market keenness gave place to something better in his gray eyes. The bridge and the woman humanized him; the combination was irresistible.

Not far from home there is a covered bridge that belongs to the days of covered wagons. This structure has not only served to convey travelers safely across treacherous waters but also has sheltered those who have been overtaken by storms. Generations of passengers have here waited until storms passed. Here, on hot summer days, farmers have rested and cooled their horses. On the ancient wooden sides of the bridge are cut innumerable initials; and there are inscriptions that antedate the Civil War. Here and there a sentiment is expressed that is worth remembering. I copied these: "If you live true, you will love true." "The greatest good fortune that can befall us is to be kind to others." "God was great to make us as He did; He is greater to forgive us as we are." "What we think of others, not what they think of us, makes us happy or unhappy."

One might imagine that a religious convention had been held on this old bridge. But it is not so. It is just that a bridge has the mystic capacity to tempt the human mind to express itself with its native ingenuous conviction. (The End)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Nowhere In Particular

Allen and Breck and Click revolt against teachers, parents, work—and girls

By HOWARD BRUBAKER

ILLUSTRATED BY WORTH BREHM

ON THE third attempt, Allen succeeded in letting himself out the back-yard gate without also letting out a disappointed little dog named Zip. Another thing Allen left penned up in the back yard was a vicious, boy-killing lawn mower. Zip whined piteously, but Allen was going "nowhere in particular" and that, if one knew all, was no place for dogs.

By an alley route which did not lead past home and mother, Allen reached Forest Street. Here the cement walk, unlike common Pequot sidewalks, was laid in small black and white squares, like a crossword puzzle. By putting a right foot on a left-hand square and then crossing the left foot over to a right-hand square, and swinging the arms and wagging the head helpfully from side to side, one could make perceptible progress. It was not as efficient a way of getting on in the world as that devised by nature; but it was far more entertaining.

An ignorant person, seeing Allen Lansford at this cheap and harmless diversion, might have thought that this was a chubby ten-year-old boy with his cap turned the wrong way, on a May Saturday morning, a care-free lad without a grievance, content to frivol away the passing hour in giddy pleasure.

In fact, just such an ignorant person, Milt Harmon, driving along at this moment in a truck lettered, "Eat Grandma's Bread," called out:

"Hey, Al, what do you think you're doin'? The Charleston?"

Allen replied by climbing onto the back of the bakery truck, and thus traveled quickly and fragrantly to the home of Breckinridge Jones, who was discovered raking leaves.

"Hello, B.," said Allen.

"Hello, A. Where you goin'?"

"Nowhere in partic'lar."

"I can't go. I gotta rake the blame ol' yard!"

"Can't you take a look at a person?" Allen demanded. "What's the matter, are you blind or what?"

Breck took, as requested, a look. His gaze came to rest upon the cap with its visor turned toward the back of Allen's neck. This discovery made a vast difference in Breck's attitude toward life.

"Oh, well then," he said. Glancing inquiringly at the Jones mansion, he dropped the rake inside the fence, and reversed his own cap.

"A. Y. S.," he said, which, in the language of the tribe, meant, "At your service." The two boys walked purposefully up the street, without fancy steps, but rather like people who were going somewhere. A few blocks brought them to the home of Clinton Smedlay, vulgarly known as "Click."

Click was not visible to the naked eye; but a special kind of halloo, wrongly supposed to be inaudible to outsiders, brought a reply in kind from the Smedlay barn. There the boys found Click engaged in his favorite pastime of making a "do-funny," otherwise a mechanical contrivance without meaning or purpose, a thing of strings, wires, spools, and odds and ends of hardware jarred from passing motor cars. Click was a tow-headed boy with a fair skin which showed grease easily.

"Hello, C," said Allen.

"Hello, C," said Breck.

Click helloed "A" and "B," dutifully. When this ceremony was finished, the inventor inquired, "Where you goin'?"

"Nowhere in partic'lar."

"Oh, le's don't go there, Al," Click protested. "Le's stay here and have some fun. I got a catsy idea. You take a box and two tin cans and—and— What's the matter?"

Click suddenly became aware that his guests were eying him in a curious manner and nudging each other. He finally observed their heads.

"Oh, I get you. Who is it—you, Al?"

"I'll say it's me!"

After hunting among his belongings, Click unearthed a cap. This he carefully put on his head in the conventional way, and then reversed.

"A. Y. S.," he proclaimed solemnly.

The triumvirate now set forth upon their mysterious mission.

"Speedy Six," remarked Click, indicating a passing car. "Pretty good little boat, all right."

Zip whined piteously, but Allen was going "nowhere in partic'lar" and that, if one knew all, was no place for dogs

"It's not as good as a Eureka," Breck argued.

"Go on! That bunch of junk!"

They quarreled cheerfully about this matter. They quarreled for two blocks on Governor Street, then turned by Rickhill's house and quarreled up the alley.

"Oh, for goo'ness sake, keep still!"

THIS carping criticism came over in a peevish, feminine voice, and none was surprised to find that it issued from little Tilly Rickhill, whose fat face now arose like a full moon over the high board fence. Tilly stuck a finger in one ear to shut out the hullabaloo, but she could not plug up the other ear because the remaining hand was occupied with something important; namely, a piece of pie.

"Hey, Till, give us a bite," Breck implored.

Tilly gave herself a bite instead, and replied in a singsong voice:

"Where you goin'?"

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Nowhere in partic'lar," Allen replied. When made to a rank outsider this response always passed as wit, and a good time was had by the three musketeers.

"Let me go along," begged Tilly. She held her pie, obviously rhubarb and juicy, half way to her open mouth, at once a bribe and a threat. Breck looked appealingly at the manager of the expedition; but Allen was firm.

"Aw, girls can't go where we're goin'."

"Where we're goin'," added Click, "a girl would be lucky if they got out alive."

Tilly swallowed her disappointment and pie simultaneously, and the incident seemed closed.

"What's the idea of wearing your caps the wrong way?" she said. "Are you dippy, or what?"

Three rousing jeers were her only answer; but as the boys moved on there fell among them an insulting object, which proved to be a turnip. It was not an up-to-date turnip, but last year's model; if it had been anything edible, Tilly would never have thrown it away. Breckinridge Jones hurled the object back into the Rickhill yard.

"Always stuffin' herself with food," said Breck bitterly. "All she does is eat, eat, eat. She's too fat, anyway. . . . Um-m-m, that smells good!"

All noses sniffed in appreciation, for Breck had uttered a profound truth. The trio had entered the aromatic zone of "Grandma's Home Bakery," the place where Grandma Reisner made bread, rolls, cookies, and crullers.

"Got any dough, Click?" asked the suffering Breck.

Click chose to turn the matter into an untimely jest. He had not forgiven Breck for his outrageous views upon Eurekas and Speedy Sixes.

"No, but I know where they is some."

"Where?"

"Grandma Reisner's bakery. She's got plenty dough."

There was a streak of cruelty in Click's nature.

The subject was distasteful to Allen Lansford, for reasons which he would reveal at the proper time.

"Quit talking about food. I got something more important to think about than eating!"

He now approached a fence constructed of up and down boards. One of these contained a knothole of unusual design. Allen put his hand upon this and went through a ritual of counting boards—"one, two, | three, four, five." At the fifth he stopped, and commanded: "On guard!"

Breck and Click turned their backs upon him, shielded their eyes with their hands and gazed intently along the alley, one in each direction.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"O. K.," murmured Breck.

"O. K.," echoed Click.

Allen took hold of the bottom of the chosen board and swung it outward. The three quickly crowded through the opening and let the board fall back to its normal place. Click, the last through, turned a button that locked the door on the civilized world.

THE boys were now at the frontier of a vast, or somewhat vast, region of abandoned barns and buggy sheds, a delightful maze of alleys, back yards, wood-houses and chicken runs. This territory was a memorial to the departed horse. As people gave up their family carriages, they deserted these ramshackle structures and built neat little garages near their houses.

Wildman's wagon hub factory, never flourishing, had given up the struggle against progress and died insolvent. The whole region was a blot on the fair face of Pequot, and men of property spoke vaguely of tearing everything down before the fire-trap buildings caught fire and endangered their homes. It was now a no-man's land, a boy oasis in an adult desert.

Allen Lansford, his mind inflamed by romantic fiction, had invested this country with a glamorous air of unreality. For him it was a place of secret passages, lurking dangers, high adventure, and possibly crime.

If Allen had never been positively forbidden to visit this evil resort, it was probably because the matter had never been brought to his parents' attention. Concealment seemed the wisest course, and once, when asked where he had been, he replied, with his ready gift for words, "Oh, nowhere in particular." To the three boys who shared it, the phrase, which started as a happy thought, became a private joke, a rallying cry, and finally something like a post-office address.

Through this jungle they now advanced by a remarkable method of Allen's contrivance, abetted by Click's mechanical genius. If Allen was the playwright, Click was the stage carpenter, for it was a concealed wire of his contrivance which now unlatched a door which let the three into the great dim, musty old livery barn. They silently climbed a ladder, burrowed through a tunnel of hay, crawled from an upper window to a shed roof and dropped into another barnyard.

Every time they arrived in the open air they protected their movements with advance scout and rear guard. Once they took a useless side trip to throw off possible pursuers, and when crossing a stretch of soft ground, they walked backward to make their footprints deceptive. By such devious processes they finally arrived at the home of the deceased hub factory, the back yard of which still contained piles of fourth-rate lumber, where persons with a mind for frivolity could play hide and seek.

THE shop itself, the fatuous Mr. Wildman believed, was securely locked. This was a happy circumstance, the boys felt, because it gave the owner a false sense of security, and because it kept out of the hub factory low characters who had no business there. As a matter of esoteric knowledge, the third basement window east of the nail keg had a broken catch.

Once more came the ritual: "On guard!" . . . "O. K." . . . "O. K." Allen raised the window, they crawled through and let it down. They were now nearing their goal. They had not chosen the easiest way to Old Man Wildman's hub factory, but it was the most complicated, adventurous, and secretive trail. No parent, teacher, or bloodhound could have followed them. It was another merit of this route that it did not lead past the sign on the Oak Street side of the factory, "Trespassing Forbidden Under Penalty of the Law."

Three burly ruffians glowered down upon her. "If you don't do it," cried Breck, maddened by the pangs of hunger, "we'll kidnap you away"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

While his companions crossed their hearts and hoped to die if they ever revealed his secret, Allen was concocting the secret

The universal dirtiness of the windows of the old shop formed a screen against the prying eyes of Pequot. The light was dim, yet not dim enough for those of exacting tastes. Raising a trap door, the boys went down a flight of steps into the extinct engine-room, thence into the ex-coal bin. What it was now was indicated in small penciled letters on the door, in the hand of Allen Lansford:

"A. B. C. Club. Nowhere, Particular."

This was an escape from the nerve-racking life of Pequot, and a refuge for male persons who found home conditions intolerable. It was not clean enough to make anyone feel ill at ease; it was so dark that it was necessary to light a smelly oil lantern. Upon the floor was a piece of rag carpet, upon which one could lie and raise the feet to any height desired.

There were art objects upon the wall clipped from comic supplements, and literary treasures in a wooden box, also games. The club-room contained everything the heart could wish, and none of those "do's" and "don'ts" which are the curse of family life.

Above all, it was a spot where souls could be unburdened.

ALTHOUGH the rules of the organization were not burdensome, there was one supreme obligation. If any one of the three members appeared in public with his cap turned the wrong way, it was a sign that he was in trouble. The others must acknowledge this distress signal, and repair to the clubhouse for conference. Allen had called this meeting, and his fellows had loyally dropped their rakes and do-funnies to hear his mournful tale.

"Well, Al?" said Breck inquiringly, "the gang's all here."

Allen at this point was stricken with an ailment familiar to playwrights on opening nights. The best he could produce at the moment was a dry, unconvincing cough.

"Wha's the matter with you?" asked Breck, even more pointedly.

The elaborate hocus-pocus of mystery and suspense, the conspiratorial darkness of the den, the lantern on the floor lighting the three faces from below, all demanded thrilling drama; and Allen felt that he had nothing to offer but shoddy goods.

"Wha's the big idea?" asked Breck, for the third time. "Making people leave their work and ever'thing."

The answer came not from Allen, but from Click.

"It's the bunk," he said frankly. The inventor rested (Continued on page 119)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Little Land That Gave Us The Year One

By Irving Bacheller

PUBLISHERS' PHOTO SERVICE

(Above) The Via Dolorosa, or Way of Pain. A street in Jerusalem, leading from the Mount of Olives to Golgotha, through which Jesus is thought to have passed to his crucifixion. (At right) A bird's-eye view of Bethlehem

PUBLISHERS' PHOTO SERVICE

PALESTINE is a poor country. It has given little to the world save its noblest Personality, and traditions, and a great race. But to the student it is filled with immeasurable riches. I have seen the lifted dust of thousands of years lay bare a part of the ancient wall of David. I have seen, buried in the rubbish, missiles flung into the city by the engines of Titus.

In Palestine, as nowhere else, one may look down across the ages to the beginning of the modern world. Traversing its plains and deserts, one will behold the very life that Jesus looked upon. One will see the husbandmen tilling as they tilled in the time of Solomon, the shepherds tending their flocks as they did the night that Jesus was born, the wandering tribes preying upon each other as they were wont to do when Herod the Great was king. Their minds are still filled with the darkness of the ancient time; their prejudice and superstition may be quickly kindled into consuming fire as it was when Jesus and His band of followers came up to Jerusalem for the last time. There, too, is the same bitter, hopeless poverty that touched the heart of the Redeemer. But a tyranny and oppression more cruel and irremediable than that of Tiberius Cæsar has its iron hand on the necks of most of these people—holding them in ignorance, and teaching murder, hatred, and all uncharitableness. It would seem as if God, as an object lesson to the world, had checked the drama of life in Palestine and held it in the shadow of that tragic day when the earth trembled, and the veil of the Temple was rent in twain.

Now, the chief thing that Christ taught was progress—that man's moral and intellectual nature is in error when it is stationary—that it should ever be moving onward and putting away childish things; that the truth of God for which the mind of man should be forever seeking may be learned only in part. All that He professed to be able to do was to show us "the way" in which truth and understanding—the more abundant life—were to be found.

In Palestine we see those who for one reason or another have not followed in His way. They have stood still. They are like dead limbs on a tree. It is probably true that they are poorer, unhappier, and more ignorant than they were even in the time of Cæsar Augustus. While I was there, two years ago, Jerusalem was still depending on the mercy of heaven for its water supply.

The fact is that Palestine has undergone a vast change for the worse. The shadow of death which fell upon it after the army of Titus had finished its work has not been lifted. Desolation and decay covers the land. The hills and mountains have been stripped of their verdure. The groves and gardens of the ancient time are gone. One finds scarcely a trace of the palaces and villas and of the Greek art which adorned the cities of Galilee.

The arches and columns of the great synagogue at Capernaum wherein our Lord, it is thought, began His ministry lie in tumbled, broken masses near the shore of Lake Galilee, all that is left of the splendor of the beautiful city by the lake. How was it possible, one asks, that a structure as substantial as these sculptured rocks could have been so shaken to pieces. No earthquake of which there is any record could account for it.

The truth is that after the siege of Jerusalem there were only a few of the old faith left to worship in it and keep it in repair, and they were impoverished and broken in health and spirit. The men of

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

PUBLISHERS' PHOTO SERVICE

substance were dead or banished. Grass had doubtless begun to grow in the streets of Capernaum before the great siege conducted by Titus ended. Its shops and villas and palaces became the prey of the Romans, of caravans and wandering tribes. No doubt the cavalry sheltered its horses and cattle in the synagogue, and the deserted, half-ruined buildings of the city and the spacious holy place became later on a vantage point and a camp for contending armies.

It may be, too, that Time had the help of the professional spoiler, with his ram and catapult, in destroying the cities of Galilee.

ONE may still find beauty in Palestine. But it is the beauty which careless hands cannot destroy. The lake of Galilee is as blue as when Peter fished in it, although stately palaces and villas and lovely groves and lawns are no longer mirrored on its surface. I came down through the Vale of Sharon on a dirt road between flowery meadows and fields of waving grain, fair to look upon. They spanned the broad vale from the sand dunes of the sea to the bare hills. Thrifty Jewish farmers have reclaimed this stretch of fertile land. The smile of plenty is upon its face.

Beyond the rim of the basin wherein is the little village of Nazareth I saw a part of the beauty which fed the eager soul of the boy Jesus. There, as he played with his fellows, he would have seen the lovely, historic plain of Esdraelon stretching far westward to the sea. There he saw the lilies that neither toil nor spin.

Such a plenteous and colorful display of wild flowers as covered the slopes of Esdraelon and Hauran those April days of my journey I have never seen elsewhere. There were different levels of color—a low level of red blood drops, a higher level of red poppies and, topping these, an abundant flower of heavenly blue. Among them was a scatter of white and yellow petals, and here and there a tower of pink hollyhocks.

As the beautiful lad was playing on the slope of that hill He would have seen, at one time or another, the merchant caravans from Damascus bound for Egypt, the Roman legions and nobles coming up from the sea; the camel trains, which had crossed the fords of the Jordan from the east. He would have seen the snowy heights in the north and the far range of Gilead.

In all the world there was no place so fit for the youth of the Divine Messenger. In a measure it accounts for His vision and the exquisite poetry in many of His stories and sayings.

PUBLISHERS' PHOTO SERVICE

(At top of page) "And there were . . . shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night." A sight as common in Palestine today as in the time of Jesus, and unchanged from that day to this. (Below) A street in Nazareth

THE desolation, the oppression, the ignorance, the filth, the poverty in Palestine have naturally had a serious effect on its people. The spirit of the ancient time is there. The city wall of Jerusalem has no longer the splendid towers of old, but it is still a majestic thing. Like the whiskers, the long hair, and the ancient style of dress, it expresses the conservatism of the Semitic race. The Jews who have clung to the city of their fathers go on certain days to an ancient part of the wall and kiss its stones, worn by the touch of their lips, and weep and pray aloud for the return of the departed glory of their race. It is called the wailing place. Their pathetic cries are the voice of a ruined nation. Indeed one cannot soon forget the voices of Jerusalem.

There is no such index of one's spiritual condition as the voice. In the city of the great kings one hears mostly the voice of want, for there the wolf is at many doors. Beggars and peddlers on every hand solicit the stranger with the clamor of greed. In the streets are the ass and camel drivers, their beasts cruelly loaded. Almost everywhere one hears the song of the lash ending in a swat. Voices of anger and of rage often rise above the others. A friendly argument between natives, as to the value of a

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

PUBLISHERS' PHOTO SERVICE

PUBLISHERS' PHOTO SERVICE

(Above) The Damascus Gate of Jerusalem. (In oval) "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." A recent photograph of a threshing ground in Palestine, where the cattle are still driven over the grain to separate the wheat from the chaff as it was done 2,000 years ago piece of merchandise, is usually accompanied by wild gestures. Their faces and the pitch of the talk suggest that murder may be the outcome. Then there are the voices from the minarets calling the faithful to prayer—harsh, insistent voices without a friendly note in them.

I heard the shepherds singing their ancient love songs as they sat with their wine in the cafés. These barbaric chants were filled with a curious kind of bleating.

There was nothing in them which to me even remotely resembled music.

I stood by the dusty highway in blistering sunlight while the great procession of pilgrims passed on its way to the fake tomb of Moses, in the week of the Ramadan festival. Young men danced and piped in the midst of the vast procession, in swathed heads, the perspiration dripping from their faces in the deadly heat. But there was neither grace in their movements nor music in their pipes.

ONE day in southern Sicily I saw a shepherd sitting on the brow of a steep hill, his flock feeding on the slope below him. As I watched he began to play his pipe—the ancient type of instrument called in old Greece the pipes of Pan. He charmed me with his art. Delightful strains of music came from it. I found that most of the common people there have gentle manners and voices. One asks himself why there should be such a difference in the sounds that greet him on these two shores of the Mediterranean?

Chateaubriand has written that Christianity is the mother of noble music; that when its faith came to men and women they began to sing of their new hope, of their love of God and their neighbors—of their longing and gratitude; that the art of expressing in agreeable sounds the deepest emotions of the heart grew, as man grew in grace and wisdom. Thus it would seem that the great song in the heavens on Christmas night taught the world a new form of expression.

From the beginning Christianity has had a hard time in Palestine. The early church in Jerusalem could not endure the persecution to which it was subjected. It flickered out. The great Church of the Holy Sepulchre, founded when the faith had conquered the patricians of Rome, suffers even now a nagging persecution. At one of its great Easter ceremonials, I saw a large band of husky young Mohammedans force their way into and through its crowd, against the resistance of soldiers and policemen, chanting their anti-Jewish slogans. I was told that many massacres had stained its floor. It is occupied by the Greek, Armenian, and Palestinian sects, often quarreling, and sometimes with violence, as to their respective rights in the structure. There is much golden display in the ceremonials, but I question whether these sects have ever founded a school or a hospital or employed any efficient means of relieving the dire distress and poverty which surrounds them. I left the church with the feeling that a dozen loaves of bread distributed to the poor would have been far better worship than all those shining ceremonials of the Eastern time.

OF THE conditions that surround the Church in Jerusalem, I have some knowledge. My dragoman was a Christian from Syria—a young man about thirty-two, who, according to the custom of Palestine, had inherited his father's debts. Every week one half of his wages were paid to the creditor, who could, on complaint to a magistrate, have him cast into prison. He invited me to his home. There in a little house far outside the city walls I found his mother and a number of his sisters. They were a half-starved lot. They could get no work to do. I induced the boy's employer to join me in paying off this devilish inheritance of debt. It made me feel poor; but, having looked into those faces, it was my only way out of the cloud of unhappiness that fell upon me. I am sure that when I was in Jerusalem many good people were literally living one step ahead of starvation and frequently being overtaken by it.

My observation is that the Christians of Palestine are not like those of the Western World. Long under Mohammedan rule, they have not been able to find the way of light and progress. They are submerged in the prevailing darkness and poverty.

Beyond the shadow of the Christian Church in Jerusalem, Palestine is almost a womanless world. There are veiled figures on the streets of the cities, their faces hidden. These are said to be women. You go to tea or dinner with a rich Mohammedan. No women! If one goes to the theatre in Damascus he will see many men but no women. If he goes to the great cafés he will see only men. In every shadowed place of comfort and refreshment along the harbor-shore at Beyrout great numbers of men sit gossiping over their cups; but no woman is seen there. Where Mohammed reigns, women are hidden, oppressed, pale, and almost bloodless. They are bought and sold for marriage. They are in the same sort of slavish bondage that they suffered in the time of Jesus.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

RENAN was right when he wrote that woman never had an opinion of her own or a decent share in human rights until Jesus Christ began his work.

In Palestine the women are mostly back where they were before Jesus came. It is almost impossible to Christianize the children of Allah, and for a singular reason: Mohammed taught his followers that if one of them deserted the faith it was the duty of his nearest relatives to slay him.

So the Christians make no effort to convert the Mohammedans, for success would invariably lead to tragic results. The Christian college in Beyrout is teaching some six hundred Mohammedan boys. There they get and take back to their homes the intellectual training, the ideals, the good will and manners of the Christian world in the West. But that is all that can be done for them. It is the foundation of a better spirit. And enlightenment will slowly but surely change the spirit of the younger generations.

On the other hand, the Zionist movement has made substantial progress in Palestine; but its future hope lies in the continuance of Christian domination, and the related growth of the spirit of toleration and progress. The wild fanaticism of the Near-East Mohammedans and their numerical strength are a menace to any new idea, however excellent. The children of Allah think that the Jews furnished the money for the conquest, and that the British are rewarding them with favors. My authority for this statement is the Governor of Damascus. No doubt the Jews make the best government servants, and for that reason the British prefer them. The Moslems are mainly children in intellect and men in their power to do harm.

The new Jewish university at Jerusalem is impressive. A new and flourishing Zionist city near Jaffa reminds one of the early growth of Miami, and the little Zionist colonies near the sown lands are composed of decent, industrious folk.

I got it into my head that I must see Cæsaria, the ancient seaport of Herod, where Paul was imprisoned for two years. I tried to get there with a motor car, but was stalled in the eastern edge of the sand dunes, seven miles from my destination. At last I took a train from Jerusalem to a little Jewish colony called Kudeira, in the edge of the sands. We reached the station about sundown. In a rickety overloaded omnibus we toiled toward the village, a mile away. We were nearly an hour making the journey through deep sand. Some time after dark we pulled up at a small house—the only place of entertainment. A kindly little Jewish woman in spectacles received us with hesitation and astonishment. She conferred with the men of the house. She would do her best for us; but she could only give us toast, boiled eggs, and tea. It all had a curious taste, but we ate it gratefully in the dim light of some candles. I spent the night, and the night spent me, on a dusty old sofa with complaining spiral springs which pushed with varying pressures on my back. The morning seemed a bit tardy, but it came at last—a perfect morning with a warm sun in a clear sky. We ate our eggs—I wonder if they were goose eggs—and toast and tea.

For the first time since I was a boy I got into an old-fashioned lumber wagon without springs, sitting on a board which rested on the sides of the box. Thus, behind a pair of farm horses, we began our toilsome journey over the dunes. Our driver was a whiskered, kindly Rumanian Jew.

Pity for the struggling horses soon drove me out of the wagon. The driver then warned me in good German against schlangen. I tramped on watchfully, but saw no serpents. For three hours and more we toiled through the sands over hills and hollows with no spear of vegetation in sight. Then down to the sea, very blue and quiet under the noonday sun. What a relief to get to firmer footing!

FAR up the shore we could see the ancient city-gate built by Herod, the Tetrarch, and a part of the old wall. Out in the sea were remnants of the great mole of Herod which enclosed the harbor. A magnificent thing it must have been in the ancient time with its arches and houses for the sea-folk and its Roman columns supporting the vast promenade. Great sections of the city wall, as big as a house, were tumbled over. Beyond were a few half-ruined buildings inhabited by a shiftless colony of Mohammedans living, no doubt, on the fish of the sea. There were broken Roman columns with carved capitals lying among the weeds of the roadside. On the shore I picked up a fragment of a mosaic floor. From the promontory I could see here and there an ancient column of the mole lying prone in the wash. Undoubtedly, the amphitheatre and palaces of the old time are buried under the hill a few hundred yards from the shore.

But it is in Bethlehem, as one looks upon and studies the scenes so meagerly described in the Gospels, that the imagination begins to get a foothold.

This thought came to me there about Mary and the shepherds: She was no doubt a woman noted for her wisdom, high character, and beauty. The wise men of the

(Cont'd on page 117)

PUBLISHERS' PHOTO SERVICE

The hour of worship at the Jewish Wailing Wall in Jerusalem, supposed to have been part of the temple of King Solomon

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Old Way And The New Way To Teach Children

By Angelo Patri

THE first school that I attended was a village school among the hills of Italy. I was five years old when I started. On the first day, the master sent me to sit with a row of little boys on a long bench across the back of the room.

I understood nothing of what was going on. Big boys stood in a line and read to the master from books, or answered questions he shot at them. Suddenly, for no reason so far as I could see, a group would swing about to face a chart on the wall, and chant something which ought to have been a song, but which wasn't, quite. I liked the rhythm and the noise of that exercise very much. As the morning wore on, I grew weary sitting on a hard bench with my legs dangling and my back swaying like a sapling in the wind. I wished very much that the man would let the little boys have a turn at standing up and sitting down again and making those delightful noises.

All at once my wish was granted. My bench began to chant, "Baa, be, bi, bo, bu," the phonetic syllables which were the first steps in reading. Without the slightest notion of what to say, I swung in with all my heart and with all my lungs. I thought the game was to make many noises as loud as you could, and my cheerful voice led all the rest.

The amazed and indignant master gave me a terrible look. The next moment, he snatched the great whip from the wall behind his desk, and with exactly the same motion the driver of a dog team uses when he flicks the fly from the ear of his leader, he sent the lash hissing across the room and took me on the tip of the ear. Frightened and hurt and raging, I tore out of the room and raced home to my mother.

I had met with the old way of education and I had obeyed my impulse to get as far away from it as possible. This happened many years ago, but I think it marked the first step in my ceaseless groping toward a newer and better way of helping children find their places in this wonderful world, where, unfortunately, right and wrong and good and bad sometimes look very much alike.

My search has led me far. I have met many strange and delightful people and some who were strange and not so delightful. I have never found the perfect way I set out to discover that tearful morning, but each day I can see it shining more clearly and coming nearer.

We make progress slowly. The old ways are hard to get rid of. The same school often shelters the old method and the new; I have seen them struggling for mastery in the same teacher.

But while habit is strong, it is never so strong as a gorgeous idea, and that is what the new and better idea of education means to me—a gorgeous idea that will result in making schools function, teachers happy, children brim over with health and happiness and power. It is my dream, and it is already beginning to come true.

Under the old régime, the child's sole duty was to put the course of study into his head, and produce it seventy-five per cent strong on demand. It was the duty of the teacher to help the willing child toward this end, and to cram the matter into the head of the unwilling one. Such a process is contrary to child growth and teaching. Naturally, it became a battle that lasted as long as the teacher was on one side of the desk and the pupil on the other. Authority was the watchword and obedience the law.

SOON after I became a teacher I was honored with an introduction to a schoolmaster famous for the discipline he maintained in his school.

"Ha," said he, "just beginning, eh? Take this for your comfort, and never forget that I said it: You are a pedagogue—high calling. Reflect on the meaning of the term: ped, the foot; ago, to drive—to drive with the foot. There's your theory. There's your method. There's your success. Drive them. Drive them. Success to you, my young friend. Ours is a noble calling."

That was his own private definition and application of the word pedagogue.

He was neither cruel nor hypocritical. He was really kind-hearted, but he thought the children must never find that out. They didn't. They used to pelt him with the surplus tomatoes of the neighborhood on the way from school. The next morning he spent his time hunting for the marksmen and maintaining discipline. It was his way of living up to what he believed to be the better way of training children.

In that sort of school the individual child is not recognized. Any originality of method or manner he may show is accepted as a challenge to authority, and at once "steps are taken" to squelch it flat.

I had a teacher at one time who prided herself on the number of honor pupils she sent to higher institutions. It was not good policy to turn over to her a child who could not maintain a ninety-five per cent standard.

One afternoon this teacher brought Hans to me. "I'll have to drop this boy," she said. "He cannot or will not do any work in arithmetic."

I was amazed. Hans was a wizard in arithmetic.

"He insists upon handing me the answers without any work to show how he got them," the teacher declared indignantly, "and when I call on him for the explanation of any example, he cannot give it. I think he'd better fall back to the slower group; but here he is. Let him speak for himself."

"I can't explain things," said Hans glumly. "When I know them, that is all I know about them."

"It isn't at all what you know," stormed the exasperated teacher. "You must know when you get the right answers. Why can't you say, 'If so many cost so much, and the amount is so much, I can buy in the proportion, and my proposition becomes so much is to so much as so many is—'"

"It gives me a headache," moaned Hans, clutching his head. "Hear me the examples. I know everything in the book. You just hear me, and see. But I can't give the explanations. I can't say so much and so much. It's too much." And because he was overwrought, he giggled.

"If you can write down answers without the work to back them up, and get them accepted for college entrance, very good. My class isn't as smart as that," said the teacher, and she swept out of the room.

Hans could not stay in the class after that, you may be sure. He had to register in the slower group, where a wise teacher let him travel ahead at his own pace with never a delaying word.

I THOUGHT of Hans recently when a mother brought me her seven-year-old son, who was having trouble with his arithmetic teacher in one of the modern private schools, a school earnestly searching for the right way for its children.

"Do try to see what is the matter with this child," begged the mother. "He has me and his teacher just about desperate. He does everything but what he is asked to do. He brought things to a climax yesterday in his number test. He should have handed in sixty five answers, and he had just eleven when the teacher took his paper because she was forced to go home. That gave him about sixteen per cent.

"He knows the answers perfectly," she went on. "He never gets them down. Just too lazy to live. I can't get him to dress in less than an hour, and I have to prod him along from dawn to dark if anything is to be accomplished."

The boy's messy number sheet proved very interesting. The boy had to write that eight and eight equal sixteen. Before setting down the result, he had evidently done his best to prove that eight and eight could equal something else. He had factored sixteen in every fashion possible, and then, as though reluctantly forced to the conclusion, he had written in the sixteen. Each number combination had some such form of analysis and test.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Why did you factor the sixteen?" I asked him.

His face brightened. "You mean why did I take it apart and put it together again?" he asked. He sidled nearer, and spoke to my ear alone: "I was so tired of the blamed things coming out the same way every time that I tried to make them come different. But they never would. Don't they ever?"

"Never," said I, so solemnly that he laughed.

Then I talked to him a little about the beautiful exactness, the eternal rightness of numbers, and I told him about the great masters who had searched out deep-hidden and most precious secrets, because of this very unchanging rightness. He nodded his head and said, "I'll hurry up and get to that place. How long will I be?"

The teacher was one of the new and better sort, for soon she sent me a note saying that the young investigator was hard at work going straight through the book of tables and that he was showing speed.

THE old way of mass instruction imposes not only mass progress but mass discipline, where the individual character is merged and self-control eliminated. That kind of discipline holds fairly well through childhood's early years, because little children are not too conscious of self to submit readily, but it always breaks at the stage of pre-adolescence.

If the child is healthy and intelligent, he has by that time developed a personality, crude and over-emotionalized and ill-adjusted, but sincere, eager, aggressive, altruistic. The old and rigid way allowed no room for the blundering adolescent, no leeway for mistakes, no freedom for initiative.

Yet such allowances and such provision must be made if we are to provide the best conditions of growth and avoid serious trouble

A sturdy, broad-shouldered lad of sixteen rushed into my office one day carrying a record card and a letter from a school in a distant town. "I'm sending you this boy in the hope that somewhere in your big school he may fit in," wrote the superintendent. "He is very bright and very headstrong. He wants to know everything about everything, and insists upon being heard on all occasions.

"The fact that he usually has something to say and that he is usually right in his crusades makes it none the less embarrassing to us in a school where there is but one teacher, an elderly woman, to whom he can recite. To her he is the proverbial red rag.

"We reached our limit recently when he came to school in a gray flannel shirt. The teacher took him aside and told him she thought it too informal for school, and he went into a tearing rage. His father and I agree that he would be the better for a change of environment, so he goes to live with an aunt and attend your school. Do what you can to help him, for, although he is very trying just now, he is much worth while."

As I laid down the note the lad jumped a series of questions at me in a voice that rocked the electric globes: "What'd he say about me? What'd he say? Did he say I hadn't any manners? Tell you I was a nuisance, I suppose? Never knew how to behave myself? I'll bet he never told you what she said about my shirt! A perfec'ly good shirt. A perfec'ly good gray flannel shirt. Good enough for anybody. My father paid three dollars for that shirt, I'd have her know. There's nothing the matter with that shirt, perfec'ly good gray flannel—I guess I know—Ask anybody— If she—"

He was quivering and panting and perspiring, a frantic boy who felt himself driven to the wall by unjust and unreasoning powers. A brave boy at that, struggling to maintain his integrity of personality in the face of tremendous opposition. I shoved the note across the table to him, and sent a chair sliding across the floor in his general direction. "Read it," I said.

"WELL," said he after a moment's frowning concentration upon the paper in his hand, "it's the truth. Could I help it? She didn't want me in school. Chased me out. I've got as good a right to go to school as anybody. I'm going to college. I'm going to teach. I'm going to draw like an artist. And teach right. That's no way to teach. Tell you your shirt's no good. A perfec'ly good gray flannel—"

"Boy," I cut in, "I'm a busy man. You want to come to school? Here's the school. Here's the program. Help yourself. When you've made out your program, I'll sign it, and you can go to work."

He made out a program, and although I thought it stiffer than he ought to try, I signed it.

I saw no more of him until one afternoon I found him sweeping the halls. "What's the idea?" said I.

"I've got to give myself a lift if I want to get through high school and college," he explained. "Dad was mighty good to let me come down here; but I have to help him carry the load. This job is fine because it lets me stay in school, and I can be here at nighttime and see the teacher. He's grand to me. Lets me see him before school, or after, or any time, just so I tell him ahead. I'm eating it up, and I'll be in high school next term."

He swept his way through high school and college, and recently he stopped in to tell me he was going to teach in a boys' high school next term. "Going to teach right? Going to wear perfec'ly good gray flannel shirts?" I said.

"Well," he replied, with a smile, "I know what she meant, but that was no way to take me. You have to know that an adolescent boy, or girl, is a person, and thinks more of being recognized as such than he ever will again in all his life. I'll make my own share of mistakes, but I won't be a crab and pinch the noses off the youngsters just because they happen to get into something that might not concern their daily lessons. You have to let kids live."

But to the folk addicted to the old ways school is still the place where everyday life is shut out; a place where silence, muted voices, muffled treads, passivity and conformity reign. Books are important—not life.

WHEN I went to college, I took the course in natural science. I had a notebook and pencil and the professor had the science. He did things with things and made diagrams on the board; carefully drawn bottles with stiff tubes growing out of their necks; notes painstakingly written and heavily underscored; the whole plentifully besprinkled with big and little letters of the alphabet—the one familiar detail in the whole hopeless muddle. I simply memorized the whole transaction against the day when I would have to produce it seventy-five per cent strong.

One day he taught us about electricity. He rubbed a bit of silk on a glass bottle and the silk became alive. Electricity had made it lively. He tore little bits of paper into smaller bits and made them dance about the bottle. Electricity made them do that. He did things with Leyden jars, and then approached them to each other and a miracle happened. A spark was born and leaped across the space. I was thrilled, but not informed.

But in the schools where the new way has taken hold, the children are thrilled and informed. The science man in our school goes from group to group, and points to a screw that needs adjusting, to a wire that needs better connection. And he listens and listens while eager children demonstrate bells and lights and batteries and telephones, or whatever they happen to have. They are using electricity as a tool. What I learned only in words, they are learning through first-hand experience, and their lives (Continued on page 84)

The Schools Are Now Made To Fit the Children

"THE old way of teaching," says Mr. Patri, "meant imposed knowledge, imposed conduct, dependence, unquestioning acceptance. The teacher was the core of the school. The child was merged in the mass.

"The new way implies a search for knowledge, a purpose and a will in each searcher. The child is the heart of the school, and the more he differs from his mates in gifts and abilities the prouder the record of the school.

"Life flowed by the closed door of the old school. It flows through, today, and the children laugh and cry and cheer and push on with their elders. School is life and we are all living it. It is the new way."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Illustrated by Stockton Mulford

On all sides they hemmed him in . . . but the small gentleman appeared singularly happy

War Drums

A stirring romance of the early American wilderness

By HERBERT RAVENEL SASS

Synopsis of the Three Preceding Instalments

IT WAS in search of her lover, Gilbert Barradell, that the lovely Jolie Stanwicke left her mother's people in England, and journeyed to the New World. She found no trace of Barradell, who had landed in old Charles Town to seek his fortune and had vanished into the wilderness lying so close about the little settlement. But she did find dangers and romance undreamed of in cultured England. She was seen and coveted by Lance Falcon, captain of the brig "Good Fortune"—one of those violent soldiers of fortune infesting the New World. And she soon discovered that Falcon had some mysterious power over her father, Lord Stanwicke, in whose stately house she was virtually held prisoner.

In her dilemma she commissioned Almayne, hunter and woodsman, to trace for her the fate of Barradell. It was this state of affairs that Lachlan McDonald wrung from Almayne, after the young man had seen the lady Jolie in her father's garden. And Lachlan—Indian, Scotchman, Frenchman, Prince of the Muskogee Empire and Chief of the Family of the Wind—vowed not to go back to his father's kingdom until he had found Jolie Stanwicke's lover for her.

Impersonating a Spaniard, he boarded Falcon's brig, discovered his piracy, his alliance with the Spaniards, and his knowledge of the fate of Barradell, who was "Chief Concha's prisoner." Falcon let slip also something of "Chief Concha's daughter," but just then the impersonation was discovered and Lachlan had to flee for his life.

The next day, as he reported her lover's safety to Jolie, he was seized, loaded on board the "Good Fortune," and whisked away to sea. Falcon would have killed him without mercy—but they ran foul of an ancient pirate enemy, and in the fight that followed the "Good Fortune" was wrecked. Falcon saved Lachlan's life, and, waiting for rescue on the beach, Lachlan promised not to divulge the captain's piracy.

Back in Charles Town, Lachlan learned that Jolie had been taken by her father to his lonely country place, and he set out at once, with Almayne, to follow her. They arrived in time to overhear her father's dreadful threats and her defiance, to bind and gag old Stanwicke, and take Jolie with them on their mission of rescue for Barradell.

And then, after hours of grueling riding through the blackness of the forest—the lights of a camp and Jock Pearson's camp train which they would join on its journey to Fort Prince George. At the prospect of rest, Jolie for the first time gave way to weariness. Lachlan, beside her, put his arm out to steady her as she swayed in her saddle. For a moment her body leaned against his, her hair brushing his cheek. . . . And Lachlan realized with vague astonishment that he was trembling like a reed in the wind.

IN THE green savannah in the forest, where Jock Pearson's pack train had made its first camp out of Charles Town, a small gentleman with a prodigious shock of white hair was engaged in the business of defending himself against half-a-dozen ruffians. The small gentleman, clad in white ruffled shirt and black knee breeches, wielded a slim, straight sword; his assailants attacked him with long, stout staffs.

On all sides they hemmed him in, cursing, shouting, flourishing their weapons, and it seemed that his life was not worth a pin. But the small gentleman appeared singularly happy.

He sang shrilly as he fought, and his agility was miraculous. He was here, there, everywhere. His sword was now a circle of light like a halo around his snowy head, now a glittering streak like a horizontal dart of lightning—as quick, as keen, as elusive as the flickering tongue of a snake.

Jolie gasped as the scene burst upon her vision. Just beyond the combatants was the camp of the pack-train—the standing ponies, the rude shelters of blankets and skins, the smoking cook-fires; but for a moment she saw nothing of all this. She saw only the lone swordsman battling for his life and the ruffians trying to kill him.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She turned to Lachlan, where he sat his horse beside her. His face, too, was blank with amazement, but beyond him Almayne was grinning. The horses had halted at the edge of the glade, and neither Lachlan nor Almayne made a move. But suddenly Jolie heard a shout, and saw that the small white-haired gentleman had burst through the circle of his opponents and was racing toward them.

Three of the ruffians started in pursuit, but still Almayne and Lachlan sat their horses without movement, seemingly indifferent to the fleeing man's peril. In a few moments he was within a dozen paces of them, his pursuers meanwhile having halted, as though uncertain what to do. The small gentleman rushed up to Lachlan and grasped his hand.

"Eh, lad," he cried, "but I'm glad to see you! Lord, we have been worried, Almayne and I! And this is the lady?"

He swung toward Jolie and bowed low.

"By Paul!" he cried, in a thin, birdlike voice, strangely shrill, yet not unmusical, "you will pardon an old man's boldness, Mam'selle, but of all the adorable sex I adore the most those whose hair is the brave, glorious Irish color that mine once was!"

He glanced from one to another of them, a broad grin on his round, pink, clean-shaven face.

"Sure, now," he chirped, "have ye no word of greeting for me?"

"Mr. O'Sullivan," said Lachlan, "what, in heaven's name, are you doing here?"

The grin on the round pink face widened.

"A minute ago," the little man said, "I was enjoying a bit of healthful exercise. Those ignorant rogues of pack drivers had expressed some scorn of the sword as a weapon, and I laid them a wager that with this rapier I could defend myself for half an hour against the cudgels of all six of them. It was none too easy, because I had to be careful not to scratch them—that being part of the bargain—but I would have won the wager."

"But how came you here to Jock Pearson's camp?"

"On a mule," Mr. O'Sullivan answered; "a most abominably perverse and discontented yellow mule, which I bought in Charles Town because in so short a time I could not procure a horse. Later, when I have obtained a respectable mount, I shall take delight in feeding him to the wolves!"

Almayne chuckled. "You meant it then?" he said. "When you said you would go with us I thought you were jesting."

"I was," the little man answered. "But the more I thought about the matter, the more I liked the notion. It fell in with a scheme which has been growing in my head, a scheme to study the aboriginal natives, and mayhap write a book about them. So when the pack train left Charles Town, there was I and my mangy mule. And my old friend, Ugly Meg, overruled Jock's objections to my company."

He turned to Jolie, took her hand in his and patted it. "My sweet bird," he said, very gently, "Almayne has told me something of what's afoot. You will accept me, will you not, as a volunteer in your service?"

Lachlan came to her rescue. "Mam'selle," he said joyfully, "this is Mr. Francis O'Sullivan, of Ireland, a particular friend of mine and formerly my teacher; a man most marvelously learned in the classics and in history, and a perfect master of the sword. There is much more to commend him, as you will presently discover. I am sure you will be grateful for the aid which he will give us."

"I shall indeed be grateful," Jolie murmured.

Again the little man bowed low to her and, turning, included Lachlan in the gesture.

"I thank you, my lady, and you, my pupil," he said, smiling. "And now I'm thinking Jock Pearson may take himself to the devil, for I am duly enrolled as a private in the ranks!"

They rode on slowly across the savannah, Mr. O'Sullivan walking beside them. Despite her weariness, Jolie gazed with keen interest at the camp which they were approaching—the pack ponies, standing about the water buckets or cropping the grass; the pack drivers, in their high buckskin leggins and leather jerkins ornamented with beads after the Indian fashion; the little tents of skins, blankets, and stained, muddy canvas, some of which served as shelter for bundles of merchandise which had been unloaded from the ponies, while others were evidently the sleeping quarters of the party.

At the farther edge of the savannah, beyond the camp, Jolie saw two Indians come out of the forest. Each carried a rifle in one hand, while a great dark bird dangled limp and lifeless from the other. Each raised one hand above his head in a stately gesture, and Lachlan replied with a similar salutation.

"My warriors," Lachlan said to Jolie. "Striking Hawk and Little Mink, chiefs of the Muskogee. They have been out for game and they have two turkeys."

From the lower end of the meadow sounded a faint whoop. Three horsemen, all clad in buckskins, had emerged from the woods and were galloping toward the camp.

"Jock Pearson," said Almayne briefly,

She could see nothing except the eyes; but imagination filled out the crouching shape behind them as he wheeled his horse about and rode to meet them.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"We shall have venison, too," said Lachlan, sitting his horse beside Jolie in front of the first of the tiny tents. "There's a buck behind Ugly Meg Pearson's saddle."

Jolie saw the buck, but looked in vain for Ugly Meg. The rider across whose horse the dead deer was slung appeared to be a man. But when they had come up this rider slid from the saddle and walked swiftly toward Jolie. The girl saw then a tall, big-boned woman of perhaps forty years, hook-nosed, red-faced, astonishingly ugly, clad like the others in long fringed hunting shirt and leggins, balancing a rifle in her bony hand.

Meg Pearson wasted no time in formalities. She gave Lachlan not so much as a nod.

"You are tired, my lamb," she said to Jolie, in a voice as deep as a man's. "You are nigh ready to drop with weariness. An' these fools keep you settin' here! 'Light an' come with Meg."

IT WAS early afternoon when Jolie awoke. "See, my sweet, what I have for you," said Ugly Meg, smiling down at the girl, eyes twinkling in her tanned, lined face. Jolie, blinking sleepy lids, beheld a fringed buckskin shirt, new and spotless, elaborately inset with red and blue, belted with green.

"I bought it six months ago," Meg continued, "of a half-breed woman in the Chickasaw Nation, and I intended it for a slim lad I know at Fort Prince George. It has never been worn and it should fit you fairly well."

Jolie donned it gleefully; the buckskin leggins, too, which Meg had magically provided; but the smallest pair of moccasins upon which Mistress Pearson had been able to lay her hands were much too large for Jolie's feet, so for the present she must stick to her own riding boots. A broad-brimmed hat of soft beaver skin, dyed green, into which Meg had thrust a jaunty feather from a wild turkey's wing, completed the girl's new costume; and when she stepped out of the tent and made her bow, Lachlan, who was waiting just without, saw not a woman but a slim, straight youth garbed like a wilderness hunter—a boy, more beautiful than any boy, whose eyes sought his eyes and challenged them.

"How do I look?" she asked him impudently, one hand on her hip, the other twirling an imaginary mustache.

He stood dumb with amazement. For the life of him, he could find no word. It was Mr. Francis O'Sullivan who broke the silence.

"Mam'selle," he chirped, sweeping off his hat and bending low before her, "sure, you have struck him speechless but I bid you find your answer in the pitiful face of him. Mam'selle, I do assure you, with my hand upon my heart, that you are the most heavenly thing these eyes have seen at all, at all!"

"I thank you, sir, for your handsome speech," said Jolie, with a curtsy, "and no thanks to you, Mr. Tie-Tongue, at all, at all. And because he likes not my looks and is frowning at me like an ogre, I choose for my riding companion—Mr. Almayne."

Lachlan stood dumb with amazement. . . . It was Mr. Francis O'Sullivan who broke the silence. . . . "Mam'selle, I do assure you, with my hand upon my heart, that you are the most heavenly thing these eyes have seen at all, at all!"

So, with Jolie riding by Almayne's side—riding astride after the manner of a man—the pack train resumed its journey. There was a purpose underneath her whim. There were questions which she wished to ask, and which only Almayne could answer. He answered grudgingly at first, with an underlying hostility concealed yet plainly evident; but exerting yet not overplaying her charm she got what she wanted out of him, and much more besides, so that she rode with him for an hour or longer.

THIS done, she dared Lachlan to a race, and they galloped ahead of the party. Drawing rein, she talked with Lachlan, as they moved slowly on, about the task that lay ahead of them, asking him many questions, drawing from him in rough outline his and Almayne's plans for the rescue of Barradell.

There was another question which she had planned to ask him, but it was one which had to be led up to with some care; and gradually, as they rode on a hundred yards ahead of the pack train, the spell of the wilderness began to take its hold upon her.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She forgot her own concerns and a certain vague doubt which, since her conversation with Almayne, had shaped itself in her mind. Slowly her anxieties faded, and in their place came a languid, dream-like content which deepened as the afternoon wore on. The feeling came to her that all sorrow and evil had been left behind, that she was riding now toward happiness and her absent lover and the fulfillment of her dreams.

An hour before sunset, when the western sky flamed beyond the tree trunks, they came to a long savannah stretching away to their left, walled in on either side by the woods. It opened before them suddenly, as they rode out from behind a dense, tall hedge of myrtle; and as Jolie's eye lit upon it she saw its surface heave upward and her ears were full of the surge of wings.

A thousand herons and ibises had taken flight, sweeping upward from the moist ground on powerful, swiftly beating pinions, whirling and circling in the air, their white plumage gleaming like sunlit snow. For a moment Jolie watched them spellbound; then, when the last of them were vanishing amid the trees, she turned to Lachlan, and he marveled at the light in her eyes.

"AND this," she said, "is the wilderness of which Almayne thought I would be afraid. I never dreamed of anything so beautiful!"

He paused for a moment before answering.

"You do not know it yet," he said. "It is beautiful, and this part of it is safe. But it has claws and fangs and—other things. You will know it better soon."

"I am not afraid of it," she answered quickly; and then, more slowly, "There is only one thing of which I am now afraid."

"And that?" asked Lachlan curiously.

"I am afraid of what we may find at our journey's end," she said, hesitantly yet clearly.

Lachlan read no obscure meaning in the words. He had been frank in pointing out to her the difficulties and dangers of their enterprise, the possibility of failure in their attempt to rescue Gilbert Barradell; and he thought that this was what was in her mind now, and a great sympathy for her welled up in him.

He answered her cheerfully.

"Our task is no light one, Mam'selle," he said. "but I think we shall succeed. Almayne has no equal in Carolina and my two warriors are the pick of the Muskogee braves. In all America I know of no better men for this work than these three."

They were riding onward again now, side by side; and for a little space Jolie said no more. But her gaze no longer wandered along the forest glades; her eyes were fixed in front of her. Just under the red-gold curls beneath her broad-brimmed hat there was the ghost of a frown, and her lips were set as if to steady them.

Suddenly the frown, if frown it was, vanished completely, and her eyes were lit with laughter.

"You are a handsome man, Lachlan McDonald," she said playfully, "though I should not tell you so and risk turning your head. And there is a panther's grace and a lithe comeliness in your two tall warriors, Striking Hawk and Little Mink. Now I am curious about my own sex among your people. It happens that since I have been in America I have seen no young Indian girl. Tell me, Mr. McDonald, are your Indian maidens as comely as your men?"

"There are those among them," he answered gravely, "who are far comelier. They are slim and straight, and some are tall and very beautiful."

"And some," she said, "have married English husbands. Is it not so?"

"Aye, and French husbands, and men from Scotland and from Ireland," Lachlan replied; and he told her then how the Frenchman, Captain Tourville, had married a Muskogee princess of the Family of the Wind, the most exalted of the Muskogee clans; of their beautiful daughter, Sehoy Tourville, herself a princess; and of the Scotchman who came to Talasé and fell in love with Sehoy and married her, and became High Chief or King of the Muskogee Confederacy.

"THAT Scotchman," he concluded, "is my father, and Sehoy is my mother, and she is as beautiful now as she was then."

"Yes," Jolie replied absently, "all this I know. Almayne told me these things, and of how you are the prince of your nation, and of how you are going back to your people and will some day become their king."

He nodded, smiling. Presently she turned her face to him again.

"What know you," she asked carelessly, "of Chief Concha's daughter? Is she one of those slim, tall (Continued on page 67)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

INTERESTING PEOPLE

Mulford Puts Power in His Pictures

The three paintings used with this article were made by Mr. Mulford for stories in "The American Magazine"

THE man who painted those pictures has done a lot of real living!" said a friend to me when we were looking at some illustrations for "War Drums," the romantic serial now running in THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE. And the friend was right. Stockton Mulford, the artist whose thrilling illustrations for this novel have attracted a wide attention, has been living eagerly, happily, recklessly, ever since he entered upon the great adventure of life at Sharon Hill, Pennsylvania, forty-one years ago.

You have often seen and enjoyed Mulford's pictures in this and in other leading magazines. It was he who illustrated Zane Grey's novel, "Nevada," which ran in these pages recently, and he has also made the pictures for numerous short stories. Mulford prefers to illustrate the outdoor, romantic kind of story. He himself is a large, strong, outdoor man.

Mulford grew up on the Pacific Coast. As a boy he cruised on a lighthouse tender. At the age of seventeen he went to sea as a bridge boy in the United States Army Transport Service, plying between San Francisco and the Orient. Three weeks after he shipped on his first transport, he was promoted to the position of assistant quartermaster. After a time at sea, Mulford came back to his home in Portland, and tried school again. "But I couldn't settle down to studies after my experience on the sea." he says. "The two things that interested me most were adventure and art, and art won the fight.

"I had been drawing pictures since I was a small child," he went on. "When I was nine years old, my father, who died soon afterward, gave me an easel, and on that I made my first real picture. It was of Robinsoe Crusoe finding the tracks of Friday in the sand."

That was a prophetic picture, for, ever since, Mulford has exhibited a decided talent for dramatic moments. Some of the finest, most dramatic scenes he has ever painted are those for "War Drums." He sat up most of one night reading this novel, and he was in the office of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE early the next day, all eagerness to get started with the illustrations. "This is my meat!" he said. "There's action here, and romance."

PHOTOGRAPH BY D. JAY CULVER

Stockton Mulford

But Mulford doesn't dash his pictures off in a hurry. For instance, on one illustration for "War Drums," he spent five days in the New York Public Library looking up a detail of ship structure in the eighteenth century, the time of this story. "I didn't know whether the wheel of this particular kind of ship in those days was on the poop deck or just in front of it," he explained, "and I wanted to put it in the right place."

That incident will give you an idea of how hard a conscientious and capable artist works, even when it is not strictly necessary. Not more than a dozen people in the United States could have spotted the error if he had put the wheel on the poop deck.

Stockton Mulford's father was a life-insurance man. He took his family from Sharon Hill to San Francisco, and then to Portland, Oregon. After young Mulford's experience as a seaman, he worked for some time in a bank. His father had died, and his mother was running a family hotel to help support the family. At the age of twenty-one, Mulford came to New York City to study art in the Art Students' League. His money soon vanished, as money does in a big city, and Mulford found himself a frequenter of pawn shops. One Saturday he was unable to pay his room rent of nine dollars for the past week. He had brought an old pistol from the West, and with this he went to see his favorite "Uncle," who presided behind the three well-known gilded balls. For this weapon the aspiring young artist was given one dollar and fifty cents.

"What's a dollar and a half good for," Mulford asked himself, "when I owe nine to my landlady? I think I'll go to a show!" So, with fifty cents he bought dinner, and with the remaining dollar he bought a ticket in the highest balcony of a theatre.

That night, in his room, he worked on a picture, worked desperately hard. He completed the picture in less than twenty-four hours, and took it to an editor. The editor liked it, and so informed Mulford.

"You can have it," announced the young artist, "provided you pay cash for it."

"That's a most extraordinary condition," said the editor.

"It isn't any more extraordinary than my need for the money," said Mulford.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Whereupon the editor paid him twenty-five dollars in cash.

But other pictures did not sell, so Mulford went to a bank and got a job. This was in 1907. He continued to study art at night, and continued to sell an occasional picture. The "Christian Herald" was his chief market for pictures.

About the first of December, 1913, he went to this paper with some illustrations for a story. They were accepted, and then the art editor exploded a bomb.

"Mulford," he said, "I am not going to give you another story to illustrate unless you give up that bank job. You might as well decide now whether you are to be an artist or a banker."

"That was a hot shot," says Mulford. "I was scared to death of being broke, now that I had a wife and a baby. But I knew there was real sense in what the art editor was saying to me.

"'Well,' I finally suggested, 'give me until the end of January.'

"The editor agreed, and so I worked on for two more months in the bank, then cut loose as an illustrator, whose only income was the precarious one that I might earn by my own skill as an artist."

That decision to strike out on his own was one of the best Mulford ever made. For a time he worked terribly hard, making sixteen pictures in one frantic month. "But I could never do that again," he says. "The more I learn about painting, the fewer pictures I make. Now, the best I can do is to illustrate two stories a month, and that keeps me humping."

Mr. and Mrs. Mulford live in New York City and, during the summers and often on winter week-ends, on a remote Connecticut farm. They have three children, a boy and two girls. Mrs. Mulford, Senior, lives with them. Incidentally, one of the finest sets of drawings Mulford ever made for this magazine was painted with one hand. While in an early morning frolic with his son he broke a tendon in his right shoulder, and had to do all of his work with his left hand. Another time he illustrated a story for THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE when one hand was heavy with bandages because he had overturned a pot of boiling water on himself.

But that's the kind of man he is. As I said at the start, he lives eagerly, recklessly and happily! And paints illustrations that are as good as the best!

JAMES C. DERIEUX

Ruth Conniston Tempers Harsh City Noises With the Music of Her Bells

ON ALMOST any afternoon during the week preceding Christmas, if you chance to walk up Park Avenue, in the heart of New York's fashionable residence section, you probably would hear strains of Christmas carols that seemed to float down from the heavens above. And if you followed where your ears led, eventually you would find yourself in front of the beautiful Park Avenue Baptist Church.

Here you would notice people standing in little groups, pausing amid the hurly-burly of the great city to listen to the familiar yet ever-fresh notes of "Silent Night, Holy Night." And if you stepped inside the massive doorway of the church, you would discover that even on a busy, work-day afternoon, the pews were more than half filled with listening men, women, and children. But still perhaps you would not be able to determine the origin of the music.

In order to do this, you might have to take the elevator to the seventh story of the church and then climb a narrow, steep flight of stairs. Finally, you would find yourself in a tower high above the noise of the city, in a tower through whose open windows gleam the same stars that centuries ago shone down upon a lowly manger in a little town called Bethlehem. And here before a mighty keyboard you would see a slender young woman with her fine, sensitive face aglow, playing Christmas carols on the carillon, or bells, which many think the most impressive musical instrument ever devised. The young woman's name is Ruth Conniston.

Very few women undertake to master the carillon. You will understand why when I tell you a little about Miss Conniston's job. The Park Avenue carillon, which was presented to the church by John D. Rockefeller, Junior, in honor of his mother, is one of the largest and finest sets of bells ever made. It consists of fifty-three bells, ranging in size from the great bass G, which weighs ten tons and has a clapper weighing three hundred pounds, to the little treble bell, which weighs only nine pounds, and has a correspondingly small clapper. A great tower is being built on Riverside Drive, New York, in connection with the new home for the Park Avenue church, and to this tower the carillon will be moved.

The combined weight of the bells is more than a hundred thousand pounds!

The bells themselves are stationary: but the clappers are movable and are connected by a series of wires and mechanical devices with the keyboard, from which the keys project like so many wooden guns. Some of these "keys" require only a touch to call forth the desired tones; but in order to make the big, heavy fellows respond, Miss Conniston often has to use every ounce of her strength. She strikes the keys with the outside of her fists, and in spite of the gloves and finger protectors which she wears, her hands are frequently rough and blistered. In addition to the force which she expends through her hands, the carillon player must also use her feet as in playing the organ, but, of course, with much more expenditure of energy.

PHOTOGRAPH BY D. JAY CULVER

Ruth Conniston, carillon player, before the keyboard controlling the bells of the Park Avenue Baptist Church, in New York City

Miss Conniston was born in Connecticut. Both her parents were music lovers and as a very small girl the desire of her heart was to be a great pianist. As she grew older, however, she gradually transferred her affection to the organ. She went to the School of Music at Yale University, and came away with the degree of bachelor of music. The following two or three years she spent in San Francisco and Honolulu, teaching and directing.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

When she had saved up enough money, she went to Paris, where she had a year of study under Louis Vierne, the famous organist of Notre Dame. Then she came back to New York. She had already obtained several New York engagements when she met Percival Price, carillonneur of the Park Avenue Baptist Church. She immediately became fascinated by the bells and determined to learn to play them.

But Mr. Price was planning a trip to Europe to study the historic carillons of Belgium, France, and Holland. There were only six weeks left before his boat was to sail. He warned her that even a professional organist with Miss Conniston's exceptional training would require at least six months of study before she could hope to master the carillon.

At the end of six weeks, Miss Conniston played so well that Mr. Price recommended that she be given his position while he was away. Later, when he decided to give up his Park Avenue post in order to accept an offer in Canada, Miss Conniston carried on his work.

"How on earth did you accomplish so much in six weeks?" I asked.

"Plain arithmetic," she replied quietly. "You see, the usual practice period is from two to four hours a day. I worked from eight to ten hours. Not up here at the real keyboard, of course, but downstairs in the basement at a dummy keyboard. I still practice down there.

"The hardest part of my job," she went on, "is not the long hours of practice, but the difficult business of arranging suitable music to use in making up my programs. Perhaps only a dozen pieces of music have been published especially for the carillon. Like other carillonneurs, I am obliged to transpose organ, vocal, and piano music for my programs. Folk-music and compositions that have a strong melodic outline are particularly effective when played on the bells.

"I play for the radio quite often, and I am constantly getting requests for old favorites. People do not realize that our programs are made up many weeks in advance. As much as I would love to do so, I cannot often grant the requests that come to me for particular occasions. But I am always glad to get the requests and the kind messages that frequently accompany them.

"At first, I missed the feeling of immediate response which the organist gets from an audience. Not any more. Now I know that people who could never hear my organ can sit by their windows and listen to the music of my bells.

"Just the other day, I got a letter from a woman who had lived all her life in a small Southern town. Recently she came to New York to make a home for her daughter, a stenographer. She often gets cruelly homesick for the little town of her childhood. This is a part of what she wrote me:

"'Every Sunday morning when you play the chimes, I stand by my window and listen so hard that I almost forget to breathe. The music is so sweet and clear. Sometimes it seems to drift straight down from the skies above. I do not think I could go on from week to week without the music from your bells.'"

MILDRED HARRINGTON

He's the Whole Works in His Factory

THEOBALT SCHAFFER'S factory is tucked away in a little by-street in a Mid-Western city. Its product is advertised only by a few circular letters the manufacturer sends out each season. Yet its users have spread the fame of Schaffer's ice tongs from coast to coast, and ice distributors from Maine to California have, figuratively, beaten a path to the door of the red brick factory at 1014 West 19th Street, Kansas City, Missouri.

The business that Schaffer has built up is conducted from start to finish by its seventy-three-year-old owner. It started forty-one years ago, on Grand Avenue, where Schaffer had a wagon-making shop. As a side line, he manufactured a few ice tongs. When motor trucks took the place of wagons for hauling, the wagon business fell off, but the ice-tong business had been increasing steadily.

"So, the first thing I knew, I found myself out of the wagon business and in the ice-tong business," Schaffer said. "In the beginning, I tried to keep help, but the work was never so satisfactory as when I did it myself, and I decided to run the business alone."

So the white-haired old man is not only the owner of his factory, but the purchasing agent, salesman, manufacturer, bookkeeper and shipping department. He buys the raw material—inch-wide bars of flat steel for the tongs, steel rods for the handle-links—cuts them, shapes them, forges them, puts them together, and, when they are finished, stacks them in neat piles to await shipment; or, if an immediate delivery is requested, wraps them and ships them out by express, after which he sits down to figure up his profits and losses. There is no labor trouble, no incompetent help. And the business makes for him a comfortable living.

"I work when there's work to be done, and take it easy when work is slack," Schaffer explained. "The ice-tong season starts in February, and business is brisk until September, when a slack time comes.

Theobalt Schaffer standing at the door of his ice-tong factory in Kansas City, Missouri

From then until the next season's trade starts I rest a bit and get stock ahead for early orders."

His factory is all under one roof, and compactly arranged, with the coal pile in one corner, the raw materials in another, the forge, shaper and cutting machine in a third, and the office in a fourth. Tongs go through the different steps in their manufacture on different days of the week. The average output is a dozen tongs a day.

When an order comes in, Schaffer leaves his forge or his shaper and fills the order, wraps the purchase, hangs the bill of sale on a hook on the office wall and returns to his manufacturing. "The change in work is kind of restful," he says.

"I make several sizes in the tongs," he explained, "but just now I'm making more of the 18-inch size—a kind that I didn't have any call for at all until these kitchenette apartments came in style. But with those little cubby-holes of kitchens and small ice boxes, you can't put in more than twenty-five pounds, and it takes small tongs to handle that size cake. They're so useful for that business that most of the boys won't have any other kind, so I'm turning out a lot of these little fellows."

Every so often an enterprising young reporter from a newspaper in the vicinity "discovers" Schaffer and his one-man factory, and a story comes out about it—much to Schaffer's amusement.

"It's funny, what reporters will write about sometimes," he said. "During the war, I bought a Liberty bond. Evidently, it was bigger than the salesman thought a one-man's business could afford. He told a newspaper man all about it, and the next morning I saw the whole transaction in the paper!"

He was interrupted to fill an order for two dozen of the eighteen-inch tongs. He wiped his fingers on his blue overalls, and went into the office to make out the bill of sale. When the bundle was delivered, he turned to the factory corner and commenced measuring off material for more tongs.

LEONORA K. ROSS

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

People call this soup "a meal"

CAMPBELL'S Vegetable Soup has a reputation and a tremendous popularity all its own. It is America's first choice as a hearty soup.

Every spoonful of it is liquid and solid food in delightful combination. There are the blended benefits and flavors of fifteen different vegetables, with all they bring in nutriment, healthfulness and pleasure to the taste. There is the bracing invigoration of rich beef broth —the "life" and sparkle of really good vegetable soup. Body-building cereals are here in plenty. Fresh herbs give their savor and their appetizing touch.

Selected for luncheon or for supper, here is a dish that often requires very little else to invigorate and satisfy you. At dinnertime, it does yeoman service in providing both food and stimulation to the appetite. And it's so convenient, requiring but the addition of an equal quantity of water, bringing to a boil and a few minutes simmering!

The next time you serve Campbell's Soup, take a moment to examine the label. Read the list of the twenty-one different kinds of soups printed there. 12 cents a can.

WITH THE MEAL OR AS A MEAL SOUP BELONGS IN THE DAILY DIET

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Do you cherish beautiful teeth and coral gums -

then heed this warning—

MOUTH beauty is so important these days! Not only for the charm of a pleasing smile—but also because decayed teeth and infected gums will often poison the entire system.

But how are you to protect your teeth and gums? Look through your favorite publications. You will find a dozen theories on what causes tooth decay and gum infections. Look at your druggist's counter. You will find 25 or 50 dentifrices competing for your favor.

That the dangerous situation caused by this confusion might be brought to an end, E. R. Squibb & Sons decided to get a verdict from the only authoritative source—the dental profession. A research institution, world famous for its high standard and impartiality, asked 50,000 practicing dentists certain questions on mouth hygiene.

The replies received show that the dental profession agrees almost unanimously on what is the principal cause of tooth decay and gum infections and its safeguard.

95% of the answers agreed that acids are the most frequent cause of tooth decay and irritated gums.

95% agreed that the most serious trouble occurs at the place where teeth and gums meet—known as The Danger Line.

85% agreed that the best product known to neutralize acids in the mouth is Milk of Magnesia.

Squibb's Dental Cream contains more than 50% Squibb's Milk of Magnesia in a most convenient and effective form. When you brush your teeth with it, tiny particles of Milk of Magnesia are forced into every pit and crevice where acids can form. There they remain to safeguard your teeth and gums for a long time after use.

See your dentist twice a year and use Squibb's Dental Cream regularly. You will be doing everything possible to safeguard your teeth and gums.

Squibb's Dental Cream cleanses thoroughly, it soothes and strengthens the gums, it relieves sensitive teeth. It is pleasant to use and safe. At all druggists—40c a large tube.

E. R. Squibb & Sons, New York, Manufacturing Chemists to the Medical Profession since 1858. © 1927

THE "PRICELESS INGREDIENT" OF EVERY PRODUCT IS THE HONOR AND INTEGRITY OF ITS MAKER

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

War Drums

(Continued from page 61)

ones you speak of, who are so beautiful?"

She waited, her eyes searching his face eagerly; and when no answer came, she leaned toward him.

"You will recall," she said impatiently, "that when you sat the first time in Falcon's cabin, he mentioned this daughter of Concha, the Appalache Chief. It is about her that I inquire. Is she comely? There is a reason why I ask."

"I do not know, Mam'selle," Lachlan replied slowly. "I have never seen her."

He was frowning, but she met his gaze coolly.

"Well, no matter," she cried. "We shall learn about her in time, and meanwhile I shall think of her as very ugly! It will make me happier to picture her so."

"Mam'selle," said Lachlan gravely, "you will pardon me for questioning you. I told you nothing of what happened in Captain Falcon's cabin. I told you nothing of his reference to Chief Concha's daughter. I must ask you where you learned these things?"

She flushed and bit her lip.

"You must not be angry with Almayne," she said earnestly. "I wormed it out of him. I knew that you had not told me all, and I had it from him before he realized that he was telling what you had not chosen to tell."

She paused, tapping her boot with the switch which she carried. Presently her eyes dropped.

"But for Almayne," she said softly, "I should not have known how brave a thing you did when you went alone aboard Falcon's ship."

Again she waited, but no answer came.

"I know now," she continued, her rich tones low and flutelike, "that in Lachlan McDonald I have in my service as fearless a gentleman as ever served a lady in distress!"

Lachlan's black eyes were stern and hard.

"YOU have done ill," he said slowly, "and Almayne has done ill. I cannot but blame you both."

She turned on him a pair of flashing eyes.

"Sir," she cried, "I am not accustomed to be chided!"

A quick answer rose to his lips, but, reining in her horse, she cut him short.

"We will wait here," she said, "until the others come."

They sat their horses in silence, neither looking at the other. Two spots of color blazed in her cheeks, her head was high. On a swaying twig of a willow oak above the trail a black and russet sanguilla sang an evening song. As Lachlan watched it idly, a blue-gray shape swooped from beyond the tree top, wings darkened over the singing bird, long claws reached down and snatched it from its perch. Jolie, aware that the song had ceased, glanced upward. She did not see the hawk dashing onward, its victim dangling from its talons.

They made camp that night in a murmurous pine grove close to the edge of a small cypress swamp. It was dim dusk when they halted. Only the pallid radiance of the moon and the flickering glare of the cook-fires lit the grove while the little tents were being pitched.

Jolie wandered away to where the moss-bannered cypresses of the swamp soared straight and tall into the blackness of the night. Here a long, narrow cove of a lagoon lay still and deep under the shadowy trees, while the moonlight, streaming down between the pine tops, illumined the water and the sloping bank where Jolie stood. Beside her a huge wild grapevine hung from a pine, making a loop like a child's swing, and in this loop she seated herself.

She was weary of body, but her mind was wide awake. Her thoughts passed quickly to Gilbert Barradell—to certain facts which she had learned that morning from Almayne. Lachlan, mindful of his promise to Falcon, had made known to her only part of what had happened on the "Good Fortune." What he had omitted seemed to her more important than what he had told.

MOST important of all, in her mind, was Falcon's reference to Chief Concha's daughter. Almayne had merely touched upon this incident, which he seemed to regard as of slight importance, in telling her the story of their first visit to the brig; but she had questioned him closely regarding it, and she had planned to get from Lachlan a report of Falcon's exact words concerning Concha's daughter, as precisely as Lachlan could recall them. The thing had to be gone about delicately—for none must guess what was in her mind—and before she could accomplish her purpose Lachlan had dared scold her, and she had shown him his place. She must wait now for another opportunity.

She must have fallen asleep sitting in her grapevine swing; but only a few moments passed before she awoke and saw the orbs that watched her. They were pale yellow-green and they were set wide apart, so that she knew at once they were the eyes of some great beast. Across the glade near the swamp edge, a short, squat live oak stood amid the pines, and under it all was dark. It was out of this blackness that the yellow-green orbs stared palely at Jolie.

She could see nothing except the eyes; but imagination filled out the crouching shape behind them and made it even more formidable than it really was. She felt her body grow cold as clay. She tried to cry out, but no sound came from her dry lips. A faintness swept over her. She held tightly to her grapevine swing to save herself from falling; and she was still sitting there, fighting down her terror, when, minutes later, Lachlan's voice spoke close behind her.

"Mam'selle."

She rose and stood, swaying a little

"There were eyes," she told him; "great pale eyes which watched me from the darkness yonder!"

He glanced at her sharply, then strode across the glade in the direction which she had indicated, vanishing under the live oak. In a moment he reappeared.

"It was a panther," he said quietly. "Its scent is strong on the still air. Were you afraid?"

She was herself again now.

"Not I," she lied glibly, knowing that she lied, yet feeling that it was not all a lie. "Did I not tell you that I did not fear your wilderness? And did I not tell Almayne that I would teach him much that he does not know about women?"

Lachlan stood silent a moment.

"Mam'selle," he said, "I have come to ask your pardon for my rudeness to you this afternoon."

"I do not lightly forgive, Mr. McDonald," she said, after a pause. "You have done me a great service; but that, as I conceive it, does not give you the privilege of scolding me when you choose."

"Nor do I so conceive it," he answered.

"And yet you hectored me shamefully."

"I was angry. I am sorry."

"And Almayne?" she asked quickly. "You have scolded him also because of what he told me?"

"I have said nothing to him yet."

"I forbid you to mention the matter to him!" Her tone was a command.

"Mam'selle," he exclaimed, "you are arrogant!"

Her eyes flashed dangerously.

And what if I am, Mr. Lachlan McDonald?" she said proudly.

He was silent, gazing at her in wonder.

"I KNOW not how it is here in America," she continued, a biting sarcasm in her tone, "but in England the young men about me do not complain of what you are pleased to term my arrogance. They take me as I am, and they are proud to serve me."

She paused, expecting a reply, but none came. Deliberately she played her bold game to a finish.

"They said in London, Mr. Lachlan McDonald, that Jolie Stanwicke was the most lovely lady in all that great city. Because of her beauty, many gentlemen of London were her servitors. It is your good fortune to be in her service here. I think you do not sufficiently value your privilege."

"You are mistaken, Mam'selle," Lachlan muttered. "You— I am aware—"

"Come," she said quietly, "I am hungry. The venison should be ready."

She chattered lightly of small matters as they walked the short distance to the camp. Lachlan answered briefly, his thoughts still in a maze. As for Jolie's thoughts, they were clear enough, yet led to no conclusion. The sense of them was:

"Either he hates me as a monument of vanity, in which case all is well; or else I have stretched him at my feet."

At supper she found her answer. The pack-horse men supped apart. The others sat on the grass around an elk hide laid upon the ground, serving them as a table; and Jolie was aware that from the beginning to the end of the meal Lachlan scarcely glanced in her direction.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Later she led Almayne aside.

"I have done it," she told him.

"Done what, Mistress?"

"This afternoon," she said, "you made it very clear to me that you regarded me as a peril to your young Muskogee prince. To speak plainly, you have been afraid that he would fall in love with me."

The hunter stared down at her, open-mouthed.

"By the Lord!" he exclaimed, "I said nothing of this to you!"

"You said it as plainly," she smiled, "as a man may say anything without putting it into words. You can now dismiss your fears. I have done that to your Indian prince which puts me forever beyond the pale of his desires."

"In Heaven's name, what have you done to him?" asked Almayne.

"I have shown him Jolie Stanwicke as she really is," she answered solemnly. "And henceforward he will flee from her as from a plague!"

SUNRISE found them again on the road—the Path, as Almayne called it—the great Trading Path from Charles Town to the inner country. All that day and through the early hours of the next they pressed on steadily.

The Path had long been an Indian trail; now the traders' caravans traveled it also, the long lines of pack ponies bearing cloths, rum, guns, hatchets, paint, and innumerable trinkets to the Catawbas of the middle country, the Cherokees of the Blue Mountains, the Chickasaws, who dwelt beyond the mountain barrier; and returning, after months in the far wilderness, laden with bales of pelts.

It was becoming a well-traveled road, for year by year the peltry traffic grew and the caravans increased in number; yet it was still but a narrow trail through a vast and unspoiled wilderness, peopled only by red men and the beasts and birds of the forests.

Jolie's heart sang within her, answering the singing birds, of which the number seemed illimitable. Her eyes, thought Lachlan, as she turned to glance behind her, were brighter than the wild flowers strewn along the way; her slender form, as she swayed with the motion of her horse, was more graceful than the slim, leaping deer. Yes, she was beautiful, and doubtless it was true that in England many gentlemen were her servitors because of that beauty. But— He smiled a wry smile and, leaning forward, whispered to his mare.

"Tuti, my little Snowbird," he spoke softly into the silken ear. "She is a very lovely lady, this Mam'selle Jolie, this Lady Sanguilla. But saw you ever such pride, Tuti, such vanity of woman?"

The mare flicked her ear and tossed her shapely head. Lachlan laughed quietly.

"Be at ease, Tuti, little Snowbird," he murmured. "For a while longer thy master's heart belongs to thee alone."

Nevertheless, he kept his eyes upon the girl. She rode a little in front of him, Ugly Meg Pearson by her side. Meg's horse, like that of Jock Pearson, who rode with Almayne a few paces behind Lachlan, was a blue roan of the big-boned English type; but Jolie's claybank gelding, Selu by name, was of the Chickasaw breed, small, slim, long-maned, long-tailed, small-headed like a Barb.

Tuti the Snowbird, though her color was dark chestnut, might have been Selu's sister; and though Selu was the swifter and the better trained, Lachlan loved Tuti the Snowbird best, because of her playful, impudent tricks and the warm, loving heart within her.

He was content, that morning, with Tuti's company. Mr. O'Sullivan, digging his heels into the ribs of his mule, pushed past and joined Jolie and Ugly Meg at the front of the caravan. Behind Lachlan, Almayne, who rode a piebald Chickasaw pony, which he called "Nunda the Moon-face," spun yarns with Jock Pearson, about great hunts beyond the Blue Mountains, and marches and ambushes of the Indian wars. After these again trailed the pack ponies, the pack-horse drivers riding beside them.

One possibility bothered Lachlan. It might be known in the town that Mr. O'Sullivan had left with Pearson's train, and in this Lance Falcon might see some significance. Yet this seemed unlikely. Mr. O'Sullivan had told no one of his hastily formed decision to go journeying into the wilderness; and since the pack train had started before daylight, there was a good chance that his presence in it had been unobserved by anyone who knew him.

IN THE mid-forenoon they met and passed a group of half-a-dozen Pee Dee Indians, members of one of the small lowland tribes, which the warrior nations despised. All were armed with rifles, two carried steel hatchets, while the others bore tomahawks of stone. They were unmounted, for the Pee Dees were too poor to own horses, and they carried on their backs the bundles of skins which they would barter in Charles Town for rum.

Recognizing Pearson, they stopped and made as if to show the pelts which they carried, hoping to get their rum at once instead of trudging the weary miles to Charles Town; but Jock, knowing the Pee Dees of old, and aware that no skins of value would be found in their bundles, bade them roughly get on and clear the road. It was just after they had passed that Jolie beckoned Lachlan, and he rode forward and joined her.

"Your warriors," she said, "Striking Hawk and Little Mink. I have not seen them this day. Where are they?"

"Little Mink is ahead of us, Mam'selle," Lachlan told her, "and Striking Hawk follows in our rear."

"But why?" she asked.

"You are not traveling the safe roads of England," he replied. "Here it is well to know who comes on the Path in front of you and who follows on the Path behind."

Her eyebrows lifted. "Did you know that those Pee Dee Indians were coming?"

Lachlan nodded.

"A logcock called from the woods in front of us some minutes ago," he said. "It was the voice of Little Mink, and it gave me notice that travelers were approaching, and that they were not to be feared."

She exclaimed in wonder, while Meg Pearson looked on with a smile, and Mr. O'Sullivan swore softly in the ancient language of Ireland, which he used when he was much pleased or surprised.

"And, lad," he asked, "if those poor Pee Dees had been enemies whom we should have had cause to fear, what then would have been Little Mink's signal?"

"He would have called to me then," Lachlan answered, "in the voice of one of the preying birds or one of the hunting beasts. If the danger were slight, he would have used a sparrow hawk's cry. If it were great, but not very great, he would have uttered the scream of the partridge hawk. If the danger were very serious, we should have heard the howl of a lone wolf or the scream of a hunting panther."

Mr. O'Sullivan slapped his thigh with his right hand. "By Paul!" he cried, his round face glowing like a beet under his white mop of hair. "'Tis the strategy of the wilderness, and 'tis superb material for the book I plan to write about the warfare of the Aborigines. Now tell me, lad—"

THE words died on his lips; he stood open-mouthed, eyes suddenly wide. From Jolie's cheeks the color drained.

From far behind the pack train the sound came—a long, quavering, wailing scream. It might have come from a woman smitten suddenly with terror; yet it was an utterly inhuman cry, savage and wild and menacing, fiercer even than the chorus of the wolves.

Ugly Meg found her tongue first.

"Speak of the devil—" she said grimly.

Mr. O'Sullivan glanced at Jolie, marked the pallor of her cheeks.

"Perhaps," he suggested hopefully, "that was the real thing we heard—a real panther. What say you, lad?"

Lachlan made no reply. Already Almayne was at his side, speaking rapidly in a low voice, his gray-blue eyes alight. Lachlan nodded, turned swiftly to Jolie.

"Mam'selle," he said, "we will go now—you and Almayne and I. It was the signal agreed upon with Striking Hawk. It means that pursuers from Charles Town are coming. Mr. O'Sullivan, you cannot come with us; your mule could not keep up. Ready, Mam'selle? Then—ride!"

Meg Pearson's long arm encircled Jolie's slim shoulders. Leaning forward, she kissed the girl upon the forehead.

"God's blessing on you, my lamb!" she whispered. "We'll do what we can for you here."

Nunda the Moon-Face leaped forward as Almayne's heels dug into the piebald's flanks. "Now, lamb!" cried Meg, and struck Selu's haunch with her open palm. They were off, racing straight up the Path, Almayne in the lead, the fringes of his bucksin shirt streaming in the breeze, his long rifle balanced in his right hand.

Teeth clenched, muscles taut, Jolie bent forward over Selu's neck. She saw Almayne glance behind him, saw the frown on his brow, read the thought that was in his mind.

The spurs of her riding boots tickled Selu's sides. The gale roared on her ears. Above that rushing roar she could no longer hear the thunder of Tuti's hoofs behind her. Her horse was racing now, and Jolie, head down, boring into the wind, spoke to him coolly, gently:

"Faster, Selu! Faster, my sweet boy! We'll teach Almayne something, you and I!"

(To be continued)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

It's Up to You to Judge whether this shaving cream—that suits so many men down to the ground—will suit your beard. A test offered

GENTLEMEN:

What suits one man may not suit another. Yet millions have found in this unique creation, the shaving cream they've sought in vain.

It is the result of years of laboratory work by world leaders in soapmaking. Its overnight success came through our policy of giving men an ample test before we asked them to buy.

Of those who have accepted our offer, the big majority never return to what they used before. Now we offer you a ten day test and leave it up to you, whether or not it doesn't suit you better than anything else you've ever used before.

How we did it

The creamy fullness of strong-bubbled, beard-softening lather of Palmolive Shaving Cream, is no accident.

We asked 1000 men what they sought in a shaving cream. They told us, and we made and tested 129 formulas before we achieved success. This took years —years of research by soap-scientists, whose aim was to embody these 5 things in one shaving cream.

5 new features

1. Multiplies itself in lather 250 times.
2. Softens the beard in one minute.
3. Maintains its creamy fullness for 10 minutes on the face.
4. Strong bubbles hold the hairs erect for cutting.
5. Fine after-effects due to palm and olive oil content.

Please accept a test

Now all we ask is a chance to prove our case. You risk nothing. Simply mail the coupon. What comes will really delight you. Ten days of perfect shaving as a foretaste of what the Palmolive shaving habit will mean. Just mail the coupon now.

THE PALMOLIVE-PEET COMPANY, CHICAGO, ILL.

To add the final touch to shaving luxury, we have created Palmolive After Shaving Talc—especially for men. Doesn't show. Leaves the skin smooth and fresh, and gives that well-groomed look. Try the sample we are sending free with the tube of Shaving Cream. There are new delights here for every man. Please let us prove them to you. Clip the coupon now.

35c

3782

10 SHAVES FREE

and a can of Palmolive After Shaving Talc

Simply insert your name and address and mail to Dept. B-1430, Palmolive, 3702 Iron Street, Chicago, Ill.

Residents of Wisconsin should address Palmolive, Milwaukee, Wis.

.....

.....

(Please print your name and address)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Human Nature Ain't What It Ought to Be"

(Continued from page 13)

trying to help as much as he could with what small strength remained in him. But after the blowing up he received from Ross and Effie he quieted down a lot. He sat more and moved around less, and he talked to his hen Culloch more than seemed quite rational.

And then the big trouble came to Emmy.

It seems that when old Todd deeded the place over to Ross there were a couple of provisos agreed between them that were not put into writing. Todd took care of his own sons and daughters by giving them cash money when he gave Ross the home place; but he thought of Ross's children too, and it was understood between them that, as the farm was the only income producer, Ross was to give each of his children a thousand dollars when they married.

Old Todd might have kept the place and made it earn the money for him and put this in the will when he made one; but Ross was rather pushing and it was arranged as explained. With the coming of automobiles and new state road, the old place had taken on a new lease of boarding-house life and Ross and Effie were making plenty of money out of it. But they were on the avaricious side, as had been said, and they couldn't seem to be satisfied.

They hardly gave old Todd enough to buy tobacco, which was all he spent money for, and they tried to get along with half enough help in the kitchen in the summer. And then Emmy, who was worth four hired girls, fell in love with Joe Prender.

JOE PRENDER, taking him one way and another, was as good as any young man in any of the valleys leading out of Index, and he was more ambitious than most. He saw that there was mighty little chance for a farmer up Brekkill Valley unless he fell back on boarders and worked his women too hard, and he decided that when he got married he would get out.

He sent himself through high school, and then took seven years to put himself through four years of college, working in Index three of the seven years, and we all thought he was wise in planning to go down to New York and have a try at a job. He talked it over with Emmy and old Todd, and they agreed that it was the only thing to do if Emmy was not to become a permanent boarding-house keeper.

To Joe Prender, whose parents and grandparents for generations had stuck to the same stone-infested fields, the step to New York seemed a daring adventure; but the thousand dollars Emmy was to receive when she married was their anchor to windward and their lifeboat and their emergency ration. They thought they could make a safe port before that thousand disappeared, and they told Ross and Effie they were in love and wanted to get married.

"That'll be fine," Ross said. "I can use Joe around the place first rate. I'll give him fifty a month and board you both."

"We thought we'd go to the city," Emmy said. "Joe and I have talked it all over, Father, and we want to try to do better than we could up this valley. Even if we didn't go to the city, we wouldn't want to stay here; we would want to go where there are better farms."

"How'd you buy a farm?" Ross asked. "Joe, got any money?"

Joe said nothing to this.

"I'll have my thousand dollars," Emmy said cheerfully.

"What thousand dollars?" Ross asked. "You don't get any thousand dollars to get married and quit us. Don't you believe it! You and Joe can go ahead and get married and live here with us, and I'll set aside a thousand dollars for you and let you have it when I think I ought to; but I see myself giving you a thousand dollars to bat off to the city with! You're crazy!"

THEY were on the kitchen porch, and old Todd was standing on the flagstone at the bottom of the two steps, leaning on his stick with his pipe in his mouth.

"You ought to give it to Emmy, Ross," he said. "That was the agreement we come to."

"Agreement nothing!" Ross said roughly. "Suppose you go back to your hen and keep out of this. I can run my own family without your help. I know what's got into Emmy—she wants to go down to the city and cut her skirts off up to her knees and swell around like the flappers down there, smoking cigarettes and I don't know what all."

"It was an agreement, Ross," old Todd insisted.

"Yes, an agreement!" Ross laughed. He was a black-bearded man, and now he pulled at his beard and grinned. "A fool's agreement. Nobody but you would have done such a fool thing. Look at you now; you ain't hardly got a cent you can call your own. You got to come to me if you want a dime to buy a package of tobacco. Well, I ain't no such fool. What I got I keep, unless I've got good reason to part with it. I won't have Emmy married anyhow. She's too young to get married."

"I didn't marry until I was twenty-eight, Emmy," Effie said. "You oughtn't to think of marrying anybody yet. A girl of your age don't know her mind."

"I do know my mind, Mother," Emmy said, but most of her cheerfulness was gone.

Then began the endless nagging of Emmy that soon had her in tears and that kept her in tears for weeks thereafter. It was in May that Ross Hibbard repudiated his agreement, and all through May and June the kitchen was little more than an arena where Effie and Ross attacked the poor child, trying to wear her down and make her so miserable that she would never want to hear Joe Prender's name again.

Joe Prender, of course, was forbidden to come on Ross Hibbard's land unless he wanted to be filled full of buckshot; but he managed to see Emmy now and then, and he was blue enough. He was going to the city, he said, to try to make a start there, and if he could get going and earn enough he would come back for Emmy. He tried to cheer her up, but she could not be cheered, and they were never able to talk more than a few stolen minutes at a time.

The Emmy of that June was as different from the Emmy of April as rain is from sunshine, and she had no jokes at all for old Todd. She went about her work in the kitchen listlessly and her mother scolded her continuously, and a good part of the time Emmy wept.

Probably Ross had enough conscience to be a little ashamed of himself, but like most of us who injure another, he took it out on his victim, and he gave Emmy no peace. When he wasn't telling Emmy what a fool she was, he was scolding her or telling her that Joe was a worthless, no-account loafer and only after her money. The only time he ever suggested that Emmy had any right to any money was when he was saying Joe Prender was marrying her for it.

Old Todd urged Emmy to run away with Joe and marry him in spite of everything, but Emmy had been so long under her mother's thumb that obedience had come to seem a duty, and she would not hear of an elopement. She said that, for one thing, it would be unjust to Joe, loading him down with a wife at the start of his new venture; if she had had some money with which to help him it would have been a different matter. So, about the middle of June, Joe Prender went to New York.

That brought Emmy's misery to a climax, for she loved Joe as not many girls love a fellow, and it was as if the world had ended for her. But old Todd seemed to take it harder than anyone. He was so fond of Emmy and so helpless. He gave up all attempts to do any of the little old chores that had formerly helped to pass his time, and he sat almost all day on his chunk of wood in the chip yard, mouthing his unlighted pipe and thinking unpleasant thoughts.

He even neglected his hen Culloch. She used to come up to him and turn her head on one side and say "Cul-luck?" And all old Todd would say would be "Get away from me, blame ye!" He sat there so often and so long at a time that even Effie noticed it.

"Ross, I'm afraid your father is getting queery," she said to him.

"Well, he's an old man," Ross said when she had explained that old Todd sat and talked to himself by the hour. "He won't have long to be that way. What I wish is that Emmy would get some sense into her."

THEN, one day, when Joe Prender's father was driving past the place in the car Joe used to make hop over the ruts, old Todd hailed him and asked for a ride to Index. It had been a year or more since old Todd had gone to Index, and he did not care much to go to town as a rule,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

For eighty-five years the candles have cast their gleam over

Whitman's candies for Christmas

THE SAMPLER that seems to please every candy taste, dressed up for Christmas.

For gifts nothing can be more imbued with the spirit of Christmas than the SAMPLER in its gold and green and red holiday wrap. Other packages in Whitman's Quality Group, some of which are shown here, will fit every individual preference.

Hard candies, solid chocolate, Messenger Boys and other shapes provide sweets for the tree and the children.

The great variety and sizes of Whitman's packages make selection of sweets for gifts and for the home gathering an easy and pleasant duty. For last-minute gifts, these are ideal, and all Whitman agents will mail them for you.

Whitman packages may be had in fancy outer containers, baskets, boxes and bags to make the gift more elaborate and with a touch of utility.

See them at the nearby store that is agent for Whitman's. Ask the agent, or write to Stephen F. Whitman & Son, Inc., Philadelphia, for a folder of gift suggestions.

SALMAGUNDI — a favorite assortment in an artistic metal box.

FRUITS AND NUTS for luxurious tastes.

BONNYBROOK — the new assortment of Milk Chocolates that has made millions of friends.

CLOISONNÉ — a gorgeous big box of selected chocolates.

PINK OF PERFECTION— the name expresses Whitman's opinion of these chocolates in a bright, colorful new package.

© S.F. W. & Son, Inc.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

but now he had something on his mind.

He had Sam Prender let him out at the bridge as you go into town, and he walked the few hundred feet to the frame church and down the steps to the basement. The minister lived in the basement; but he was in his garden when old Todd arrived, and he pushed back his hat and held out his right hand and bade the old man welcome.

"I got something I want you to help me," old Todd said, and they went to the steps and sat down and conversed as one man with another. When old Todd had told the minister the whole story of Emmy Hibbard and Joe Prender, and of what Ross had promised to do and had not done, this Reverend Nowell Waters gave him little cheer. The preacher was an old man, not as old as Todd but venerable and gray, and he had the face of a world-weary prophet—a kindly man; but one who had seen much of man and his ways.

"But what can you do and what can I do?" he asked. "We may feel that this girl's father is not doing what you or I would do, but by what right would I interfere between child and parent? The ancient commandment, 'Honor thy father and thy mother,' still remains as it always has stood and as it always will stand, and little good ever results from the interference of an outsider."

Odd Todd said nothing. He felt the bigness of this man, and that here was one who knew more than he. No man he had ever met had impressed him as Nowell Waters impressed him.

"What this man says is right," old Todd thought. "He would not say anything that was not right."

"I know Ross Hibbard well," Nowell Waters went on. "There are men that are hard, and he is one of them. But that is human nature; human nature is hard, and we must look for hard things from it."

"IT OUGHT to be changed," old Todd said.

"Yes, it ought to be changed," Nowell Waters agreed. "I thought in my blindness, when I was a young man, that I might be one to change it. I am an old man now, and human nature is as it was. It is the same now as it was when Columbus lived. It is the same as it was when Pharaoh lived. It is the same as it was in the days of Noah. It is the same as it was in Adam."

"If it makes folks as cantankerous as Ross," said old Todd, "it ought to be changed!"

"It is the same to-day as it was yesterday," said Nowell Waters. "The ages have not changed it."

"It ought to be hurried up some, seems to me," old Todd said.

"Hurried?" replied Nowell Waters. "Do you see these mountains piled around us on every side? How long do you suppose those mighty mountains have stood, vast cores of virgin rock? For ages! Time and storm, frost and rain have gnawed at them—and still they stand there. A year goes by, and a handful of rocks, pried off by the frost, is that year's work on those mountains. My friend, human nature will change; but not until those mountains are broken into pebbles, and the last pebble is crushed into dust! Then, and not till then, will human nature change!"

Old Todd got up. He felt in his pocket for his pipe.

"Well, much obliged to you, Parson, anyway," he said. "I shouldn't wonder if Sam Prender might be coming back along pretty soon. I got to get home."

"They'll be anxious about you?" Nowell Waters asked.

"I'VE got a job of work to do," old Todd said; "and I got to get at it."

That evening after dinner Emmy was washing the dishes and she looked out through the screen door, but she did not see old Todd on his favorite stump, and she asked Effie if she knew where he was.

"Some foolishment of his," Effie said. "I do think he's getting weak in his mind. He come out of the barn with the lantern, and I said to him, 'Where you going, Pa?' and all he says is, 'Can't stop; I got a job of work to do.' Him! A lot of work he does these days! He went down to the brook and sat down."

"Yes," Emmy said, peering through the dusk, "he's down there now; I can see him."

They almost forgot him when the work was done, but Emmy remembered him.

"Grandpa is down by the brook yet," she said uneasily. "I guess I'll go down and see why he don't come in. It's getting right cold."

"He ought to have sense enough to come in when he gets cold," Effie said; but she made no objection when Emmy threw on a wrap and went out.

It was one of the cold, quiet nights that come in late June in the mountains, often bringing frost. A quawk flew over, uttering its cry. As she stepped off the porch Emmy heard the frogs chorusing in the drain near the barn, but she heard another sound. It came from where she could just see old Todd, one side of him lighted up by the glow from the lantern. It was a regular beat of sound, "clunk, clunk, clunk"—almost unintermittent—and as she drew nearer she saw old Todd's arm rising and falling regularly.

She found him sitting flat on the sand with the lantern at his side, and he looked up when she approached but did not stop his work. His legs were spread apart and between them was a large stone, one a foot or more in diameter, and in his right hand he held a smaller stone, one the size of a coconut. With his left hand, which was cupped, he was dripping pebbles no bigger than peas onto the larger stone and, as each dropped, he brought down his right hand and crushed the pebble into powder. When his left hand was emptied he reached out to where the small pebbles lay at the edge of the sand and scooped up a new handful. He smiled as he looked up at Emmy.

"Grandpa!" the girl cried. "What on earth are you doing?"

"Doing?" old Todd answered, whanging his hammer-stone down on a pebble. "Changing human nature, blame it! Time it was done, and nobody else seems to be helping it along."

"Yes; that's nice," Emmy said agreeably, for she was sure the old man had at last lost his mind. "But there's to-morrow, you know, Grandpa. It's getting too cold to sit out here like this. Won't you come in now? You'll have lots of time to-morrow."

"I'd better work a while yet, Emmy," old Todd said, although he was clearly shivering. "I'm making blamed slow progress as it is."

She urged him in every way she knew, but he was obstinate. He did not get angry, but he insisted that he had better work while there was oil left in the lantern, and even while he talked he continued to sift the small pebbles from his left hand and to crush them to dust with his hammer-stone.

Emmy went back to the kitchen. She was reluctant to tell about the new strange actions of old Todd, but it might mean his death if he was allowed to sit out there on the damp sand in the cold, and she told Ross and Effie. Roger, younger than Emmy by a year, and two younger children were in the kitchen, and Ross called Roger and the two went out to bring old Todd in.

He did not give them much trouble. His old legs were so stiff from being stretched out on the sand so long that when they took him by the arms and lifted him up they had to hold him erect for a minute or two before he could walk. Even then they had to support him. Ross cursed more or less as he helped the old fellow to the house, but old Todd seemed happy.

"Human nature's got to change, blame it!" he declared. "It ain't what it ought to be."

Before they reached the house he had twisted that into a sort of sing-song to an old tune—

"Old human nature ain't what it ought to be—
Ain't what it ought to be—
Ain't what it ought to be—"

He continued to hum this after they had put him in his chair in the corner of the kitchen, beating time to it as he slapped his cold hands on his chilly knees. Emmy put a shawl over his shoulders, and even Effie insisted that he drink a cup of hot coffee, which he took willingly enough.

"I never in my days heard of such doings!" Effie complained. "You'll have all the folks thinking you're crazy, Father, if you go and do things like that. What do you think you were doing, anyway?"

"PARSON WATERS says to me," said old Todd, like a child repeating a lesson or a message, "'Human nature ain't going to change till the rocks are all dust;' and I know blame well there's plenty of human nature 'round here needs plenty of changing. 'Rocks to dust,' he said; 'Rocks to dust!' Parson Waters's own words—'Rocks to dust!' I'm just helping along a little, Effie. Don't you mind me; I'm just an old fool these days. 'Rocks to dust, then maybe human nature'll change,' Parson Waters said. Yes, yes!"

Effie looked at Ross and shook her head sadly, and Ross frowned and understood her. When Roger and Jessie and Grace went up to bed the girls asked Roger anxiously what was the matter with old Todd.

"Grandpa's loony," he told them; "but you needn't be afraid of him; he ain't dangerous. If he gets dangerous, Father will put him away, you bet."

Ross was in the barn the next morning when old Todd took his stick and went

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

CHRYSLER OFFERS A PRICE AND TYPE FOR EVERY NEED

No one feature, no one model, is responsible for the public belief that Chrysler cars are superior cars. That confidence is based on the excellence found in every Chrysler—whether New "52," Great New "62," Illustrious New "72" or New 112 h.p. Imperial "80"—and the knowledge that in performance, quality and value, each Chrysler is leader in its class. Chrysler alone is able to hold this position because Chrysler alone builds products in four price classes on the basis of Standardized Quality—the expression of Chrysler determination to build for value first and always.

All Chrysler models will be exhibited at the National Automobile Shows; and at special displays in the Commodore Hotel during the New York Show, Jan. 7th to 14th, and in the Balloon Room and entire lobby space of the Congress Hotel during the Chicago Show, Jan. 28th to Feb. 4th.

CHRYSLER "52-62-72 Imperial 80"

PRICED FROM $725 TO $3495 F.O.B. DETROIT

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

stiffly across the road to his little sand patch and sat himself down and began breaking pebbles again; and Effie went to the barn, but Ross would not interfere.

"Let him alone," he said. "Long as he is mashing stones he ain't doing any harm, and the Lord knows he won't run out of pebbles."

So they let the old man alone. Emmy and the children would go down to talk with him now and then, and the younger children played at helping him when they felt like it, powdering the small pebbles in the same way old Todd was powdering them, and he was apparently grateful for their help.

"All the mountains has to be pounded into dust before human nature changes," he told them. "We got to work steady or we won't get anywhere much. Old human nature ain't what it ought to be—ain't what it ought to be—ain't what it ought to be—"

The younger children took up his rhyme and chanted it, hardly knowing they were doing so, and more than once Effie batted them on an ear and told them for goodness' sake to shut it up. And so a week—possibly ten days—went by, and then the first boarders came.

To the boarders the brook was always fresh and new and delightful when they arrived, even though most of them had come to Todd Hibbard's place year after year, and the first day the first came they discovered poor old Todd sitting spraddle-legged there by the brook pounding his pebbles.

"And what on earth are you doing?" they asked him.

"Got to change human nature," old Todd said. "Parson Waters says there ain't no change to be looked for till all the mountains get powdered to dust, and I'm helping along. Yes, ma'am."

But he did not stop there. He was franker with the boarders, and explained that there was a sort of human nature around the place that would accept a man's farm from him and make a promise, and then refuse to give Emmy a thousand dollars that was hers by rights. He never missed a whack of his hammer-stone as he talked, but he did not let his mountain powdering interfere with his tongue, either.

"BUT I think that is outrageous!" Mrs. Littlecome said to Mrs. Trench. "I had no idea Ross Hibbard was that sort of man," and when more boarders came they talked about it too. They began by being cold to Effie and short with Ross, and presently the Cranes came, and Mrs. Crane said outright that she would not see her money going to any man who acted that way to a sweet girl like Emmy and a dear old man like old Todd; and when she packed up and left, she told Ross just what she thought about it. The whole air of the place was changed, and presently those who were left began to find fault with this and that, and they went, too.

And old Todd went right on changing human nature down by the brook. When there was a lull in the kitchen, his hammer-stone could be heard "clop-clop-clopping" on the pebbles, and they all knew he would continue to sit there and break pebbles. They remembered a stubborn streak he had under his jesting.

"Confound the old cuss!" Ross swore at last, and he went striding down to the brook. "Here!" he shouted at old Todd. "For cripes' sake, stop that! I'll give Emmy her money. I'll let her marry who she blame pleases. You got it so I can't keep a boarder on the place and nobody in the valley will say a decent word to me. Stop it, I tell you!"

All around Todd was pebble dust and pebble dust was on his clothes and his hands and in his scraggly beard; but he put down his hammer-rock and eased himself over onto his hands and knees and got to his feet. He rubbed his knees a minute or so, and then he looked down at the peck or two of dust and up and down the brook at the millions and millions of pebbles of all sizes, from a pinhead to a pumpkin, and he grinned.

"Well, I didn't help human nature so blame much," he said, "but I helped it some!"

He turned around and went limping up toward the chip yard calling his red hen—"Culloch! Culloch! Culloch!"

NEXT MONTH you will meet one of the biggest bridge builders in the country, yet when you read his name it may very likely mean nothing to you. Robert Z. Drake—it is said you cannot ride an hour over a road in the Mid-West without crossing a bridge which he has built either in part or its entirety—is one of the "great unknowns" whom this magazine delights to feature. But Drake is more than a bridge builder: he is an idealist whose unpatented inventions alone represent a discarded fortune; a man who hates a display of wealth and subscribes to the simple belief that he was put into this world to do good and foster happiness.

The Conquering Jungle

(Continued from page 15)

"went Dyak" for seven months, and of an American meteorologist who "went Dyak" in Borneo, and now lives like one.

But, you may say, perhaps it is as much the man as the jungle that causes those changes. In some cases this is true; yet it is a fact that any man living long in the jungle will admit himself to be a bit insane.

I saw the Borneo jungle in the same way that a man opens his eyes to find himself in a strange room. I went to sleep one night on a steamer in the Java Sea; when I went on deck at five o'clock the next morning we were threading our way up a small river clogged with water hyacinths, and with the jungle bending over our decks. A big gibbon with an orange rump sat in the top of a coconut palm with his back toward me, and glanced casually around as we passed. A splash of red and purple orchids against the deep green foliage caught my eye. The palms and lianas along the banks brushed our deck railings, and the backwash of the steamer rolled back into the jungle with a swishing, seeping noise. The only other sounds were the hushed coughing of our engines, and the ripple of water astern; a cautious group of noises that grated against the quietness of the jungle.

Two months later I was five hundred miles in the interior of Borneo, paddling up the headwaters of the Djoeloi with a crew of Malays and Dyaks. At night the jungle crawled and buzzed and sang and screamed with life; but in the daytime I could hear no sound but the dull, rhythmic beat of ironwood paddles against the gunwales of the dugout. For days I sat motionless in the stern, looking and listening for the slightest sign of life. At times, when the air currents were right, I could hear ants gnawing the hardwood trees, and the buzzing of mosquitoes in the lagoons back from the river. There was a feeling of suppressed motion that made me think of a sleeping volcano; and every morning, after the howling of the apes and the buzzing and crawling of the night had died away, I felt as if my every movement were being watched by thousands of hidden eyes.

GRADUALLY I began to sense that fear of the jungle that changes a man. Travel upon the silent rivers bred it, but cutting through the jungle increased it. For twelve days, I cut through a jungle covered with moss a foot thick, and so dark that I could not see my coolies fifteen paces behind me. The earth was a tangle of great tree roots and lianas that caught at my legs like live things; the ground oozed water at every step, and the atmosphere was dead and pungent with the odors of rotting vegetation.

Sometimes a long shaft of sunlight disclosed endless files of huge red ants, or a curious, scaly, orange and black creature that moved slowly along a thick root. Always there was a scattering of leeches on my hands, and by feeling around the back of my neck and my temples I usually found more of the black, rubbery things, fat with blood. At regular intervals I stopped to take off my shirt, pull up my trousers, and shave off the leeches with a razor-like knife, or touch them with the lighted end of a banana-leaf cigarette. Once I stopped cutting ahead, and rested for a moment, listening. I heard a faint hissing noise close by, and immediately struck out in that direction with my heavy knife. Something hissed madly, fell to the earth with a thump and attempted to scramble away. I looked, and saw that I had killed a deadly poisonous lizard.

Life was desperate on that jungle floor; it crawled and struggled to exist, as it had crawled and struggled for a hundred thousand years. But high in the treetops, a hundred and fifty feet above the earth,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Why changed motoring conditions demand a new margin of safety

Winter dangers lurk in "light oils"

How easy starting may cause lubrication troubles

Today the indiscriminate use of extra-light oils in winter to permit easy starting brings new dangers.

The yearly mileage of the average car is far greater today than it was a few years ago, and this extra mileage is largely winter mileage.

Would you deliberately increase your engine wear to permit easy starting? No. But you may if you carelessly accept any "light oil" offered you merely because it gives easier starting in cold weather.

Many such oils are offered today. While they may make starting easier, they fall seriously short in providing the margin of safety necessary to prevent dangerous gasoline dilution of the lubricating oil.

Too thin an oil fails to seal your piston rings adequately. The free use of the choke in starting brings extra gasoline into the combustion chambers. On compression and explosion strokes much of this raw gasoline is forced past the rings into the oil supply in the crank-case.

Then comes extra wear—serious wear—costly wear.

Gargoyle Mobiloil Arctic is especially manufactured to meet this problem of winter lubrication in most cars. Although fluid enough to provide easy starting, it has an exceptional richness that gives unusual protection against gasoline dilution.

Mobiloil Arctic has the full rich body and character that will resist dangerous dilution and provide thorough lubrication for all friction surfaces.

Mobiloil Arctic will circulate freely in your engine on the coldest days.

The winter lubricating advice of the Gargoyle Mobiloil Chart is approved by 182 manufacturers of automobiles and motor trucks.

With freezing weather at hand, it will pay you, (1) to drain off the used oil from your crankcase and (2) refill with the correct grade of Mobiloil—usually Mobiloil Arctic (see Chart at the left).

A single week of incorrect winter lubrication may easily cost you more than a whole year's supply of Mobiloil.

Keep a supply of Gargoyle Mobiloil Arctic on hand in your own garage. The 10-gallon drum or 5-gallon tipper box are convenient packages and afford about a season's supply. For touring or emergency use, the sealed quart cans are excellent as they can be carried in your car, ready for use at all times.

SPECIAL WINTER CHART

Mobiloil Arctic

should be used in Winter (below 32°F.) in all cars marked*.

PASSENGER CARS	1927	1926	1925	1924
Auburn all except Models 4-44 & 6-66	*	*	*	*
Buick	*	*	*	*
Cadillac	*	*	*	*
Chandler except Special Six	*	*	*	*
Chevrolet	*	*	*	*
Chrysler 4-cyl.	*	*	*
Dodge Brothers	*	*	*	*
Elcar all except Models 6-65 & 4 cyls.	*	*	*	*
Erskine	*
Essex	*	*	*	*
Flint	*	*	*	*
Hudson	*	*	*	*
Hupmobile	*	*	*	*
Jordan	*	*	*	*
La Salle	*
Locomobile	*	*	*	*
Marmon 8-cyl.	*
Moon	*	*	*	*
Nash	*	*	*	*
Oakland	*	*	*	*
Oldsmobile	*	*	*	*
Overland & Overland Whippet	*	*	*	*
Packard Six	*	*	*
" Eight	*	*	*	*
Paige	*	*	*	*
Peerless Models 60, 80 & Eight	*	*	*	*
Pontiac	*	*
Reo	*	*	*	*
Star	*	*	*	*
Studebaker	*	*	*	*
Velie	*	*	*	*
Willys-Knight	*	*	*	*

If your car is not listed above, consult the complete Mobiloil Chart at Mobiloil dealers' for your winter grade of Mobiloil.

GARGOYLE

Mobiloil Arctic

VACUUM OIL COMPANY MAIN BRANCHES: New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, St. Louis, Kansas City, Dallas

Other branches and distributing warehouses throughout the country

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

was sunlight and vitality. There, huge butterflies, gaudy as batiks, floated across shafts of sunlight, to be lost in darkness; immense locusts buzzed and zoomed in and out of hearing, and pyramids of scarlet fruit hung from the tops of vine-covered trees.

High above the earth, the jungle was a conservatory of extravagant beauty. Every tree, dead or dying, was the bed of brilliant orchids, air plants hung suspended like the chandeliers of a cathedral. Every bit of vegetable life gave birth to another; ferns lived on the trees, air plants lived on the ferns, and orchids and brilliant red and purple flowers sprang from their roots and gave their intoxicating sweetness to the myriads of butterflies and flying insects.

THE average person thinks of tigers, leopards, and snakes as the most fearful things of the jungle. They have never caused me any anxiety, and I do not know one man in Borneo who has ever lost a night's sleep because of wild animals. Unless I made a special habit of hunting them, I often went for weeks on end without seeing anything larger than a bird. If left alone the animals will mind their own business. Once I passed within a spear's length of a twenty-foot python, without knowing it until one of the Dyaks touched my arm.

No, it is not the wild animals that make man fear the jungle, for they invariably give warning; they can be seen, and fought against. The things that mold men over again are the creatures that cannot be fought—the malaria mosquitoes, the poisonous insects, the tiny snakes, the tropical storms, the whirlpools, the sleeping crocodiles and a thousand and one other small dangers which one must forever be on guard against if he is to live.

They breed the haunting fear that perhaps some moment he will be careless, that to-morrow or the next day he will make the slip that means the end. And this fear is magnified by the terrible silence of the jungle, that seemingly interminable fourteen-hour silence between nights. Men weaken under the constant strain of having to keep on guard in a silence that to the normal mind means peace and relaxation.

One afternoon I was sitting on the river bank waiting for the water to go down. I reached over to pick up a coconut I had been drinking, and quickly jerked my hand back and jumped to my feet. There was a scorpion beside the coconut, his purplish stinger lifted up to strike. After that I always looked down before I touched the earth.

I grasped a liana one time to pull myself up a bank, and a beautiful but exceedingly poisonous lizard fell on my shoulder. I knocked him off without being bitten; but afterward I looked above me as well as beneath me. Walking down to the river one evening, I brushed the tops of some low bushes with my hand and, suddenly realizing the folly of the act, jumped aside. To persuade myself that I was, after all, taking undue precautions, I walked back a few steps and examined the bushes. Lying like a dead stick across their tops was a snake whose bite can cause death within twenty minutes.

Some time later I went down to my bathing place at the river, to see the head and fore feet of an enormous crocodile sticking out of the water. He was basking in the hot mud, his livid white mouth wide open. I had swum in that spot for two days. I usually bathed with a dipper afterward, and when I did take the chance and dive in the river it gave me a queer, tingling sensation. On one of those "chances" a small fish bit me, and I nearly died of fright.

I have lain down on a log to rest, and been awakened suddenly by the bites of a swarm of red ants that practically covered my body. They bit like hot needles, and swarmed over my nostrils and ears, and under my clothing. A quick jump in the river got them off, but suppose I had been ill of a fever, and could not move? I have awakened in the mornings to find mosquitoes packed over my double netting like huckleberries, pressing it down to within six inches of my face, deafening me with their buzzing for blood. I have heard them over a mile away, rising with the morning mists in clouds that blotted out the course of the river.

On a beautifully clear day, toward mid-afternoon, we were rounding the bend of a river when a terrific roaring sounded ahead. The coolies succeeded in reaching shore just as a great wave of water, about two feet high, charged down the valley in a torrent of foam. It swept by us like a stampede, uprooting trees, and sucking away the bank with its backwash. The river rose eighteen feet by night; there had been a cloudburst in the mountains. Sometimes men do not reach the shore in time, and water-logged dugouts are seen floating in the backwater of the pools.

These are all little things to be sure, but they have a habit of recurring when one least expects them. In time, of course, I took them for granted and instinctively guarded against them; but in the meantime they had bred a subconscious fear of the jungle—the great generic thing that had given them birth and could produce millions more like them every hour.

ALTHOUGH a man may become hardened to these things, a woman never does. I have seen the wives of some of the young officers who go out on jungle patrol. For several days before a husband's return his wife can scarcely sleep or eat; and at dawn on the day of his arrival she is standing on the bank of the river watching the bend above, hoping and praying that his dugout will come down again once more.

There are men who cannot face the jungle alone. Love it as they may, they cannot stand up against it without the occasional relief that companionship affords. In Poeroek-Tjahoe they told me of the recent death of an elderly captain over on the Mahakam River. This captain, they said, was unmarried, and was bivouacked twenty days away from the outpost of the nearest white man, a young lieutenant. They were the only white men in this vast section of the jungle, and were close friends.

One day a dugout of Malays came down the river, and brought up at the captain's bivouac. Lying in the bottom beneath the shade of a rattan mat was the lieutenant, shrunken to a skeleton and delirious with fever. He died that night.

The captain sat awake by the body all that night and the next day, eating nothing. That evening, an equatorial storm broke loose, and the river became a pounding, foaming flood of muddy water. Very methodically the captain shaved, brushed his hair, and carefully put on his best uniform. Then he buckled on his sword, and sat beside the body until morning.

The river was rising to its height when he called his four best soldiers and told them to prepare the large dugout. They refused, knowing that to travel in such a river was certain death. At the point of his revolver, however, the dugout was manned by the four Malays, and, once released from the shore, it sped downstream like an arrow. The captain, silent and magnificent in his dress uniform, stood in the bow, his eyes fixed straight ahead. At the first rapids the dugout dipped under a wave and disappeared. By some miracle all the natives reached the bank safely; but the captain had given himself to the jungle that he had fought and loved, but could not face alone.

THE constant dangers of the jungle breed a philosophy of fatalism in the white man. He never knows when he is going to die. He may be stung by a scorpion, or bitten by a bush snake; a native whom he has angered may send a poisoned dart into his neck. Traveling up the river, an equatorial flood may sweep down around a bend and destroy the dugout and all its occupants; traveling down the river, the rapids may dash him against the great boulders and send him into the whirlpools. Any one of a thousand things may take his life. He never knows when the end is coming. Through sheer recklessness he builds up courage to hold the jungle at bay.

At the headwaters of the Barito River I came upon such a man—a Dutch lieutenant bivouacked with his patrol of Javanese convicts and Malay soldiers. He was nearing the end of his patrol in the jungle, and if the moon had come to earth he could not have been more surprised than he was to see me. We were perhaps the first two white men ever in the center of the Borneo land of the snake-eaters.

This man, still in his middle thirties, was the virtual king of an immense realm of jungle. For upward of eight years he had been living among the head-hunting tribes, trying to keep peace among them, bringing them to justice, and laying down the law. A thatched hut on the river bank was his castle, but in it he demanded respect as an Oriental emperor.

One night, by the light of pitch torches, I sat behind him while he squatted on a rattan mat in singlet and cotton drawers before a half-circle of forty-three tattooed head-hunters. All of them were armed with long knives, and their black eyes glistened like oil in the flickering light. One of them had been convicted of an offense, and was receiving his penalty.

Talking all at once, his friends tried to help him by concocting alibis, endeavoring to confuse the facts of the case. Now and then they broke into several different dialects, hoping to reach the ear of their comrade alone. But the lieutenant knew all the dialects, and his voice boomed over their heads in the same tongue, reprimanding them for trying to make a fool of him. They cowered before him like beaten dogs—forty-three against one!

He knew that his life in the jungle was

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Come on! Please! Let's go this once!"

BUT NO. She is "too tired"—as usual. It's little episodes like this—repeated again and again—that wreck marriages. And so often the woman who "fails to stay young with her husband" has only herself to blame.

Neglect, or misunderstanding, of the delicate problems of feminine hygiene so often leads to inertia, premature old age and needlessly unhappy marriage.

Yet there is no mystery about feminine hygiene, as there was a generation ago. The correct information and simple rules about it are contained in the booklet pictured below. It is offered to you free by the makers of "Lysol" Disinfectant. It is called "The Scientific Side of Health and Youth." Its author is a woman physician who puts her sound professional advice in frank, understandable language. Simply send the coupon. The booklet will reach you in a plain envelope.

In the meantime, don't take needless chances. You may cause irreparable harm. Buy a bottle of "Lysol" Disinfectant today at your drugstore. Complete directions come with every bottle.

Made by Lysol, Incorporated, a division of Lehn & Fink Products Company. Sole distributors Lehn & Fink, Inc., Bloomfield, N. J. In Canada, Lysol (Canada) Limited. Distributed by Lehn & Fink (Canada) Limited.

© Lehn & Fink, Inc., 1928

Lysol Disinfectant

REG. U.S. PAT OFF

"Lysol" Disinfectant is sold at retail only in the brown bottle packed in the yellow carton.

Send the coupon now

LEHN & FINK, Incorporated, Sole Distributors
Department 107 Bloomfield, New Jersey

Please send me, free, your booklet,
"The Scientific Side of Health and Youth"

Name.....

Street.....

City..... State.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

as uncertain as the weather, and he realized the utter futility of trying to be cautious and be king. He did things in bold strokes, and laughed at the consequences. If the jungle wanted him, the jungle could take him. As long as there was life within him he would be regal.

With his little handful of superstitious, Dyak-fearing Malays, he tracked down head-hunters, entered their villages, and cowed them through sheer will-power. The fear of him was felt for hundreds of miles, and when the word went forth that he wanted a certain man for head-hunting or stealing, that man often gave himself up rather than be hunted down.

I never saw him carry his dugout around a rapids. With his crew of selected Dyak paddlers he sped like an express train to the very lip of the roaring white water, stood up to have a look, and then let her go. The natives, powerful and quick as leopards, twisted the craft through with their broad paddles, and knocked off the tops of the leaping waves, singing wildly and shouting that they had killed the river ghost. The lieutenant always got through, yet he never knew when he would see white water for the last time.

He had a brilliant mind, but it had begun to decay in the jungle. Forced to depend upon his ears and eyes for his salvation, his mind had gradually adapted itself to those problems. The question of whether or not Bacon wrote Shakespeare's plays was insignificant compared to what caused a certain crackle in the underbrush; and the problems of national armament or the five-cent fare were positively laughable. How much more important were the curious machinations of the Dyak mind; how much more compelling was the problem of food?

ADVENTURE? No man of this type will ever tell you that there has been an adventure in his life. What excitement is there about surviving one Dyak attack after another, or coming through the rapids alive day after day? It means just that much more fighting against the jungle until one is eventually taken. Life means very little, for he sees it born and destroyed regardless of value. It is a constant battle, and the living of it is painful. It is only by conquering it that he can exult.

But try to convince one of these men that he ought to leave! In Poeroek-Tjahoe I met an officer who talked repeatedly of the time when his term of service would be ended, and he would go North, where the breezes were fresh and cool, where the sun was not poisonous, and where one could see white people in any number. Suddenly, as if to test him, word came that he was to be transferred to a northern post. I have never seen a man more disheartened. His life's work, he said, would be ended. Then he became angry and talked to his superior officer. He convinced him that he was needed in the jungle, and that no other man could handle his work. Of course he stayed; they all stay.

And it takes that kind of man to survive in the jungle. He must have a touch of feldspar in him to hold his own. The jungle is always encroaching, never sleeping. Day and night it grows on, to cover the land and meet the sea from whence it sprang. Cut down a tree, and three more grow up in its place. Make a clearing in the forest, and in two weeks it is covered by foliage. Kill an animal, and a million poisonous insects are bred; have pity, and you die. The white man lives by striving to conquer, and it is the conquest that kills him.

THERE is a sadness about the people of the jungles; a sadness that only those of us who pity our ancestors and have progressed from superstition into reason can begin to see or appreciate. It was only after I had felt the influence of the jungle myself that I began to realize how utterly hopeless it is for the Dyak ever to rise above his present level of intelligence. I had seen my own Malay and Javanese coolies gradually "go Dyak." I had my most trusted soldier, who was reared in a mission school and professed Christianity, cry out in the night that the river ghost was drowning him. I had seen his eyes burn bright with the fever of superstition, and I had caught a strange expression in his face as we watched a witch-doctor dancing in a Dyak village. He began to drink blood for strength, and three months later, in Poeroek-Tjahoe he sneaked off into the jungle to find a medicine man. It was pathetic to see the jungle overwhelm this man and take him in, body and soul. It was thrilling to realize, as my pulses pounded with the drums at a head-hunting dance, that, with a few superfluous brain cells torn from my head, I might easily "go Dyak" myself.

The Dyak is as much a part of the jungle as any wild plant. He has the jungle's silence, its treachery, and its incomprehensibility. He ministers to it like a vassal, understanding its moods, and thinking of it as Creation itself. I think if a Dyak should stand motionless in the jungle, he would begin to take root. Lianas would drop from his shoulders, ants crawl across his feet, and birds and monkeys scamper through the tangles of his hair. Unlike the white man, he does not live and die by conquest; he lives by submission.

You say that I have given only the brutal and unlovely side of the jungle, and so I have. I have given you the rough surface that takes the veneer of civilization from a man in three months, and leaves him an animal. But there is truly another side, beautiful and compelling, that haunts the imagination of every man who has known it—nights when the air is rich and cool, scented with the subtle odors of wild hyacinth and poengoen blossoms, and tingling with the hum of insect life. A fish splashes in the river, and leaves widening phosphorescent circles; far off an orang-utan howls at the moon like a lost man calling for help. Along the shadowed mud banks the wild boar grunt lustily in their feeding, nose the air, and scamper into the undergrowth like rabbits.

There are nights in the Dyak villages when the medicine drums thud throughout the jungle to drive away the devils of the bewitched; when legends of flying ghosts are told by old men with ivory in their ears, and stories of tribal wars and feuds and head-hunting victories roll from the tongues of the young bloods. There are beautiful nights when the warriors dance like peacocks in the flickering torchlight, when the women bend and sway to the intoxicating rhythms of an organ-like music, and the medicine-man claws the earth. This is the wild beauty of the jungle, caught by a half-mad race.

The evening before I began my return to civilization, I was sitting quietly upon the river bank watching an old man making fish cord from shredded wood, when the sound of a gamelan boomed from the village across the river. In deep, methodical beats the drumming leaped from the distant huts, held with a numbing vibrance in the air, and became the undertone of a second time-worn booming. In it there was the feeling of centuries of seasoned wood, the lumbrous, revolving cycle of jungle life, and all the savage imagery of death. If the coppery clouds of a thunderstorm were touched with a mallet they would give forth just such a sound. Faster they came, to a barbaric measure, almost a tune. Then slowly, and more slowly, with a tireless deliberation, until the jungle was flooded with the sound and exuded it reluctantly, stealthily, long after the drumming had ceased.

Almost immediately from the huts behind me, women and girls dressed in their finest clothes descended the notched logs and walked to the trails at the edge of the clearing. They were awaiting the nightly return of their men from the paddy fields.

FOR perhaps a half-hour I sat quietly, my ears eager for the dull chunking of paddles, the pattering of feet upon wet clay. My eye caught a lean dog slipping past the supports of a hut with a noiseless wolf trot. To the left, three women, leaning forward under the weight of children which they carried on their backs, were beginning to ascend the notched log of a hut. A man with a heavy pack on his back and carrying a spear lancewise followed in the company of several trotting dogs. From the openings in the jungle four more dusky figures stooped forward, paced by dogs, followed by dogs. They passed unconcerned, and still others came into the clearing. From the left, from the right; from up the river bank and from every opening in the forest they slipped unnoticed, like evening flights of wild geese.

Smoke began to drift out from the sides of the huts, and with the sudden darkness, flames leaping high within, silhouetted figures that moved about slowly, half-stooping, half-crawling, like beasts in a cave. Except for the occasional yelp of a dog the village was still. The jungle held the silence, and I was alone.

No, the white man will not conquer the jungle.

"WHAT'S THAT ON MARS!" There's something, all right, and Dr. W. H. Pickering, one of the greatest of astronomers specializing on this planet, tells you about it next month. He offers an explanation of the so-called "canals" on the red planet, tells of designs that have appeared in the Martian vegetation, and concludes by saying that "life on Mars is almost certain!"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

As though phantom wings kept the wheels from touching . . . .

Captivated by the spirit of aviation—the world today demands new zest in motoring . . . Now comes the Airman—offering sustained high speed, smoothness and comfort comparable only to air flight.

For Franklin has dared to ask, "How does the modern airplane make such fast time?" And "sustained high speed" is found to be the answer.

Airman riding—with flexibility of chassis, scientific light weight and full-elliptic spring design—is acclaimed as the automobile's nearest approach to flying.

Effortless steering—easy, convenient control—a hold on the road that is tenacious and reassuring—these and quick-acting, synchronized, 4-wheel hydraulic brakes, all contribute to the Airman's reputation as the most comfortable mile-a-minute car ever built.

The Airman—with a time-proven air-cooling system that has no water to boil, freeze or leak—comes forth with the already highly-efficient Franklin engine enlarged by 24%—offering new super-abundance of power for hills and quicker acceleration to top speed.

The total result makes the Airman Owner the proudest motorist on the highway. For he has an unusually trouble-free car, handsome in design and finish, that maintains high average speed with comfort and safety—the world's fastest car in a day's run.

We assure you that a trial drive in this remarkable Airman will prove a motoring pleasure new to your experience. Why not arrange it today?

FRANKLIN AUTOMOBILE COMPANY, SYRACUSE, NEW YORK

FRANKLIN
Airman Series

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You've Got to Rub People the Right Way

(Continued from page 19)

that they would be unbearable, and moments of depression so deep that we never could climb out had we not learned to laugh. We all need as keen a sense of humor as the man who watched all his savings, in the shape of a fine building, burn to the ground a few hours after the insurance had lapsed. Looking down on the smoking ruins he laughed. A bystander who knew that the man's whole fortune had vanished, asked in surprise,

"'What on earth are you laughing at?'

"'Well,' said the bankrupt man, 'it's so absolutely complete!'

"That's the brand of humor that makes things go. That and optimism. I believe in being an optimist. The only optimist that is a menace is the one who does his believing without any accompanying work. I also believe in luck. Without doubt luck is a factor in every man's life; but the thing that endures and comes through is not luck.

"Some years ago, when I was superintendent on the Erie, a young man came to me applying for a position. He was a stranger and had no introduction of any kind. I liked him the minute I saw him.

"'I'm a graduate of Penn State College,' he announced, 'and am just out. Here's my diploma. I haven't a cent, in fact I'm in debt. My mother is partly dependent on me. I want a job.'

"I looked him over. A well-set-up, cheerful young chap.

"'I'm sorry,' I said honestly; 'but I haven't a thing open that would suit you.'

"He shook his head.

"'You don't get me,' he said. 'I want work; you must have something.'

"'Will you take a pick and shovel and work on a gang?' I asked.

"'Sure will,' he replied. I gave him a paper to the foreman of the gang. The next morning before seven he passed my house with the pick and shovel on his shoulder. I asked about him after two weeks. He was a fine workman. In a few weeks more he was foreman of a gang. He worked for a year and a half, during which he was promoted several times. Then he came to me again.

"'I'm out of debt and I've saved some,' he said. 'I want to be a surgeon. If I can be assured that if anything happens to me my mother will be safe, I'll quit here and work my way through medical college. I'll be back during vacations.'

"We managed a plan so that he was freed from anxiety as to his mother, and he went to Philadelphia. Every vacation he was back, taking the first job vacant. If he was asked to dig ditches, he dug them. He never welshed. I have no idea where that man is now. But he became a surgeon, and one thing I am certain of, he's a good surgeon. Luck? I suppose he was lucky that I gave him that first job. But it wasn't luck that pulled him through."

IT HAS not been luck that has made the prosperity of the Lehigh Valley Railroad during the ten years that President Loomis has been its head. Indeed, for the first five years of his administration the only luck on the horizon was bad luck. He came to the presidency in 1917, a year when every effort was being made to ship enough goods from this country to war-ridden Europe. In January, 1918, his road passed under government control and was operated as a unit of a general system. In 1920, when it was returned to private management, there followed the trainmen's strike, the miners' strike, and the shopcraft strike. As the Lehigh Valley in those days depended for half of its freight upon the coal mines, the miners' strike affected the road profoundly.

Loomis spent his energies in developing new freight possibilities to help the road to keep running. He was so successful in this that of the eight roads most affected by the coal strikes, the Lehigh Valley probably suffered the least. In 1922, when post-war conditions settled to a more placid level, he was at last able to put into practice a cherished plan of administration, one that is said to be without parallel in railroad running.

Long before he came to the Lehigh Valley Loomis had decided that the day of the empire builder had passed. The efficient railroad man of the future would not, he believed, be the one who built a road through the wilderness but the man who turned his attention to the internal workings of his organization. The need of the future would be for managers of men, not for courageous and hardy pioneers.

BUT with the growth of the roads and the increasingly large numbers of employees there had grown a habit of handling men en masse, taking them in and throwing them out when they proved unfit, much in the manner that the mechanical parts of the road were handled. The remedy for this, Loomis believed, was close touch with every individual worker, and the employment of men as leaders who were capable and sympathetic leaders.

"When I was a young man and had just started on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western," he told me, "I was put in charge of its anthracite properties. I didn't know much about anthracite at that time, but I had some experience in managing men. There was one mine where the driver boys struck every few days. I looked up their boss. He was a good man, regular, hard worker, sober, honest, forceful, and he knew his job thoroughly. Yet we lost time and money every week because of the striking boys. After two weeks I transferred the boss to a place where he worked by and for himself. I put in his place a man less capable and who knew how to handle boys. From that day there were no more strikes, and the work speeded up.

"It does not matter how able a man is, how thoroughly he knows his job, or how hard he works, he cannot be a first-class leader unless he rubs people the right way. I am well aware that there are many men who are now the heads of large organizations who do not rub people the right way, but I maintain that they detract from their achievements by their lack of popularity.

"You can't," says Loomis, "rub people the right way unless you know them well; and to know them well you must be in close touch with them."

It is on this policy that the organization of twenty-two thousand employees of the Lehigh Valley Railroad is built. For Loomis to know so many employees personally and intimately was obviously impossible, so he created seven new jobs upon the road, one for each of its divisions. These places carried the title "supervisor of employment," and for them he selected employees who were characterized as leaders of men from his own standpoint—that of getting along with a minimum of friction and keeping up with standards of work. The seven men appointed had served in various capacities. One had been a yardmaster, one a telegrapher, another a trainmaster, another an assistant chief clerk, and three had been supervisors or superintendents of departments. Loomis called these men his "fingers," because their sole duty was to keep in touch with the employees on their divisions, and with the men in the vicinity who might become employees of the road. The president directed the experiment in person. He carefully coached the seven men. What he said to them was unusual:

"When you ask questions of an applicant for a position make him believe that you want to help him, rather than find out how much he does or does not know.

"As far as possible, become the firm friend and adviser of all men on your division. Listen to them sympathetically, try to understand their problems, and aid them in every way possible.

"If a man is not happy in his work, he will not do good work. He will not progress and the company likewise will suffer. It costs a lot to train new men, and they are expensive until they get educated to their positions, which emphasizes the importance of obtaining the right men for the right jobs. Applicants should be aided in deciding which branch of the service they want to follow. Your experience should be of great help to them in this respect.

"It is the contented employee who makes a good railroad."

THUS primed, the new supervisors started out upon their duties. They never employed or discharged men; their capacity was purely advisory. And it was understood that any employee of the road could take any problem to his supervisor. In addition to their personal touch, Loomis arranged that the operating superintendent of every division should interview a number of employees every week, and write a detailed report every week to the General Manager. Loomis has read those reports for five years. When necessary he sends a personal letter in reply to any problem.

A man taken on the Lehigh Valley, no matter how humble his position, is introduced to his fellow workers, and they are specifically asked to look out for him as a new man.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

At Fourteen and at Forty the same attractive SMILE

Glowing with Healthy Lustrous TEETH

How many can boast that* their *teeth have stood the test of time

IN years to come, what kind of teeth will your smile disclose?

Gleaming teeth, sound teeth, unspoiled, attractive teeth?

If you are anxious to preserve the flash and charm of your smile, to keep it bright and wholesome as long as you live, take this one simple precaution:

Protect the health and soundness of your teeth by the proven methods only. In this country, and in foreign countries the world over, you will find thousands and thousands of men and women who began using Colgate's ten, fifteen, even twenty years ago, and whose teeth today are exceptionally sound and beautiful.

Many of these people are grateful enough to write us. Some send their photographs also. Each day the postman brings a few more letters to add to an already bulging file. Many of these letters come from users who have brushed with Colgate's for at least a decade. We could fill the pages of this magazine with quotations from them—sincere, unsolicited reports from people proud of the soundness and attractiveness of their teeth.

There is nothing mysterious about these enviable results. The men and women fortunate enough to secure them did nothing that you cannot easily do yourself.

They visited their dentist for periodic inspections. And they used Colgate's.

CLEAN

Years ago we set out to make the best dentifrice possible. Our chemists made countless experiments; we interviewed the leading dental authorities. They told us that the one thing a dentifrice should do is to clean the teeth. We then produced Ribbon Dental Cream—designing it to do that one thing superlatively well. It is not medicated, because the testimony of leading dental authorities today sustains the original principle that the one function of a dentifrice is to clean teeth.

Colgate & Co. Est. 1806

Choose your dentifrice on the basis of results. Follow the lead of those who have already kept their teeth sound for years. Simply adopt for your own use the dentifrice most popular among people with well-preserved teeth.

On the one hand you have Colgate's, the chief and only feature of which is thorough cleansing. On the other, you have the fact that countless people who have used Colgate's for years now have exceptionally fine teeth.

In such a vital matter as the care of your teeth, could there be any safer guide than the actual experiences of people like yourself?

Also wouldn't it be an immense satisfaction to know that the dentifrice you were using was the one which dentists recommend most frequently?

So for lovely teeth—for teeth that make your smile the social and business asset that it should be—ask your druggist today for Colgate's. Or, if you prefer, try the free sample offered in the coupon.

Colgate & Co., Dept 201-A
595 Fifth Ave., New York

FREE

Please send me a sample of this cleansing dentifrice.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

In Canada, Colgate & Co., Ltd., 72 St. Ambroise St., Montreal

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

There are other phases of the Loomis plan which are too detailed to be described in a short article. The gist of it is here. For five years it has been consistently followed, and for five years Loomis has traveled continuously on the road, keeping in as frequent touch with the men as he possibly can. "My office," he says, "is on wheels." The results are remarkable.

The workers, free to talk with someone not directly over them, have figured largely in the nature of the developments. They asked for and got the first participating group insurance on any road. They have their own savings-fund society, backed by the road. They asked for an old building at the main shop center, Sayre, Pennsylvania, to be used as a social center. Loomis gave them the building and the materials with which to improve it, with the understanding that the work was to be done by the men out of hours.

This building and others at various other shop centers along the road have developed as social and study centers. The employees have formed all kinds of social organizations, orchestras, clubs, and athletic associations. To meet expressed needs a cafeteria was started at the Sayre Building. It is run by the employees on a coöperative basis, and is in charge of the Ladies' Auxiliary. Because the workers wanted them, there have been classes in foreman training, held under the Department of Engineering Extension of the State College of Pennsylvania.

THE significant thing about these movements is that they were not imposed or suggested by the road but by the men who work on it. The road sanctions them and helps if needed, but, by far, most of the undertakings are self-sustaining. The results in the internal workings of the company have been so to develop the employees as to make a smooth-functioning machine that stands out as noteworthy. If a man on the Lehigh Valley has a grievance, he takes it to his supervisor. There is in the Loomis plan a committee to which grievances, which cannot be satisfactorily adjusted, are to be referred. It has never been called upon to act!

As the intimate talks between superintendents and employees went on and the employment supervisors became friends with the men, there came about an understanding of the problems met by the road, and of their relation to them. In essence it was simple: If the road prospered through efficient running and sufficient business, the men prospered. If the road was hard up, they would be out of work. That law governs any business.

The men on the Lehigh Valley realized their responsibility to the road. They wanted to hold their jobs. They liked them. The first move was made by the Ladies' Auxiliary at Sayre, wives and daughters and mothers of the men on the road.

These women set about boosting the road and soliciting business for it from the merchants and tradesmen with whom they dealt. Employees followed their example. In some cases they have issued local publicity material, writing the copy and distributing it among themselves. A fair sample of this work is the following, written and distributed by the Maintenance of Equipment Association and the Athletic Association at the Sayre Shop:

Steady Employment on the Lehigh Valley

To Fellow Employees:

The first step in our campaign to keep L. V. R. R. employees steadily at work was a letter to all shippers and receivers of goods in this vicinity, urging them to use L. V. R. R. lines as much as possible in all their movements of freight.

The next step is squarely up to every man employed by the L. V. R. R., for "The Lord helps those that help themselves." You can be of great assistance in keeping yourself and fellow employees at work if you will earnestly strive to carry out the following suggestions:

1. Be loyal to the Lehigh Valley, not only in your work, but by telling of its unexcelled service and advantages to all travelers and shippers whom you meet.
2. Buy your coal, food, and merchandise from those who ship and receive freight over the Lehigh Valley.
3. Urge your friends to patronize the merchants and business men who ship via the Lehigh Valley.
4. Tell your merchants that over one half of the freight charges they pay are paid out in wages, and so benefit them.
5. Be saving in your work and time. Efficient labor and careful use of material means more money for the company to spend on the great amount of work always waiting to be done.

Your coöperation in carrying out these suggestions will insure steady employment and prosperous conditions for all.

There are no bonuses paid for business thus secured, no commissions. The workers feel that they are a part of the road and that their reward will come through it.

With the growth of a working organization that consciously set out to obtain business, as well as improve itself, how could the Lehigh Valley fail to forge ahead? In 1917, when Loomis took charge, the operating revenues in a year when the road was rushed with war-time traffic were $53,000,000. In 1926 they were $80,000,000. The stock has almost doubled in value. Incidentally, this road was one of the first to sell stock to its employees, and many of them, particularly the Veterans' Association, which is a group of three thousand employees who have been with the road twenty years or more, own stock.

WHAT kind of man is this Loomis who has developed a singularly intelligent organization of workers, who are bound firmly together in loyalty to the road they serve? Whence have come his unusual ideas? I could get little from him concerning his boyhood.

"That part of my life has hardly any bearing on the present," he said. "What matters has happened since I began to work. Mine is no hard-luck story and I never suffered privation. My childhood was very comfortable and so was my youth."

Yet Loomis has made himself. He went to work because he wanted to work, and he climbed step by step to his present position. In addition to his presidency of the Lehigh Valley he is ex-officio its chairman of the Board of Directors, and to these duties he adds those of a directorship in forty-five other companies.

He comes of Connecticut Yankee stock, and his forbears came over in 1638, settling at Windsor, Connecticut. From there the younger members of the family migrated to what is now Herkimer County, New York. There they farmed, ably, so that each succeeding generation was better off than the preceding one.

When Edward Eugene Loomis was born his father owned several farms and the family was what in those days was called "well-to-do." He spent a happy, care-free boyhood and a happy, care-free youth. He went to private schools, played about a good deal socially and had a royal good time. While staying in New York with a cousin of his own age, and enjoying distinction as a cotillion leader, he suddenly decided to go to work.

A friend got him a job as clerk in the office of the New York attorney of the Denver and Rio Grande. He began to read law. But before long he knew that he was more interested in the railroad end of the business than the legal end. From the law office he went to the Erie, as a clerk, rising eventually to chief clerkship to the general manager, in charge of thirty men. All of these were white-collar jobs in a day when getting ahead on a road meant beginning in the operating field. Loomis was fascinated by the railroad game. He intended to get ahead in it; but he saw no reason why the white-collar end was not as good an end to start with as any other. He still holds that opinion.

"A stenographer to a superintendent offers as good an opportunity as a boy can have," he said. "He can study management right there. He has to transmit orders. He learns in a small way how to tell men what to do. He has presumably a good example before him every day. A clerkship is not a dead place when a live man is in it."

IN 1894 Loomis graduated from the office into the superintendency of the Tioga Division of the Erie, with his headquarters at Elmira, his territory including also the coal and lumber properties at Arnot. He had managed clerks well for several years, but it was as superintendent that he demonstrated dramatically, as told in the beginning of this article, his ability to handle men.

He spent five years as superintendent of that division. During his first year he wanted a leave of absence to visit his family, and he went to the man directly over him and asked for a vacation. The general superintendent, a veteran of the road, looked at him with stern suspicion.

"Young man," he said, "you have a busy division which needs constant supervision. I've not taken a vacation in twenty years."

Loomis held his ground. As he says frankly, "I never duck." He doesn't; but his manner is very gentle, so gentle as to be disarming. He smiled at the old man who stood before him, and said respectfully but firmly:

"Well, sir, I can't help it; but I've a theory that it's a pretty poor superintendent who has an organization he can't leave for two weeks." His eyes twinkled, and after a moment's stare the older man capitulated.

"Son," he said, "I've an idea you're right. I'm going to take a vacation myself and find out."

Loomis believes in acting just the same with all conditions of men and with all ages. "Older men like to be treated on

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Me— I like a pipe

I DON'T attempt to speak for others. But as for me, I like a pipe . . . a pipe packed to the rim with good old P. A. What a dish that is for a pipe-hungry man! An easy chair, a newspaper, and a pipe-load of the grandest tobacco that just ever was. Say!

Are you one of those who feel that the joys of a pipe are not for you? "Tried it" and all that? Then let me urge you to try again. It's all a matter of clicking the right combination—a pipe and Prince Albert. You scent success in that first fragrant whiff.

And when you pack the bowl and apply the match, you break out in a smile that all P. A. smokers know. You've found your smoke . . . and your brand. How cool and sweet this long-burning tobacco is. What a marvelous taste it has. Pipe-load after pipe-load. Morning to midnight. Great!

No matter how fast and frequent you fill and puff, Prince Albert never bites your tongue or parches your throat. Men who were pipe-shy say Prince Albert is the one brand they can smoke and enjoy, seven days running. Get out that old pipe. Give it a new deal with P. A.!

P. A. is sold everywhere in tidy red tins, pound and half-pound tin humidors, and pound crystal-glass humidors with sponge-moistener top. And always with every bit of bite and parch removed by the Prince Albert process.

PRINCE ALBERT

—the national joy smoke!

© 1927, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Winston-Salem, N. C.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

your level and so do younger ones," he says. "I naturally talk the same way to everyone, but I believe in it as a policy."

In 1899 there was need of a man to whip into shape a certain section of the New York, Susquehanna and Western. Loomis was selected for the job. The employees there were unhappy and rebellious. In six months' time the railroad was running smoothly, and Loomis was promoted by being sent to the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western as superintendent. In 1902 he became vice president and member of the board of managers, and held this office until he became president of the Lehigh Valley.

His vice presidency in the Lackawanna will long be remembered because of one unusual contribution: Loomis has great natural ability in designing and sketching. Many of the most artistic passenger stations of that road were built from his original sketches. On both the Lackawanna and the Lehigh Valley he has insisted upon order in stations and shops, in an absence of litter, and in beautifying even the yards with flowers. His passion for flowers has become a personal hobby, and at his farm near Murray Hill, New Jersey, he has extensive greenhouses and raises fine roses.

IN ALL of his moving about, Loomis has made a point of leaving the force intact and working with the new organization as he found it. In one mining company where he was sent, as he says, "to whip it into shape," he spent an entire month getting acquainted. It was easy. Every man who headed a department had a grievance to air concerning another department and he was delighted to tell it to Loomis. At the end of the month Loomis assembled the heads of all departments.

"The only trouble with this organization," he said, "is that you are each interested only in your own department. You are here to work, not for a department, but for a company. No results worth while can come from a quarrelsome organization. You can bury your differences, start afresh, or present your resignations as you leave this room."

Nobody presented a resignation. In six weeks the new spirit of coöperation had completely changed the organization. And the heads had become friends.

"One of the biggest troubles a mining or a railroad head has in promoting men," said Loomis, "is with the men who have worked their way up. I know this applies to my own industry. I think it applies in many others. Some men feel resentful if the other fellow finds an easy way up the ladder. The chap who started at the bottom can't forget all the hard knocks he got en route, and instinctively he expects those working for him to be prepared to take them too. Generally, it is difficult to convince him that times have changed, that handling labor twenty years ago is quite different from what it is now. To-day, if a man wants to succeed as a leader, he must make his men like him. He must have their respect, and he can get that only by fair treatment and a firm hand. Men like discipline. They have the common sense to know that only by discipline can results be accomplished. And any worker, high or low, wants to be a part of a going concern."

SO MANY PEOPLE mistake book-learning for education that it is extremely refreshing and enlightening to read an article which clearly sets forth the difference between these two. Next month in "Does Your Mind Hit on All Its Cylinders?" Dr. Frederick B. Robinson, president of the College of the City of New York, defines the truly educated man. A list of questions, specially prepared by Doctor Robinson, will enable you to discover whether you are educating yourself or merely getting by.

The Old Way and the New Way to Teach Children

(Continued from page 57)

are so much the richer, their intelligence keener, and their powers mightier.

The school is open, and life flows through like a vitalizing current. What good is a light that serves nobody? It is not enough that a child rig up a light and see it shine. Before the experience is complete, before it can truly enrich the child, that light must stand to him as a symbol of common need and common fulfillment. The little school job must tie up to the big outside job. It must convey the savor of life, if it is truly to educate him. And there lies the heart of the new education.

JUST when it seems that the class has about exhausted the subject for the time, the teacher calls the electric company and a big truck backs up to the door and unloads a moving picture story of electric lighting. The picture tells its story clearly and dramatically, but the teacher manages to slip in a helpful word now and then.

"We will show you how we make and store power," says he, and the show is on.

The lights flash out and the pictures flash in. There is a skyscraping building full of great rooms, where countless wheels are turning and workers coming and going. The huge dynamos whirr; the twinkling brushes are like greedy rivers, so fast do they sweep, the great containers are like huge ovens, ready to swallow any number of genii. The magic is stored, waiting the touch of a childish finger to free it for miracles beside which the wonders of Aladdin's lamp would pale.

"When we need light," explains the teacher, "we release this power in the way you are all familiar with. We'll show you what happens in the power-house when a big storm threatens to darken the city and make us all stop work in the daytime."

The children gaze spellbound at the picture before them. Great thunderheads loom in the western sky. High on the power-house is the storm detector and the signal man who reads its message. It marks the coming storm and the watchman signals the rooms below. Instantly they quiver with life. The wheels fly faster, and workers go here and there on important errands.

Darker and darker grows the sky; lightning cuts the dark cloud masses; the wind, advance rider of the storm, kicks up little puffs of dust, sends papers and dead leaves swirling high. "It's a big one," signals the watcher. "Turn on an extra line." More wheels turn; more workers take on added speed; more magic is stored.

The storm comes nearer. People quicken their steps; housekeepers haul in their clothes-lines; storekeepers furl their awnings and make them fast. A stenographer in an office high above the street snatches at her flying papers and slams down the window. A splash of rain like the smudge of a giant's hand across the face of the sky blots out the sky line, and the last glimmer of sunlight goes. Then a million fingers push a million buttons, and a flood of light sweeps the streets and shops of the darkened city. It is as though the sun shone through the storm. The children sit back and smile in satisfaction. The answer had come out right.

BUT the experience must be brought still closer. Next week the truck backs up again, this time unloading coils of wire and boxes and steel cabinets and a clutter of interesting things. "I showed you how we stored and used the current for lighting," the teacher says. "Now to-day we'll harness the power and use it."

Such a hitching and unhitching of batteries and wires, such testing and adjusting of this and that never was seen in any school save those of the newer way. Toasters and hot pads, lights and heaters, flatirons, vacuum cleaners, bells, radios, telephones—all the household equipment is here to show itself off to the admiring youngsters.

The teacher smilingly helps them experiment with the harnessed current, shows them how not to blow the fuse out, by blowing one out with a convincing bang. He lets them make all the connections he has made, so they get the feel of the electricity in their fingers and elbows, where it ought to be. Mine, you remember, was all in my notebook. At last the children can think of no more questions, no more stunts, and they help the teacher take down the wires and pack the boxes and load the truck.

"And now," says the class teacher, "I think we're about ready for the test."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A GOOD RESOLUTION

—"to use nothing but Firestone Tires throughout the coming year!" Let the family enjoy the safety advantages of Gum-Dipped Balloons and the freedom from trouble that their use insures. To the woman at the wheel Firestone Tires are essential to full enjoyment of driving. She revels in the comfort of the ride, confident that the wide, non-skid tread will hold in any road or boulevard — assured of freedom from slip, skid, or slide. She has the sure control of wheel and brake, so invaluable in heavy going. Let the nearest Firestone Dealer give you the benefit of his experience in tires. He will tell you why Gum-Dipped Balloons deliver added safety and luxurious riding with the long mileage which will produce a big saving in your budget. See him today.

The Mark of Quality

MOST MILES PER DOLLAR

Firestone

AMERICANS SHOULD PRODUCE THEIR OWN RUBBER . Harvey S. Firestone

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

But how shall a lesson like this be tested? How can one measure the educational profit from a series of experiences such as this brief study of electricity has offered? It is all very well to interest and amuse the children, delightful to watch them stringing their bells and batteries and lights, and making the wheels go 'round, but what has it meant to them in terms of personal power stored for future need?

Under the old régime, the teacher made out ten questions and the children answered them as well as they could. Their success depended upon what sort of questions the teacher asked, and that again depended upon how he felt at the time, what he knew best, what he liked best, what he wanted to correct, what he thought the class knew best, or, if he had a hypertrophied conscience, what would be most difficult for them.

He corrected them on the same wide basis. If he felt generous, he marked that way; if he felt hard and bitter, he marked that way. If he liked the pupil, that counted; and if he didn't, that counted too. One never knew what to expect from a test. Who at one time or other hasn't felt aggrieved at a teacher's marks?

By using the standard achievement tests, the personality of the teacher is left out of the testing. If the people who have been earnestly searching for newer and better ways of helping children to learn had done no more than establish these tests, they might well consider their search repaid in this great contribution of the growth of childhood's intelligence and power.

These tests are a set of standardized questions that represent what the great number of children of the same age and grade can accomplish under ordinary conditions. They have been compiled only after the most careful experiment and analysis of result. "This," says the teacher, "is what the boys and girls of this country can do on this job. Now let's see how you measure up to them."

The children accept the challenge as perfectly fair. They have the notion that they can do as well as any other children can do, and a little bit better. They take their test sheets and fill them out to the best of their ability. By and by, the teacher gives them an answer sheet with a key and they correct their papers.

The test has become an educational experience. The child has searched his mind for what it contains, compares the result with the standard and with that of his classmates, and is informed about himself.

THE old way put the responsibility for the teaching and the learning and the rating upon the teacher. The test was entirely the teacher's. He made the questions, he corrected the answers, he rated the papers, he recorded the marks in his book, and the pupil got the result in the form of a letter on his report card. The mark on the card was all he got out of the whole performance. Most of the time he never knew what mistakes he had made, and so never profited by them. The basis of the rating, the interpretation of it, its relations to him and his work were the teacher's secret.

It is an old and outworn viewpoint that permits a teacher to say, "Your marks are my private records." "Do what I tell you, and never mind why." "You keep out of this. I'm doing it." "Never mind what comes after this, you'll know when you get it." That means that the work is the teacher's. The will that rides to action is the teacher's. The school revolves about the teacher, and the child is a small pale moon that shines with the cool reflected light of the teacher's zeal.

The new way is better. The child may know his plan of work. He may discuss it with the teacher and organize it in the most economical fashion for his purpose. He has a chance to exercise his own intelligence upon his work and to bring in his neighbor if he feels he needs him. Education is becoming a social matter, and childhood is fast becoming a recognized society with rights and privileges and characteristics of its own. We have come further along the road to a better educational world than we know. How far I had not realized until not long ago an elderly, a massive, woman with the tread of a grenadier offered her services as a teacher in my school.

"I've been out of the system for some years," said she, "and they won't give me my license back again unless I can pass their examination. What do I want of an examination? I can teach. I've had a double A record for years and years.

"Well, I have to substitute around till I get my time in. I hear you have a new school, and I know I'm just the teacher you need for the special class. The toughs, you know. As long as there's a window pole in the room they'll not get by me. I can train Indians if you've got them. Nothing scares me."

"I haven't a class like that," said I. "You see, I couldn't use a teacher of your qualifications, having none of the children you describe."

"Humph. You haven't? You're lucky. I'll miss my guess if you don't need me, or the police, for the crowd I see in this neighborhood, young man. Good day to you." And she strode out as she had entered. But at least the children in my schools were safe from her gentle ministrations.

I would like to believe that all that was unseeing and useless and wrong in school-teaching went with her, but that time has not come yet. Life is not so simple, and school is a cross section of life. However, things are looking up for the children.

A Man With a Face Like Mine Has To Be a Self-Made Man!

(Continued from page 16)

would look through the rude, unbeautiful surface to the soul beneath. I hear that is what portrait painters do. So one of them got me to venture inside the studio of Joseph Cummings Chase.

Well, as a barer of my soul Joe turned out to be a fine bass singer. Anyhow, if the thing he bared was my soul I'm going to have to buy a ticket from a scalper to get past St. Peter. No, sir, there wasn't any soul there at all. There was nothing but me. You could look at the portrait—as some people did—and tell right off it was Bud Kelland. There was no deception, not a literary trimming. None of my lovely thoughts and fancies showed through. It was just me, and no more. Even the genius of a Chase couldn't add a jot or the fraction of a tittle to me.

Well, the editors thought maybe it was because the portrait was in oils, and, maybe, if they had one done in charcoal . . . So they commissioned Overhardt to try his hand at it, and to do a profile instead of full face. The idea being they got just half as many eyes and cheeks and ears, so, in any event, that picture couldn't be more than half as bad as the rest. But it turned out differently. Mr. Overhardt concentrated on the one eye and ear and cheek permitted to him, with the result that the picture resembled me twice as much as Mr. Chase's full-face view. A sort of condensed likeness. Putting all my eyes in one socket as it were.

After that, in despair, they had two or three cartoonists tackle the job. No luck. The answer of the editors every time was, "That ain't no caricature, it's a portrait." The idea being that the difference between a caricature and a faithful presentation was so slight as to be unnoticeable. . . . Now they are falling back on printing baby pictures of me, taken in the early eighties, and running captions under them that the above is what an author grows up out of. But they deceive nobody. I show through even at six months.

In other walks of life than authorship my personal appearance has betrayed me. I was once eminent in another field, that of education. I was, for six years, a member of the school board, and for one beautiful and thrilling year president of that body! I live in a wonderful town to be president of the school board in, and no wonder almost everybody prays nightly for the job. During the five years that I was just a common or garden member of the board, and during the one fateful year when I was its president, I so conducted myself as to endear myself to almost every man, woman, and child in Port Washington. My influence over the proletariat was little less than miraculous. Even taxpayers swore by me. . . . Well, at any rate, they swore. . . . All I had to do was propose a measure, to have the voters defeat it; that is how they depended on me to make up their minds for them. Well, the upshot of it was that by now I would have had a statue erected to

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

©1927 M.L.I. CO.

HIDING behind a mask, man's most dangerous enemy strikes in the dark and adds two out of every thirteen deaths to his score.

The Great Imitator

Just so long as men and women, and boys and girls approaching maturity, are not taught to recognize the cruelest of all foes to health and happiness—just so long will many lives be utterly wrecked, lives which could have been saved or made decently livable.

Strange as it may seem, tens of thousands of victims of this insidious disease (syphilis) are utterly unaware of the fact that they have it and that its malignant poison is steadily and surely robbing them of health and strength.

No other disease takes so many forms. As it progresses, it may mask as rheumatism, arthritis, physical exhaustion and nervous breakdown. It may appear to be a form of eye, heart, lung, throat or kidney trouble. There is practically no organic disease the symptoms of which it does not simulate. No wonder it is called "The Great Imitator".

It is the imperative duty of each man desirous of protecting his own health—and more especially the duty of every parent anxious to safeguard children—to know its direct and indirect results.

Syphilis is responsible for more misery of body and mind than any other disease. It destroys flesh and bone. Its ulcers leave terrible scars. It attacks heart, blood vessels, abdominal organs—and most tragic of all are its attacks upon brain and spinal cord, the great nerve centers, resulting commonly in blindness, deafness, locomotor ataxia, paralysis, paresis and insanity—a life-long tragedy.

Because of fear and ignorance, countless millions of victims have been wickedly imposed upon and hoodwinked by quacks, charlatans and worse—insidious blackmailers pretending to practice medicine.

The United States Government took a brave step forward during the Great War and told our soldiers and sailors the truth about this dread disease and what it would do if unchecked or improperly treated.

It can be cured by competent physicians if detected in time and if the patient faithfully follows the scientific treatment prescribed by his doctor. After the disease has been allowed to progress beyond the first stages, cures are less certain, but a great deal can often be done to help chronic sufferers.

Men and women should learn the truth and tell it in plain language to those dependent upon them for education and guidance. It is a helpful sign that the best educators deplore the old habit of secrecy and urge wide-spread knowledge and frank instruction.

It is estimated that more than 12,000,000 persons in the United States have or at some time have had syphilis.

From 5% to 40% of all the cases in the general hospitals of this country are found to be suffering—directly or indirectly—from this disease. The variance in the figures depends upon the character and location of the hospital.

According to Government statistics, the deaths of 200,000 Americans, each year, are directly caused by syphilis and associated diseases. But thousands of deaths charged to other causes are actually due to this disease.

Hospital and clinic records show that early infant mortality can be reduced one-half by pre-natal treatment of syphilitic infection.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company will gladly mail, free of charge, its booklet, "The Great Imitator". You are urged to send for it.

HALEY FISKE, President.

Published by

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—NEW YORK

Biggest in the World, More Assets, More Policyholders, More Insurance in force, More new Insurance each year

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

me by the Taxpayers' Association if only I had the personal appearance for it. But when it came to that point the populace arose and said, "He doesn't look like the president of the board of education, so he can't have a statue." A few of them, possibly a majority, stated what they thought I did look like; but they never erect statues of that—not even after his term is expired and he is released with a new suit and a five-dollar bill.

THEN there is the matter of committees. What I mean to say is that just because a man can write fiction of the sort an editor who looks like Merle Crowell will buy is no sign he can make a speech. But there are people who think so, and therefore I get invited to address bankers and alumni and boards of commerce and conventions of this and that and the other.

These excellent folks never think to send for a photograph but ask me sight-unseen. Then the committee meets the train to escort me to the hotel. It is always a sad, not to say depressing, sight. Invariably they bustle up to a large, distinguished-looking man and all but kidnap him before they discover he is not I. Generally, he is a plumber on a vacation or a salesman for pills, but he looks as I ought to look. Then, nobody else being left, they turn to me, and it is pitiful the way their faces fall. You can see them nudge each other, and you know what they are saying: "Great heavens! Is this what we draw? And four hundred and thirty-two people waiting to see him!"

You know right off they would get out of it if they could. They would like to ask me to sprain an ankle or elope with the cook or do any little chore which would make it unnecessary for them to present me as the distinguished guest.

At first it rather discouraged me, but after a while I got used to it, and missed it if it didn't happen. The only times it didn't happen was when there wasn't a welcoming committee and I had to sneak in by myself.

This, I should say, about closes the public aspects of my personal appearance, but there remain the more intimate and private aspects: how it affects my relations with my family and my friends and my acquaintances—and with casual strangers.

I have gotten to believe that I am the most completely unknown author in the world. In spite of the fact that I have tried for twenty years to make Clarence Budington Kelland a household mouthful, I feel that I have failed. Nobody ever recognizes me. By that I mean that no stranger to whom circumstances compel me to give my name ever associates me as I stand there in my shoes with me as I appear in type.

I go into a store and buy me a lovely necktie and tell the clerk to send it home. "Name, please," says he, and I tell him. Now, does he act gratifyingly and bug his eyes and hold up his hands in glad astonishment, and exclaim, "What! Not the Mr. Kelland! Not the author of those marvelous stories!" Does he? He does not. He says, "How do you spell it?" And that is just because his mind, as any intelligent mind would, refuses to connect the personal appearance I present with anything whatever deserving acclaim. If, desirous of winning his esteem, I should announce myself as being such and such, author of such and such, he would look at me with tired eye, and give me to understand that he had to sell neckties, but he didn't have to listen to silly jokes from the customers.

I travel. I am a great traveler. In fact I have gone so far as to cross the ocean in a ship. If you have ever been in a ship you will see folks for the first few days with passenger lists, trying to fit people to names. You will see their eyes follow some tall, noble-looking, ample-proportioned undertaker, trying to make themselves believe he is the Prince of Monaco or Jack Dempsey. It is always these splendid-looking fellows they gaze at and wonder about and weave legends around. But does any eye ever follow me? Not an eye. Is anybody ever curious to know who I am, or patently eager to cultivate me? They are not. The only people on the ship who evince any interest in me whatever are the stewards, and they eye me coldly, as looking like the sort of man who would sneak off without tipping.

A GOOD many years ago I was an infant. My mother never entered me in a baby show. On the other hand, she never concealed me from the eyes of the neighbors in a darkened room. The attitude of the family was that there I was, and must be accepted as one more cross to bear. I am confident nobody ever said convincingly that I was a beautiful baby. They probably said I was a baby, and let that cover the matter. I was just plain baby. I grew up into a plain boy who never was noticed by outsiders unless he earned attention.

It is to this fact that I owe a somewhat stormy reputation which has pursued me since early youth. I resented neglect. Self-respect made it incumbent upon me to cause my existence to be noted, and I did so. A deep, philosophical conclusion is to be drawn from this; namely, that it is more than possible the criminal classes are recruited from little boys who were neither so homely as to cause apprehension nor so beautiful as to cause gurgles. The submerged, unnoticed fraction. And, just to impress their personalities upon a neglectful world they turned to crime.

I turned to writing. The law is lenient with that form of activity. Therefore crime could be diminished by appointing a body of men and women whose duty it would be to go around noticing plain little boys and so saving them the trouble of going to extremes.

I have had two compliments in my life: one from my wife, one from an editor. My wife said on a certain red-letter evening, "When you are shaved and have on your evening clothes, you really aren't so bad." I think I wept on that occasion. Every once in a while, even to-day, I shave again in the hope she will repeat. But I think she must have spoken absent-mindedly, or thought she was talking to somebody else, because, applaud as I will, I have never been able to make her respond with an encore.

The second compliment, from an editor, ran as follows: "Well, anyhow, your pictures are worse than you are."

Which is something.

So, the next time you regard with aversion or scorn or ridicule, or whatever you regard it with, a picture of mine—possibly those accompanying this piece—remember that I am not as bad as they are. Atrocious as I may be in my proper person, I have not achieved such pronounced, such belligerent, such flamboyant atrocity as the counterfeit presentments of me printed on another page. I could if I wanted to, but I don't want to.

ONCE I hoped to improve with the years. I had faith that the softening hand of time would sort of currycomb me down, plane off the corrugations, add a touch of lovely silver to the hair, place artistic wrinkles in apt areas. But it has not happened. My appearance is like my weight: it never varies. My net pulchritude at forty-six is about what it was at twenty. It will continue to be that at ninety.

I've tried dressing for it. But the best tailors in New York have done me no service. You can put on me the most finely tailored suit in the world, and it becomes just a pair of pants and a coat with me inside of them. I am quite convinced I could dress up like the drum major of the Elks Silver Cornet Band and I would still be myself, inconspicuous, sort of ornery and skinny and commonplace. I could march at the head of the parade and folks wouldn't know the procession had started until I was past them.

As I said before, my appearance has never done me a cent's worth of good. On the other hand, it never has been vindictive and done me harm. It gets in its work in a negative way. It amounts to this: Nature decreed that every man should have a personal appearance, so she gave me one. It is mine. I can't change it. But, just as truly, I can't use it. The only service it has been so far was to use it to match up to a passport photograph. Port officials have used it calmly for that purpose, and having matched me and the photograph, have been satisfied to let the matter drop.

It doesn't trouble me any more. I hardly think of it. Years ago I learned to tie my tie without looking in the mirror, so I almost never see it. In that, you will admit, I am more fortunate than other people, who, by chance or by the workings of malign fate, meet me face to face.

All the same, it would come in mighty handy if I could contrive to look like an author—even a very bad author

SERGEANT ARCH ATHERTON of the United States Marine Corps stood on the wing of a speeding plane two thousand feet in the air. Then he dove calmly into space and fell for fourteen hundred feet before he opened his parachute. This is merely one of the remarkable feats pulled off by this "devil-dog" in the interest of making the air safe for the aviator and passenger. "Jump," an article next month, is crowded with Sergeant Atherton's experience as a "high diver" of the air. "Archie" is only twenty-three years old, but into those years he has packed sufficient thrills to satisfy a hundred ordinary mortals all their lives.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"'Afflicted' was a mild word for my case"

Hurtling into space! Mr. Charles B. Webber, Jr., going over the top . . .

East Milton, Mass.

"My embarrassment was natural enough. I work in a bank and am in constant contact with people with whom appearance counts.

"Also I am thrown socially with a group of young people interested in sports—and a blotchy complexion doesn't fit there either.

"I was 'afflicted'—that's a mild word for the case—with a whole series of skin eruptions. No sooner had one harvest of pimples begun to disappear than another crop sprang up . . . The situation got on my nerves.

"I knew that my father had found Fleischmann's Yeast beneficial. I myself began eating three cakes faithfully every day. The results were surprising—and amazingly prompt. My skin cleared—completely. My morale rose—enormously."

Charles B. Webber, Jr.

FRESH as any garden vegetable, Fleischmann's Yeast is a food, with truly remarkable power. The power to cleanse the intestines. To keep them active. To "regulate." As your constipation disappears, your whole being awakens to new vigor and life. Your skin clears. Indigestion gives way to healthy assimilation.

Buy 2 or 3 days' supply of Fleischmann's Yeast at a time from your grocer and keep in any cool dry place. And write for latest booklet on Yeast in the diet—free. Health Research Dept. J-48, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington St., New York City.

RIGHT

"I WAS SO NERVOUS and run down I couldn't stand the slightest noise, and could hardly do my housework. I weighed only 97 pounds. And I was badly constipated. Naturally I am only too glad to submit my own little 'True Story' of what Fleischmann's Yeast has done for me and indirectly for my family. I began eating Fleischmann's Yeast on or about the first of August. I am now entirely relieved of constipation. I have never felt better in my married life than I do at this time."

MRS. M. S. PARSONS, Minneapolis, Minn.

"I WAS TENDING the gates at the crossing. A fellow from the power house down the line happened along, and we got to talking about different things. I happened to mention how I had tried all kinds of medicines for my indigestion and he said, 'Why not try Fleischmann's Yeast? I take it regularly.' Well, after eating it for a few months, I felt ten years younger. My indigestion simply disappeared."

WILLIAM MILLER, Little Neck, L. I., N. Y.

Health, new joy in living —this easy way:

Eat three cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast every day, one cake before each meal or between meals. Eat it plain, or dissolved in water (hot or cold), or any other way you like. For stubborn constipation physicians say to drink one cake in a glass of hot water—not scalding—before meals and before going to bed. Train yourself to form a regular daily habit. Dangerous cathartics will gradually become unnecessary.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Billions... of bubbles

Drench the base of your beard

THIS "small-bubble" lather is the result of hundreds of experiments by Colgate chemists. It is a lather developed to soften your beard with water. Water, science proves, is the only effective beard-softener. What's more, this "small-bubble" lather is designed to soften your beard at its base. And that's where your razor does its work.

Compare the two lather-pictures on this page. Notice the amazing smallness of the Colgate bubbles. See how compact they are. The smaller the bubbles, the more water they hold; the larger the bubbles, the more air.

ORDINARY LATHER

This lather-picture (greatly magnified) of ordinary shaving cream shows how large, air-filled bubbles fail to get down to the base of the beard; and how they hold air, instead of water, against the whiskers.

COLGATE LATHER

This lather-picture of Colgate's Rapid-Shave Cream shows how the tiny moisture-laden bubbles penetrate deep down to the bottom of every hair, holding water, not air, against the base of the beard and softening it right where the razor works.

How Colgate Lather Works: The moment Colgate lather forms on your beard, two things happen:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up and floats away the oil film that covers each hair.

2. With the oil film gone, millions of tiny, water-saturated bubbles bring and hold an abundance of water down to the base of the beard, right where the razor does its work.

Because your beard is properly softened at its base, your razor works easily and quickly. The keen blade glides smoothly through the toughest whiskers—not over them. Every hair is cut close and clean. And your face remains cool and comfortable throughout the day.

One week's better shaves—FREE

Once you try this unique "small-bubble" lather, we believe you will never go back to ordinary shaving methods. Prove this for yourself—at our expense. Just clip the coupon. We will send you a generous trial-size tube—free.

Colgate & Co. Est. 1806

In Canada, Colgate & Co., Ltd. 72 St. Ambroise St. Montreal

COLGATE & CO.
Dept. 501-A, 595 Fifth Ave., New York
Please send me the FREE sample tube of Colgate's Rapid-Shave Cream for better shaving.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

SOFTENS THE BEARD AT THE BASE

The Song at Midnight—

(Continued from page 41)

any more. Each one was given to show somebody else, or to put somebody else in the shade, or to get even in some way or another. Only half the old crowd would ever be at any one party, and they'd spend two thirds of the time being mean about the other half.

It was hardest of all on me, trying to stay friends with both halves, and not take sides. Every time I set foot out of the house was a nervous strain. I didn't know what I'd run into. I didn't dare so much as have a bunch in for Sunday night supper, because I wouldn't ask one side for fear of hurting somebody's feelings who was on the other side, and I knew that if I asked both sides neither would come.

And of course it completely ruined things that we'd planned to undertake together. Our coöperative laundry, for instance. Rosemary and Dulcie and Ruth and Corinne and Mrs. Kirsted and I had planned to have a coöperative laundry. We had got the idea out of a magazine, and had decided to have it in Kirsteds' old garage.

We had been going to club together and put in a washing machine and an electric mangle and, as soon as we could afford it, an electric dryer. Now, of course, we just had to give it up.

That wasn't the only thing that had to be given up either. The fair that we were going to give to raise money for free beds in the new hospital was a perfect flop, because the people who ought to have worked together, wouldn't. The church suppers didn't make nearly the money they always had before. Our Christmas Community Chest actually didn't raise as much money as Dawson, which is a much smaller town.

FOR a long time, not being on either side myself, the whole thing just seemed half funny and half maddening to me. But as the holidays came on it began to seem terribly sad. Under all the hectic gayety and entertaining, there was a queer, grim feeling of something lovely that was dying.

Howard's dentistry wasn't going well, and when I thought of the gallant fight he and Rosie had put up to start that office of his, in spite of their four babies, it just made me sick. Old friends who, a year ago, would have done anything for Howard, going 'way over to Verblen to Doctor Blain rather than let Howard fill a tooth for them.

Some of the poor families on the other side of the tracks actually not getting Thanksgiving baskets, because somebody on the Good Samaritan committee wouldn't call up somebody else and ask for a car!

Christmas time was the saddest of all. I thought of a year ago and the fun we'd had, all getting up a Christmas Eve dinner at our house together, hurrying through the snowy twilight with presents for the different houses, trimming the Sunday-school Christmas tree and filling the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You can now Talk from Coast to coast for only $9

An Advertisement for Bell Long Distance Telephone Service

ON DECEMBER 1, 1927, telephone rates on calls to points 390 miles or more away were again substantially reduced. The day station to station rate from coast to coast is now only $9. Other typical station to station day rates are: Baltimore to Los Angeles, $8.25. Seattle to Chicago, $6.50. Denver to New York, $6.00. Atlanta to San Francisco, $7.75. Cleveland to Omaha, $3.25. Minneapolis to St. Louis, $2.30. Night rates—less.

The greater the distance, the greater the saving by these new rates—in long trips, time and expense.

Says a large fruit, vegetable and produce house, "All of our buying is done by Long Distance."

An automobile manufacturer, "It reduces distance to nothing, and gives us an opportunity to talk with our dealers . . . just as though they were at the plant."

A large paper company, "Telephone selling has become a necessity. Hours are saved this way. Selling cost reduced."

What distant call now would make a needed appointment, close a pending purchase or make a sale? Calling by number takes less time. . . . . Number, please?

AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES — BELL SYSTEM

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Fisherman Says He Never Gets a "Bite" From This Tobacco

The sport of fishing seems to enlarge men's souls, despite all the fish stories we hear. Let a man find a hole where the fish are biting well, and nine times out of ten, if he is a true sportsman, he will let his friends in on the good news.

Evidently the same thing holds true of pipe-smokers. Take the case of Mr. Massey, for example. He has learned from a fellow fisherman how good Edgeworth is, and now wants to tell the world about it himself.

Jasper, Tenn.,
March 23, 1927

Larus & Bro. Co.,
Richmond, Va.
Gentlemen:

I have always wanted to smoke a pipe. After several attempts I gave my "taste" up, for with each trial I got a blistered tongue.

One evening, when looking over a certain outdoor magazine, I read that a certain fisherman could catch more fish when using "Edgeworth," so I decided I would try "his" tobacco—for I am no poor fisherman!

The next day I tried to secure Edgeworth. The local country storekeeper did not have it, so I sent by a friend to the city for my first Edgeworth. Two things have happened: I still smoke Edgeworth, and the local storekeeper always has a supply.

I catch fish and never get "a bite" from Edgeworth!

Yours for keeps,
H. V. Massey

To those who have never tried Edgeworth, we make this offer:

Let us send you free samples of Edgeworth so that you may put it to the pipe test. If you like the samples, you'll like Edgeworth wherever and whenever you buy it, for it never changes in quality.

Write your name and address to Larus & Brother Company, 3 S. 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

We'll be grateful for the name and address of your tobacco dealer, too, if you care to add them.

Edgeworth is sold in various sizes to suit the needs and means of all purchasers. Both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed are packed in small, pocket-size packages, in handsome humidors holding a pound, and also in several handy in-between sizes.

On your radio—tune in on WRVA, Richmond, Va.—the Edgeworth Station. Wave length (254.1 meters) 1180 kilocycles candy bags with such hilarity and good nature.

The Community sing Christmas afternoon! I remembered how it had suddenly brought tears to my eyes, when we were singing "Oh, Little Town of Bethlehem," and I happened to hear some of the men come in on the bass, and remembered how I'd known them in kindergarten when they all sang "Jingle Bells," in treble!

Christmas, this year, was a hideous farce. Two parties to every one of a year ago. Noisy, brassy parties, full of gossip and hate. In the midst of more social life than Montrose had had in years, I felt queer and lonesome and homesick.

Will and I didn't go to any parties. We had been so careful not to take sides that we didn't have any place anywhere. We had a nice, quiet day with our mothers and fathers and the children, and all the next two or three days we kept telling each other that we were glad we were out of the trouble and that we were better off alone than mixed up in it.

But being strong-minded is a lonesome business. Holiday week without any merrymaking is queer and dull. By the middle of the week I was so starved for a little sociability that I made up my mind that I should go to the next affair I was asked to, whichever side was giving it.

And the invitation came from Dulcie for a New Year's Eve party. I asked Will if he wanted to go, and he said he supposed he might as well.

Fifteen minutes after Dulcie had been in the telephone rang—and it was Rosemary, asking us to a New Year's Eve party at their house. Of course we had to refuse, and it made me just sick. I'm almost as fond of Rosie as I am of my own sister. And Howard and Will have been bosom friends since they wore rompers. Howard and Rosie would hear that we had been at the Lanes, and feel, of course, that we had at last taken sides against them.

At first I thought of getting out of Dulcie's party, after all; but when I remembered the way Dulcie had helped me out the time the twins were sick, and scads of nice things she'd done for me, I couldn't bring myself to do that, either. Besides, Will and I had stuck at home so much that I couldn't help feeling kind of pepped up at the idea of going to any party again.

The day before New Year's Eve, it began to snow hard. It snowed all day long and all night, and in the morning Dulcie ran over to tell me that they were going to make it a sleigh ride and drive out to the old Dewdrop Inn, where we used to have our high-school parties, for oyster stew and to dance the Old Year out.

IT WAS a perfect night for a sleigh ride, clear and still and starry. No wind and not too cold. A lot of the old crowd were there, very gay and noisy. I suppose there was a bit of a strain, and that everybody was being a little gayer and noisier than they would have been naturally, a little determined to prove that they were having a simply marvelous time. But a sleigh ride will carry a lot of noise and hilarity, and it seemed so good to be out with a crowd again that I cuddled down under the straw and found myself having a much better time than I had expected.

We drove away out the Pike and through the wood lots and along the Old Stockade Road. It was a little after ten when we saw the lights of the Dewdrop Inn shining through the bare branches and out over the glittery snow. Everyone was a little cold by then, and starved. As we opened the inn door, light and warmth and the smell of coffee greeted us.

Two other pairs of bobs were standing outside the door. The horses had been unhitched and put out in the barn.

"I guess Mr. Fleck got his other party," said Dulcie. "He said he hoped to get a crowd from Verblen. It hardly pays him to open up the inn for just one party."

Mr. Fleck came to the door to greet us—he knew most of us by name. The big hall was all trimmed up with evergreen ropes and there was a fire burning at each end of the room. The other party was already in one of the small dining-rooms. We could hear them laughing and shouting. The cloakroom was half full of wraps.

I was wriggling out of the sweater I'd worn under my big coat, and waiting for my turn at the mirror in the cloak-room when I happened to glance about at the wraps already on the hooks and thrown over the chairs and tables. Suddenly, my heart stood still.

THERE, on the chair beside me, was Rosie Merton's coat!

I couldn't be mistaken. It was the one she'd worn for four years. Howard opening up his own office and having to buy fixtures and everything, Rose hadn't wanted to spend any money for new clothes. Surreptitiously, to make sure Dulcie didn't see me, I turned back the edge of the coat, just to make doubly sure.

Yes, there was the tan and brown foulard lining that Rosemary had been putting in that very day when she and Dulcie and Mrs. Kirsted and I had sat sewing on her porch—the day that that terrible, mysterious something had happened between her and Dulcie. That unknown, devastating something that had killed the happiness and the tried old friendliness of half a town.

For an instant, I had a wild impulse to get Rosemary and Dulcie together there that night, with all the crowd around, both warring halves of what had once been such a jolly, affectionate whole, and make them tell us all just what it was that had started the trouble. Surely, it couldn't be anything that couldn't be made up.

But I knew, almost instantly, that it was a wild and melodramatic and impossible idea of mine. For at that moment, Dulcie recognized the coat too. Realized what had happened. That it wasn't some distant friendly crowd from Verblen that was eating supper there in the dining-room beside ours, who would dance in the same room with us, to the same radio music. Dulcie went stony white, and shut her lips in the little, hard, angry way she has. I knew that nothing I or anybody else could do would help things now.

Instantly, the news spread that the other crowd was there too. There was a kind of stiffening up. Everybody became

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Would you like two pay checks instead of one— each week in 1928?

E. J. Dryden

FRANKLY—are you in earnest in wishing to increase your income, but doubtful as to the aid you could get from home-study business training?

E. J. Dryden, of Laredo, Texas, was doubtful, too, but he determined to try, and to measure his results by the good old sign of the dollar!

He was earning $150 a month when he started with LaSalle. His course in Higher Accountancy was completed in eighteen months. His salary-increase paid for the training plus $1.00 an hour for every hour spent in study.

After his first lesson in Business Management, dealing with Selling, he tried out his newly acquired knowledge. In six weeks he made $750 in commissions working after hours.

He has since followed through with Commercial Spanish, and is now completing his fourth course—in American Law and Procedure. For two years past his earnings have been better than $11,000 a year.

Again we ask—are you in earnest in your desire to increase your salary?

Send for Free Book About Your Own Field

You are faced with a problem—and the only way you can solve it is to get the facts.

A special 64-page booklet describes the opportunities in your field of business and outlines a definite plan that will enable you to realize them.

The coupon will bring this booklet to you free—and with it your copy of "Ten Years' Promotion in One," all without obligation.

Dreaming—wishing—you've had enough of that! Send for these booklets NOW.

these books free

A. DEUTZ C. DEUTZ

A. DEUTZ & BROTHER
JOBBERS AND EXPORTERS OF HARDWARE
FARMING AND AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS MACHINERY & SUPPLIES
LAREDO TEXAS

LaSalle Extension University,
Chicago, Illinois.
Gentlemen:

My schooling stopped when I was fourteen; and when I first enrolled with LaSalle for training in Higher Accountancy I was earning only $150 a month.

Yet that training enabled me to make certain suggestions to the firm I worked for which resulted in a trip to Washington with all expenses paid and a commission of $2,126. That alone paid for the training seventeen times over!

Since then I have followed through with two other LaSalle courses; I am now on my fourth. And for two years past my earnings have been in excess of $11,000 a year.

I used to think you were too extravagant in your claims for LaSalle training. Now I honestly believe you are too conservative. Why don't you tell the full truth about what LaSalle can do and is doing to lift men out of the low-pay class and put them in command of the really important places in the business world?

Sincerely yours,

E. J. Dryden
Auditor

Find Yourself Through LaSalle!

LA SALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY, Dept. 133-R CHICAGO

I shall be glad to have your 64-page booklet about the business field I have checked below. Also a copy of "Ten Years' Promotion in One," all without obligation.

- ☐ Higher Accountancy
- ☐ Traffic Management
- ☐ Modern Salesmanship
- ☐ Law; Degree of LL. B.
- ☐ Commercial Law
- ☐ Banking and Finance
- ☐ C. P. A. Coaching
- ☐ Effective Speaking
- ☐ Credit and Collection Correspondence
- ☐ Stenography — Stenotypy
- ☐ Business Management
- ☐ Modern Foremanship
- ☐ Industrial Management
- ☐ Railway Station Management
- ☐ Personnel Management
- ☐ Modern Business Correspondence
- ☐ Expert Bookkeeping
- ☐ Business English
- ☐ Commercial Spanish
- ☐ Telegraphy

Name..... Present Position.....

Street..... City..... State.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

How to beat a Cold

NO matter what soothing measures you employ to ease a cold, there is always one basic thing to do—clean the system of the poisons of congestion by taking one or two teaspoonfuls of Sal Hepatica in a large glass of water.

Don't stay "stuffed up." At the first sneeze take Sal Hepatica which clears out intestinal wastes and poisons promptly—usually within half an hour—and so prevents a cold from getting a start—from dragging on for days and days!

You may take Sal Hepatica at any time but for the most prompt action it should be taken half an hour before any meal, preferably before breakfast. Its use helps to keep the body in perfect condition to battle the germs of not only colds and grippe, but many more of the minor ills of life.

Sal Hepatica is a delicately balanced combination of several salines, effervescent, pleasant to take and gentle in its action. By releasing the natural secretion of water in the intestines, Sal Hepatica washes away the poisons of waste.

Sal Hepatica has the same health-giving salines for which the waters of the European Spas have long been noted and, like them, Sal Hepatica helps correct not only colds and other winter ills, but also indigestion, headaches, skin blemishes, auto-intoxication and many other troubles arising from faulty elimination.

Dissolved in water, Sal Hepatica makes a sparkling, bubbling drink. It has been the largest selling saline for over thirty years.

Keep well this winter—take Sal Hepatica when you need it. Send for our booklet that tells you more fully how to avoid colds and other ills.

Please address BRISTOL-MYERS CO.
Dept. L18, 71 West St., N. Y. C.

Sal Hepatica

© 1928

much gayer, and much, much noisier. A defiant, challenging sort of gayety. You never heard such hilarity as we made over our oyster stew and coffee and ham sandwiches and pickles. You never heard so many jokes called from one end of the table to the other. Such merriment, such laughter. And yet, looking around at the tense eyes just above the laughing mouths, you knew it wasn't truly merry.

The big radio had been switched on and the others were already dancing when we streamed out into the hall. A few of the boys exchanged sheepish, gruff greetings, but in the main nobody spoke. We swung into the dance too. Brushing shoulders with people we'd known all our lives. People who had worked and played together since they were babies. And to-night, wouldn't even wish each other "Happy New Year."

After the first dance they gathered around the fireplace at one end of the hall, and we around the fireplace at the other. When the music for the next number began, Will resolutely strode up to the other end of the room and asked Rosie to dance. She refused, politely, saying she'd promised the dance already. But she hadn't, because she just sat there till someone in her own crowd asked her. When Will came back to our bunch, people glared at him angrily. He was as conspicuous and as unpopular as a spy caught in the enemy's lines.

The radio music was coming from a big hotel in Chicago, and it was marvelous. Jazz that just made your feet follow it, whether you wanted to or not. The wild, half-weird, half-sweet moan of the saxophones, the rhythmic beat of the drums.

After Will's disastrous attempt nobody in either crowd paid any attention to anybody in the other. One dance followed another, each gayer and jazzier than the one before. We all cut in on each other in our own crowds, and whirled and laughed and flirted. And I don't believe the gayety really fooled one person in that big room.

There was the sharp, pungent sweetness of the evergreen branches, the soft brightness of candles burning in the big sconces on each side of the fireplaces. And that music coming from so far away lent a queer touch of magic. Reminded you, as your own private music never could have, of other people, other places, everywhere. Dancing the Old Year Out.

SUDDENLY, the jazz stopped. An announcer said there was but a few minutes before midnight. That at midnight all stations tuning in would be able to hear the bells and whistles welcoming the New Year. In the meantime, he said, the hotel orchestra would play a waltz medley of old-fashioned airs.

After the hot excitement of the jazz music and the modern dances, there was something queer and still and romantic about a waltz. I was glad that Will asked me to dance that one with him.

All the old tunes that had been old-fashioned even when we were youngsters. Tunes that our mothers and fathers must have waltzed to: "Sweet Rosie O'Grady," "After the Ball," "The Sidewalks of New York." Through the radio came now and then a faint sound of voices. Some of those people who were dancing to the music in the Chicago hotel must be singing along with the fiddles. Some of our boys began to whistle, the girls to hum. Now and then someone took up a snatch of words:

"Daisy, Daisy, give me your answer true,
I'm half crazy—all for the love of you."

I wondered in how many other places, all over the country, other people were dancing the Old Year out, singing too. Queer, how suddenly came flashing back into my mind other parties we'd had here at the Dewdrop Inn. Kid affairs, with snappers and paper caps, and pinning the tail on the donkey. The high-school senior dance when we'd caught Scott and Corinne kissing on the stairs, and they'd told us they were engaged, the first of us all to take the leap.

We shan't have a stylish marriage;
I can't afford a carriage;
But you look sweet—upon the seat
Of a bicycle built for two.

I don't know why, but just then I thought of Mary Burns, who had been going to marry young Doctor Wheeler. We'd been just kids, and so thrilled at the sight of him in his lieutenant's khaki. Young Doctor Wheeler, who had kissed Mary good-by and gone marching away. . . . And never came back.

Again the music crept from one tune into another.

"REMEMBER this one?" Will asked me suddenly. "'Member Rose and Dulcie singing it at that old-fashioned concert our class gave when we graduated from grammar?"

I did remember suddenly, Dulcie with her short, yellow curly hair, and Rosie, with her little thin legs and her two long brown braids. I could hear them now. Queer, for a Chicago hotel orchestra to be playing that old song:

I don't want to play in your yard;
I don't like you any more.
You'll be sorry when you see me
Sliding down our cellar door.

I guess Will and I weren't the only ones who remembered Rose and Dulcie singing it. I looked up at Howard Merton, who was dancing past, and he was looking queer and sheepish, half as though he wanted to laugh. So did Scott and Corinne.

You can't holler down our rain barrel;
You can't climb our apple tree—

The memory seemed to flash from dancer to dancer. People suddenly turned red, there was a half laugh from somewhere at the other end of the room—not the noisy, defiant laugh we'd grown used to. Some man's reluctant laugh, half ashamed, half amused.

I don't want to play in your yard
If you won't be good to me.

Rosemary and Dulcie, looking straight at each other, for the first time in months, across the room.

Suddenly the music stopped.

"In a few seconds," said the announcer, "you will hear the bells, ringing in the New Year."

The dancing stopped. Everyone stood still. Nobody spoke. In the sudden stillness, we could smell the evergreen branches, hear the sap in the fire logs, the sputter of a candle that had burned down.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

There was something queer and goose-fleshy in that waiting stillness. I found myself staring at the candles, and they seemed to blur and dance. It was as though, for those few moments, there was no such thing as space. As though we were all waiting together, we in Montrose, all the unknown dancers in Chicago, other people out on ships, perhaps, or somewhere on lonely farms.

No time, either. I thought of Mother and Father, watching some old year out when they were young as we were, and had danced to those same old waltzes. Of our babies, asleep at home—why, it would hardly be to-morrow before they would be dancing the Old Year out and making love and having babies of their own—

SUDDENLY the candle I was watching winked brighter an instant and flickered out. I thought of Mary Burns's lover, who had never come back. It was as though some ghostly voice were whispering of New Year's Eves to come, of other candles flickering out, of friends and lovers—we had such a short time together at best. I felt Will's arm grow tense and tight around me, as though he were thinking of it too.

The silence seemed to grow stiller. Then there was a quick rush of feet. There was a little vacant space in the middle of the floor and two figures were suddenly in it, in each other's arms. Laughing and crying together.

Whistles and sirens blared out of the silence. Bells ringing, distant shouts, distant laughter. The New Year had come in, over the radio.

Instantly, we all took it up. Shouting, too, ringing our bells, shaking our clackers. Whistling. Calling. Laughing. And there, in the middle of the floor, Rosemary and Dulcie, arm in arm, brushing away tears, laughing together.

"Come on!" Will shouted. "An old-fashioned Paul Jones!" The radio music began. "All join hands and circle to the right."

One great circle—not a soul held back. Roger and Howard Merton with Corinne between them.

"Grand right and left—make it snappy there!" Someone blew a whistle. "Dance with the lady on your right!"

Will swinging away with Rosemary, Howard with Dulcie. Girls who hadn't been speaking for months smiling shyly at each other over their partners' shoulders. Men, who had grown stiff and formal, cutting in on each other, hilariously, tumbling each other out of the way. Back in the circle again.

"Ladies to the center! Circle right, men circle left! Basket!"

No reconciliations, no apologies, no explanations. Nobody knew what Rose and Dulcie said to each other that moment in the stillness between the years, any more than anybody knew what they had said that other time before, that had started all the trouble. And nobody cared.

The feud was over. Over with the Old Year. By some magic, we had waked up out of the nightmare. And too happy to ask how or why, to the strains of "Auld Lang Syne" in waltz time, we danced the New Year in!

✦ ✦ ✦ ✦ ✦

Wine of tomatoes gorgeously spiced!

You are right

All catsups do not taste alike

OVER and beyond the fresh-picked, fresh-kept tomatoes that make up Snider's Catsup, its secret of flavor is of course in the art of cooking and spicing.

This recipe, now a classic in tomato cookery, is a measured, careful mulling—a process exclusively Snider's.

What a sparkle this sauce has—in truth the wine of tomatoes gorgeously spiced. What a pick-up it gives to the palate, and how different from what most people would call just "catsup."

No wonder that Snider's, the mulled catsup, has the call among folk who value the niceties of life.

Snider's

The mulled catsup

The choice of those privileged to choose—Snider's

CHILI SAUCE ~ ~ ~ COCKTAIL SAUCE

FRESH-KEPT VEGETABLES & FRUITS IN GLASS & TIN

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

At noon—each day

JAPAN TEA

For afternoon freshness

Ten minutes to restore the nervous energy you've been paying out all morning!

Ten minutes to wind you up like a clock for a better afternoon of work or recreation!

Ten minutes spent over a leisurely cup or two of Japan Green Tea after luncheon!

Drink it slowly, lingeringly. Enjoy each separate mouthful.

Try it once and see! No four o'clock fatigue. No mid-afternoon drowsiness.

Japan Green Tea is tea in its natural state, uncolored and unfermented, with all the flavor-laden juices of the fresh leaf preserved by immediate sterilization.

Specify Japan Green Tea when you buy. Packaged for the home under various well-known brands. Several grades and prices. The best will cost you only a fraction of a cent a cup people know much, technically, about acting, and the great majority do not appear greatly to want to. In fact, it is only too common in America to find people who openly boast that "they don't know anything about art, but they know what they like," and who look upon the minority who try to uphold standards of perfection in art as "high-brows."

The Six Best-Loved Characters on the American Stage

(Continued from page 34)

Yet, when it comes to our deep, unconscious response to dramatic art, we discover that it is fully roused, warm and glowing, only by first-rate performances. We discover that we respond neither to what is "high-brow" nor "low-brow," but simply to what is artistically perfect, to unerring skill guiding the creative imagination. The most "high-brow" of critics enjoyed Jefferson's Rip as much as the humblest person in the gallery; more, indeed, because he could grasp the beautiful precision of the actor's art. The public rejected Maude Adams as L'Aiglon and Juliet, and rejected Warfield as Shylock, beloved as these players were, because in these rôles they were not persuasive.

They were not persuasive because they could not bend their personalities to the demands of the characters, and so attain artistic perfection.

NOT only were the six outstanding impersonations we have listed examples of almost flawless acting, but I cannot recall any example of a greatly popular impersonation where the acting was poor or inefficient. The plain lesson is that in the theatre, at any rate, we have as a people the capacity to respond to artistic proficiency, as much as any other people, and that when left to our own unfettered device we do unconsciously respond to it, and the greater the proficiency the greater the response. In other words, we like fine art, we are more susceptible to it than many of us have felt it respectable or "manly" to admit.

Different as these six impersonations were, they have other things in common than their happy artistic perfection, or efficiency. For one thing, they all have a strong element of humor. Sothern's Dundreary, of course, was entirely a humorous creation; in fact, it was a gorgeous burlesque of the vacuous, "silly ass" Englishman, kept to earth by the marvelous way in which the actor never let you forget that, after all, this preposterous lordling was a gentleman (just as his son, E. H. Sothern, never lets you forget Malvolio has real dignity). Jefferson's Rip was bubbling with good cheer and humor. Who that saw it can ever forget his comment, when he learned that the sisters of the dwarfs were dumb, "Vat vives they vould make!" or his constant toast that ended in a gurgle as his face disappeared behind his tankard. The pathos and humor of Jefferson in this rôle were like the summer storms and sunshine of Rip's own Catskills, and ended with a lovely rainbow at the evening of the play.

Miss Adams as Babbie was all elfin contradiction, the eternal feminine whose capriciousness, when backed by charm, by twinkling eyes and smiling lips and bubbling gayety, makes all the world smile in response. Needless to say, Frank Bacon in "Lightnin'," when he told how he drove a flock of bees across the prairie and never lost a bee, or when he drawled many a retort, was indescribably mirth-provoking. Both Warfield's "Music Master" and Arliss's "Old English," though the one is rich in pathos and the other dies at the end of the play, are full of humorous touches—in the first a gentle, pervasive humor that runs along beside the pathos, in the other a grim, sardonic humor that makes the old commercial pirate stand sharply out from his fellows.

That we find this element of humor strongly marked in all six impersonations is not, I think, surprising, because it shows that we, as a people, relish humor, and demand it in those things we like best, whether actual persons or stage creations. This has often been said of us, and here we find another proof. It does not necessarily mean that we have more sense of humor than other peoples.

What it certainly means is that we are a cheerful people who give our warmest-hearted response to things with laughter in them. Whether our sense of humor is greater or less than that of other people, it is more to the front of our consciousness, more inseparably a part of our emotional reactions.

Considering the glum religion and repressed life of our Puritan forbears, who settled so much of these United States, this is a bit puzzling, and it would be interesting, if we had the time, to try to solve the mystery. In our drama, the Yankee (which means the Puritan descendant) has been our most popular comic type—not laughed at, but with. This new land did something to us, and something rather pleasant. Certainly, it appears that our most characteristic art expression will be in comedy.

ANOTHER thing that these impersonations have in common is an appeal to our sympathies, to our warm, human emotions of compassion or affection. There is not an exalted character in the lot, no man or woman built in heroic mold, no superman or poet, except as there was a gentle poetry in Rip. In fact, by ordinary standards of daily life, more than one of them is reprehensible! J. Ranken Towse, the critic, used to say "Rip Van Winkle" was the most immoral of all dramas, because we were all made to sympathize with Rip when actually he was lazy, didn't support his family, and was a drunkard.

Dundreary was quite moral, but a silly ass. Babbie was of wayward feminine caprice all compact. Lightnin' Bill was a ne'er-do-well, a sort of Rip reincarnated. And Old English was a commercial pirate. Only the Music Master was entirely to be commended on ethical grounds, at the same time being of normal intelligence.

Accepting a rogue for hero in the drama

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

means, of course, nothing about our attitude toward rogues in real life. In real life, we should certainly prefer Rip's society to that of his wife, as we do in the play. But we'd pitch in and help her when he left her to support the family. In real life, too, we would get more satisfaction out of talking to Old English than to his fellow directors, and would infinitely more admire his mind—as we do in the play. But we wouldn't do business with him if we could help it. In real life, we men would vastly prefer the twinkling capriciousness of Babbie to some of the nice, common-sense females who would scornfully watch us swarming around her, and turn up their noses. But if we married her, we'd pray she settled down a bit.

All peoples are alike in enjoying the fictional presentation of rogues, vagabonds, wayward and unusual folk of every sort. Perhaps it enlarges our understanding of life, perhaps to our mostly proper lives it gives a harmless spice, perhaps it is a vicarious outlet for some of our own wayward impulses.

But it is significant, I think, that each character makes a distinct appeal to our sympathies, not because of any great injustice he has suffered, or any idea or cause he champions, or any tragic fate that hangs over him, but because of his own human qualities of likableness.

WHEN I was a little boy, and first saw Jefferson play Rip, I cried as if my heart would break when his wife put him out into the storm. I loved him exactly as the village children loved him. He was my friend. In fact, he was very much like my paternal grandfather, who spent the time he should have been filling Grandmother's wood-box making me willow whistles. There was one moment in the play, of course, that transcended personalities, and plunged to the heart of things—when old Rip, returning unrecognized, exclaimed, "Are we so soon forgot!" Jefferson's voice and face, as he said this, were quite marvelous. It was a supreme moment of tragic art. But most audiences used to laugh! They found it amusing. It was the warm humanity of Rip, the man, they adored. The deeper note was beyond them.

Dundreary, as I have said, was always a charming gentleman, and that gave to his asininities a certain wistful quality which was quite indescribable, which made the impersonation a living thing, and endeared it to the heart as well as the head. In "The Little Minister," the play, Barrie left out a good deal of the more serious qualities of the novel—fortunately, probably, for Miss Adams did not handle high passion. What he left in was the adorable elfin feminism and sparkle of the rôle. Lightnin', of course, like Rip before him, had personal charm, a conquering good nature; he was the sort of droll person who makes you brighten up when he approaches, and with whom it is delightful to crack a joke. When such a person has a bit of luck, or rises unexpectedly to a crisis and does a good job, there is never a voice of envy. Everybody is glad. There was just that common humanity in Lightnin', and in the scheme of the play.

We all remember "The Music Master," no doubt, and recall how the sweet old fellow, fighting poverty, struggles on to find his lost daughter, but is willing to give her up when he thinks it is for her happi-

He thinks he's so big . . .
but you know he isn't

Now, more than ever, he needs your guidance in things like this

HE knows so little of the real world for which you are preparing him!

Much of the time he lives in a land of make-believe. How lovable he is! How difficult to care for!

So many problems he cannot understand! At the breakfast table, for instance, he cannot realize how much he handicaps himself if he eats too little food, or the wrong kind.

So common among children of his age are bad habits at breakfast that school authorities have now made it the subject of a nation-wide health movement. They are today urging mothers everywhere to see that their children eat a hot cereal in the morning.

This rule hangs today on the walls of over 60,000 school rooms: "Every boy and girl needs a hot cereal breakfast."

Many tests have shown that children fall short of doing their best in studies or at games when they fail to have a hot cereal breakfast regularly.

How sure you feel, yourself, that your children are really prepared for a day of work and play, when you start them off with a good hot bowl of Cream of Wheat.

For 30 years, authorities as well as mothers, have recommended Cream of Wheat as the ideal hot cereal for children for these reasons:

1. It is unusually rich in energy. 2. Cream of Wheat is exceptionally easy to digest. 3. Children love its creamy goodness.

It is so simple to safeguard your children in this way at breakfast. The easy plans, described below, will help you to arouse their enthusiasm for a hot cereal. Send them to school every day really ready for the effort of work and play. Give them regularly a steaming bowl of Cream of Wheat. Your grocer has it.

© 1928, C. of W. Co.

FREE—Mothers say this plan works wonders!*

A plan that arouses your children's interest in a hot cereal breakfast and makes them want to eat it regularly. A youngster's club, with badges and a secret for members, with gold stars and colored wall charts. A plan that children work out for themselves. All material free—sent direct to your children together with a letter addressed to them personally and a sample box Cream of Wheat. Just mail coupon to Dept. P-10, Cream of Wheat Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

Name of child.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

ness. A steadfast father, a man cheerful and kind in adversity, a man ready for self-sacrifice, but with inherent dignity through it all, such a one we all admire in life as on the stage.

Old English might not be so desirable a neighbor, unless we kept our fences up, and obeyed all his "No trespass" signs!

I think there has been a more conscious enjoyment on our part, anyway, in watching Arliss, the actor, shaping this rôle than there ever was in watching Jefferson or Warfield or Miss Adams. We have admired the acting, as well as lived with the character. But that alone would never account for its great success. Is it not due, also, to the fact that there is something in all of us which loves a man who, as we say, "has the courage of his convictions;" and something in all of us which resents the constant repressions of life, whether of society or our doctor's orders, and rejoices at the spectacle of somebody who gloriously casts them all aside?

WE FIND then, in all these six impersonations, an element of warm, sympathetic human appeal, not an exalted or tragic appeal but a friendly one, on the level of our daily living. This, surely, must tell us something about ourselves as a people. In our hours of leisure and relaxation, when our interests and emotions most freely and unconsciously follow their natural bent, we find ourselves most captivated by characters recognizably on our level of life and thought and feeling, and characters, too, which appeal to our friendly, almost our neighborly sympathies, which have humor and charm. We would seem from that, would we not, to be a people of quick sympathy, interested primarily in folks rather than principles, warm-hearted, liking the fellow who has charm and good nature, even if he's a bit queer, responding most readily to the pleasant contacts of daily life, the humors and milder heroisms of everyday existence.

Let us, very briefly, look at the other list of famous impersonations we made, to see how it bears out this deduction: Josh Whitcomb, in "The Old Homestead," was one of that long succession of shrewd, humorous, lovable Yankee characters on our stage, which began way back in 1789 with Jonathan in Royal Tyler's "The Contrast," the first American comedy to be acted on our stage. Nat Berry in "Shore Acres" was another. Chanfrau's "Mose the Fireman," which made such a furor in the 1840's, was the "Bowery Boy" of that day to the life, with all the swagger and bluff and humor.

Florence's Judge Bardwell Slote was an old reprobate, a vulgar, unscrupulous politician, who was also humorous and kind. The part was written and played broadly, as a satire, and in it all America recognized the good and the bad in the political life of the nation, and grinned accordingly. What endeared them to the portrait, however, was less the satire than the common humanity Florence put into the rôle. You had to like the fellow.

Here, then, in this supplementary list of universally acclaimed impersonations, we find (except for Booth's Hamlet) nothing tragic, nothing heroic in the grand style, nothing intellectual. We find, instead, the two elements of characteristic humor and the sympathetic delineation of everyday, likable folks out of our own common experience.

This seems to make us out a cheerful and, as the expression goes, a "folksy" people, and rather tends to counteract the impression which may exist in certain quarters that we are hard and grasping. But it seems to me the lists show something more about us, as much by their omissions as their inclusions. Where, among all our beloved stage figures, is the strong, executive character, the captain of industry, the builder of railroads, the bridger of continents? Where is the man who works eighteen hours a day on his climb to power? He simply isn't there. Instead, is the loafer Rip, the loafer Lightnin', the poor, shabby Music Master, the old farmer Josh Whitcomb, the old lighthouse keeper Nat Berry, the English lordling Dundreary who never did a stroke of work in his life. These are the folks who, in our hours of freedom, when we are just ourselves, we unconsciously love.

In our secret hearts we don't tremendously admire the captains of industry and their kind, though we may envy them their power and wealth. Our affections go out, rather, to the folks like ourselves, and our admiration to those who have found a way to get the most joy and pleasure and richness out of life, to the playboys of this Western world. Of all public men in recent years, Roosevelt was most loved and admired, and Roosevelt had charm, he had humor, and he had leisure, which he employed in every sort of play, from writing history to hunting elephants. Affection began to creep into our tone when we spoke of John D. Rockefeller only when he began to give away his money, and play golf.

In other words, our materialism has, perhaps, been overstressed. At bottom, we have a love and capacity for leisure, and the instinct to employ that leisure in amiable and pleasant fashion, for we love humor and we have warm sympathy with our fellows. A future national problem is less to give us a chance to work happily than to play happily. The eight hours a day when we are neither working nor sleeping is when, perhaps, we shall most develop the national soul.

IN our lists of universally beloved impersonations, only Booth's Hamlet had intellectual depth and heroic stature. It is not safe to infer too much from the lack of intellectual response in the theatre, for two reasons: first, all drama is much more an appeal to the emotions than the intellect; and, second, in the theatre we are in a crowd, and in a crowd the heart works more than the head.

Nevertheless, I think it would be true that in certain other countries, as France, Germany or Russia, a list of the universally beloved impersonations over a period like ours would include several of national heroes or classic characters in epic mold, and perhaps several of strong intellectual appeal. France would certainly show Coquelin's Tartuffe and Rachel's Phaedre, for instance. Is the explanation that we, as a people, are less moved by the tragic and high poetic emotions, and less intellectual in our pleasures?

It would not be entirely safe to say so. The question is too complicated for a yes or no answer. It must be remembered, for one thing, that until recent years our native stage has not had playwrights skillful enough to give us a national drama of parts, rising to the dignity of our national heroes. Even our greatest hero, Lincoln, was dramatized for us by an Englishman. We have no Shakespeare or Molière or Goethe of our own, and it certainly isn't a sign of weakness that we prefer our native Rips and Josh Whitcombs to foreign characters, however exalted. It is a sign, rather, that we instinctively abide by our own destiny, a sign of health.

But that doesn't mean that we have no intellects!

THAT lack of profound or exalted emotion in our most admired examples of theatrical art, if it indicates what it seems to in our national character, rather tends to show that as a people we are still in process of finding ourselves. We have not yet become quite of age. It is a sign of the coming of age in the race no less than the individual when the process of thought, the reasoning faculty, is never held in abeyance, even when amusing one's self.

The sense of reality grows stronger with the years, and the sense, too, that behind reality is the great mystery of life which moves deeply and exalts. It is noticeable, I think, that in recent years American art has more and more sought for reality, and more and more, too, felt the tragic mystery behind it. Our recent essays and novels, even many of our recent plays, have been concerned with reorientating America (as the critics phrase it), trying to carry the intellect over into our amusements, so that they are not a mere escape into a never-never land of pleasant emotion. This movement, incidentally, has also been coincident with the growth of leisure all over the country.

People are less weary with toil than they used to be; they have more time, more money for enjoyment, fresher minds and bodies to bring to their play. That may or may not be significant; I am not sure. But at any rate I think there are signs that the universal impersonations of the future on our stage will number some of deeper intellectual appeal and more exalted emotion than in the past. But I do not believe, and certainly I do not hope, that they will sacrifice the national element of cheerful humor, kindliness, and warm, human sympathy. If we lose those things in the process of coming of age, it would be far better to remain children forever!

"DEAD BROKE"—an unpleasant situation to be in, but one which Albert Payson Terhune says is the acid test of character and a liberal education for all who pass through the experience. A big financier is credited with saying, "Any man is worth helping once; but the man who needs help a second time isn't worth helping at all." And the truth in this remark is largely borne out by Terhune's own observations which he tells you about next month in an extraordinarily interesting article.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Camel

The cigarette that leads by billions

Just to state a great truth in another way—Camel is so exactly what so many smokers want that no other brand is even a close second.

If all cigarettes were as good as Camel you wouldn't hear anything about special treatments to make cigarettes good for the throat. Nothing takes the place of choice tobaccos.

© 1927, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Winston-Salem, N. C.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

It's really amazingly simple

You see that it hasn't a single drain, pipe, belt or fan . . . . and it never needs oiling

THIS simplified General Electric Refrigerator works automatically, economically. It needs no attention—not even oiling. Inside the hermetically sealed casing there is a permanent supply of oil.

The all-in-one icing unit is merely lowered into the top of the specially designed cabinet. There is no assembling, no plumbing to be done. There are no pipes, drains, fans or belts. The unit is intact. It just has to be plugged into any electric outlet. Instantly it starts.

And quietly, economically, it gives you scientific refrigeration. Cuts down your marketing problems, your cooking tasks. It was for this the skilled engineers of General Electric worked—over a period of fifteen years—worked to produce the simplest of all refrigerators.

You will want to know more about this new-day refrigerator. You will want to see the various models. Write us today for booklet 1-A which is interesting and descriptive.

GENERAL ELECTRIC Refrigerator

ELECTRIC REFRIGERATION DEPARTMENT · OF GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY · HANNA BUILDING · CLEVELAND, OHIO

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Why I Don't Go to Church

(Continued from page 24)

liquor from him. The bootlegger hit the sawdust trail.

And I, who had listened to this evangelist night after night exhort my fellow townsmen to withdraw their support from any man in town who held out from the church, exposed the methods employed by the evangelist in converting the bootlegger. The fury of hell broke upon me. I suddenly found that, according to the evangelist, I was the hired tool of a syndicate of international Jews, who had conspired to destroy Gentile civilization by debauching it. The evangelist named a nationally known business man of Chicago as one of those Jewish conspirators.

I didn't know this business man except by reputation. I wired to city officials and court officers, heads of universities, editors of newspapers, and the pastors of the leading Protestant churches in Chicago, laying the evangelist's statements in regard to him before them, and asking them for the truth. Their indignation was aroused; their vindication of the man was emphatic and complete. "The Evangelist Is a Liar" was the heading appearing in my newspaper that week.

That night the evangelist prayed for God to perform a miracle and strike down "this infidel." He gave harrowing instances of scoffers who had defied God and dropped dead. Instead of driving me to repentance, he drove me just that much further away from the church and the god of the fierce theologians.

I had a hard time living in my town for some months after that. My attacks upon the evangelist were interpreted to many believers as attacks upon the Deity, and I was shunned or openly reviled by half of my neighbors. But I walked confidently among them, because I knew them better than they knew themselves. I knew they would get over it. And they did. When I was laid low by an attack of double pneumonia, the churches and church people were the ever-consistent and thoughtful comforters of and ministers to my distressed family.

EVEN though I don't like to go to church, I am far from being irreligious. I came of religious ancestors. My early life was largely influenced by religious-minded men and women. Some of the most beautiful characters in my town are devout churchgoers. And some, just as beautiful, good and noble and just, never go to church. When I say I don't like to go to church, I don't mean, of course, that I don't like to go occasionally to hear a Doctor Cadman, a Doctor Fosdick, a Doctor Holmes, a Rabbi Wise, or a Cardinal Hayes; I would go out of my way to hear any important and interesting person in any rôle, in any place. And I like to go occasionally to hear a Dr. John Roach Straton, a Frank Norris, or a Billy Sunday. I always did like a good show.

I say I never did like to go to church. I must qualify that a bit. Once upon a time, in my adolescent years, I did like to go to church: when a certain brown-eyed, black-haired angel sat in a pew up front and just couldn't help turning around and blushing to find my eyes intently riveted on the tantalizing little curl that came down from her back hair and nestled on the nape of her neck.

I say I don't think I ever shall like to go to church. I have a firm conviction to that effect. I am forty-three years old; I am of an intensely religious nature; I have been seeking God all my life. I have been seeking a way of life, trying ever and ever so hard to make those adjustments to life that would make for my own mental and spiritual peace and security, and enable me to live on the happiest terms with life. I sought for years to find these things in churches. I never found them.

I don't like hymn-book music. I enter church on a rainy, gloomy, dismal Sunday feeling all depressed, and listen to hymns sung indifferently. I enter church on a bright, sunny morning when all the world is fresh and green and smells good on the outside; birds are singing, children laughing, flowers nodding and smiling in the morning sun. And in church they sing moodily, while the pastor preaches an uninteresting sermon that I am sure he would rather not preach on such a beautiful morning. There is not a new thought in it.

I HAVE sat under a preacher who talked for forty minutes to explain to a congregation, in which several rich men were conspicuous, that when the Lord said it was easier for a camel to enter the eye of a needle than for a rich man to go to heaven, he really meant that it was harder for a camel to enter a gate. The camel had to get down on his knees and be relieved of some baggage before he could enter a low gate, explained the preacher.

His explanation was that a needle referred to in the Scriptures was another name for a tower through which traffic passed in and out of a walled city, and that the eye of the needle was the gate or portal of the tower.

The very next Sunday this same preacher jumped back into the Old Testament, took his text from Jonah, and said that we should believe the story of Jonah and the whale literally, because it was the word of God; that if we took liberties with one part of the word of God we might proceed to tear the whole works to pieces. As for his part, he said, it was easier for him to believe than to disbelieve.

And he was right about that. The way of an unbeliever is hard. Even if he is the world's most honest unbeliever. I am speaking of millions of humble skeptics like myself who stand reverently in the presence of the riddle of the universe, and seek understanding with eager hearts and open minds.

I have sought this understanding in the churches, and they have failed me. I find more than two hundred denominations of conflicting faiths, differing mostly on trivial points of doctrine, each interpreting an infallible book in its own fallible way, and yet denying me the privilege of being another to read the Bible in my own way.

I am told on every hand that I must not question; that I must not impose my puny intellect against the background of the wise and mighty men of the ages who have ordered all things for me. I resent this. That is just about what the prophets of Baal said to Elijah; it is very like what the Fathers of Israel said to Jesus; it is what the Church Fathers said to Galileo, to Copernicus, to Spinoza, and to Martin Luther. It is what reactionaries have said to progressives from the beginning of time.

My friends, the ministers, will rise up and say that one who lives outside the church has no right to criticize it; they tell me that if I don't like the church as it is, my place is inside the church, where I can work to make it what it should be. I believed this once, only to find to my sorrow that he who joins a church with a view to helping to make it one whit different from what it is is headed for trouble.

I JOINED the Baptist Church of my parents when I was a little boy. They had what they called a protracted meeting in the church. The evangelist preached nightly on the lurid frightfulness of hell and the beauties of heaven. I must confess to having been a bit concerned about the imminence of hell. The evangelist made it very real, more real in fact than he made heaven.

Toward the close of the meeting I went to the mourners' bench and professed religion. Deep down in my soul I knew I didn't have any more religion than I ever had, but to profess so seemed the proper and popular thing to do; everybody else was doing it. I somehow expected that the very fact of going up would work a sudden and beatific transformation in my life. I expected to be seized by the Holy Ghost. But I wasn't seized.

I left the meeting that night with a chum and we stole off to the edge of the town by the bank of a river and sat in the grass watching the play of moonlight on rippling waters. It was a glorious night. Instead of leaving God in that church back there in town, it just seemed as if we had wandered out into a silvery silence where God was.

I never got any help, inspiration, or uplift out of my early church experience. I attended services regularly for a time, but I couldn't see that belonging to a church altered my spiritual condition an iota. I had previously entertained some high and mighty notions about church membership. I had thought that a member of a church should, somehow, be a different and better person. I couldn't discover that it meant any difference at all. I didn't feel it in my own life, and I couldn't see it in the lives of other communicants, whose everyday pursuits and practices seemed pretty wretched when analyzed under boyish scrutiny. I became indifferent and gradually drifted away from the church, and felt relieved when I learned, years later, that they had flowers, sunny days and happy children playing out-of-doors make* California *a paradise

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Variety and beauty! Mile-high mountains—smooth beaches—orange groves, pepper trees and palms. World cities—quiet retreats. Every sport—every day—for the weather is perfect all the year.

Five famous Santa Fe trains leave Chicago and Kansas City every day for California. "Santa Fe all the way." Besides The Chief there are The California Limited, The Navajo, The Scout and The Missionary—all offering famous Fred Harvey meal service.

The Indian-detour—Grand Canyon Line

After California-Hawaii

W. J. Black, Pass. Traf. Mgr.
Santa Fe Sys. Lines
1000 Railway Exchange, Chicago, Ill.

Am interested in winter trip to California. Send me free picture-folders and advise cost of excursion ticket.

Name_____

Address_____

finally taken my name off the church roll.

Another time I joined a church. I had a wife and children now and I had listened long to those who would persuade me that, regardless of my personal views, I owed an obligation to the community to align myself with some church and set a wholesome example for those who were incapable of reasoning for themselves, and who might become undesirable citizens but for the restraining influence of the church in the community. "Your staying out of the church may have the effect of keeping some poor devil out who needs it," was the argument. And I joined.

I joined after talking it over with a seeming liberal-minded minister in the town, a Methodist, who assured me that Methodism was a progressive religion and that, despite all that, it provided a church home even for the liberal thinker. I found this church I joined otherwise. Once inside, I was questioned and criticized. It was observed that I did not partake of the Lord's Supper, and that I did not recite the Apostolic Creed. And one Sunday my pastor, who had accepted me as a member in full knowledge of my skeptical views, preached a sermon about doubters that seemed to be aimed pretty directly at me.

After the sermon I sought the pastor out in his study and apologized to him for my membership in his church. I told him that I thought we had understood each other, but that I knew that I was mistaken, and that I could no longer remain in the church without feeling like an impostor.

He did not seem to see the point at all; he slapped my shoulder, threw back his head and laughed, and said, "Why, my dear Saunders, I'd rather have one honest doubter like you in my congregation than a thousand spineless hypocrites who believe because they have never thought for themselves!" But I wasn't satisfied. I tendered my resignation to the board of stewards in writing early in the week. My wife retains her membership.

My wife retains her membership because the church has a very real and precious meaning for her. It was her mother's church; it was the church of her girlhood, and is associated with her liveliest girlhood memories. The social life of the church is attractive to her.

ALL of this I know. But I cannot conclude from it that there is any Divine command that I should attend church, or that preachers have any more Divine authority than other men. I cannot think that preachers are singled out by the Almighty, and "called" to their work in some peculiar manner that the rest of us are supposed to take on faith. I cannot think that the ministers have any more right than other good-intentioned men, to speak for God. Where do they get such authority? What proof is there of its authenticity?

I have heard thousands of phrases, such, for instance, as that the "church is the bride of Jesus." But such phrases say nothing to me. Who said the church was the bride of Jesus? What does that mean? A skillful preacher has a phrase for almost any situation, but my mind is of the kind that is not satisfied with phrases. I cannot help but question when a thing does not seem clear to me.

Possibly I am different from other men. If so, it is my right to be, as long as I do not do anything to diminish the liberty, happiness, or prosperity of my neighbors, or their spiritual well-being. I certainly would never lead a man "away from God." My attitude is one of sympathy for the poor fellow human who is seeking Truth. I'd help him if I could. But I would not force him to my view even if I had the power. I do not believe in coercion of any kind, whether by public opinion or otherwise, in religious matters. Freedom of thought, freedom to seek the light in my own way, freedom for others is what I believe in.

The church, I think, fills a very essential need in the lives of average church members. It is the only community or social center that most of them have; it supplies about all of the music, all of the fellowship and all of the entertainment they get out of life. It inspires them with a feeling of security and importance in being identified with the most ancient and most powerful organization ever instituted among men. It comforts them in their hours of trouble, and puts flowers on the graves of their dead. It promises them a care-free mansion in the skies in place of their care-ridden earthly home.

ELIZABETH CITY has a population of ten thousand in round numbers. Of this number three thousand, round numbers, are Negroes. The colored people live to themselves and have their own churches. The seven thousand white people in the town have eleven churches all told. There are three regular Baptist churches and a Free Will Baptist church. There are two Southern Methodist churches, an Episcopal church, a Presbyterian church, a Christian church, a Pentecostal Holiness church, a Catholic chapel, and an independent religious assembly, to say nothing of the unorganized sects.

The pastors of the six more important churches have given me some figures. They value the total of their church property at $561,675. The combined salaries of these pastors total $19,200, the contributions for all church purposes amounted to $72,974 last year. That is for six churches only.

The six churches for which I have authentic figures have a total membership of 3,178. They claim an average Sunday attendance of 1,480. Less than half of our town's folk belong to churches, and less than half the folks who belong to church are to be found in the church pews on Sunday. It is evident that a lot of folks don't like to go to church. Out of a population of 7,000, more than 5,000 are not to be found in any church on Sunday, the one day in the week when they are supposed to let the world see that the church means something to them.

But if everybody in town tried to go to church, there wouldn't be room for them. Stretching their auditorium space by opening up all of their annexes, the total seating capacity of our churches is 4,450, leaving more than 2,500 souls without a church seat.

So there are plenty of people in my town, and in every other town, who stay away from church just as much as I do. But they are wiser than I am, in their ability to keep silent about their religious views! It is simpler, perhaps, to conform, or seem to conform. And it is all right for those who care to do it. But for me, it would not be honest. I have to be myself, and think I have just as much right to say why I don't like to go to church as the preacher has to say why people should go. No doubt he is sincere. So am I. He really has something to gain by persuading others to attend church; I have nothing to gain by staying away, so my sincerity cannot be questioned on the ground of self-interest.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

I hope that I shall not convey the impression that I am hostile to churches, or that the churches generally are hostile to me. I take comfort from the fact that a notable free-thinker in the town contributed regularly to the support of a church whose services he never attended, and he was given a Christian funeral in that church when he died, with nothing said about his heresies.

In the great open spaces, in the mountains or by the sea, in sunsets and cloud effects, in the stillness and sweetness of wooded places, in the fields that men have plowed, by country roadsides, in the stars, in the restless and resistless billows of the sea, or in the dimpled laughter of babies wiggling their pink and awkward little toes—I see God.

I see Him working with a Burbank among his flowers, with an Edison in his laboratories, with a lone Lindbergh in his transatlantic flight, and with every noble and aspiring human who will work with Him in unraveling this marvelous scheme of things.

Why I Don't Go to Church
(or)
Why I Do Go to Church

Prize Contest Announcement

YOU have just finished reading the discussion on churchgoing, and the chances are that you have agreed heartily with either Mr. Guest or Mr. Saunders. Now we ask you to add your contribution to the discussion and tell us why you go to church or why you stay away. How has church attendance enriched your life? Or, if you used to be a churchgoer and gave it up, let us have your reasons for doing so. Do you want your children to go; if so, why? The Church, being a human institution, has its faults. What are those faults? Be as partisan as you please. You do not have to mince your words or hold back your real thoughts on the subject.

For the best letter of not more than four hundred words we offer the following prizes: $30, first prize; $20, second prize; $10, third prize. Competition closes January 20th. Winning letters will appear in the April issue.

Address Church Contest Editor, THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, 250 Park Avenue, New York City.

Contributions to this contest, and any enclosures, cannot be returned, so you must make a copy of your contest letter and of any enclosures, if you want to preserve them. Manuscripts and inquiries not connected with the contest must be sent under separate cover to the Editor of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

even a swim

. . and a steam-room

can't remove pore-dirt from your face

IF a Turkish bath won't clean out pore-dirt, you'll see how little chance you have of losing it with ordinary cleansing methods.

For pore-dirt is grimed down deep in every face. It's under the surface. There it clings—grays your complexion, dulls your skin, robs you of the healthy, athletic glow that a really clean face radiates.

How does it get there? The air about you all day long is teeming with millions of tiny specks of gray. They come from smoking chimneys, dusty streets, passing motors. They're too small to see. So tiny, in fact, that they work unnoticed into the pores—get packed down where the wash-cloth never reaches them.

"Not in my face," you say. Yes, in your face—in every face. Here's proof: Send for a free tube of Pompeian Massage Cream. When it comes, rub a small amount of the cream into your face.

Photomicrograph taken under the lens of powerful microscope showing section of skin before using Pompeian Massage Cream.

Photomicrograph of skin after using Pompeian. Compare the skin tone. Note the dried pellets of cream, dark with pore-dirt that has been rolled free.

Then note this amazing thing—

Goes in pink; ROLLS OUT GRAY

The upper of these two photomicrographs shows a section of skin before using Pompeian Massage Cream. Compare it with the lower picture, taken after using Pompeian. There's skin that IS clean! Those gray marks are the dried pellets of cream — dark with the pore-dirt that has been rolled free.

Give yourself a Pompeian massage. Free your pores of sallow-toned dirt. A Pompeian massage is a great start for a busy, successful day! A marvelous "sprucing-up" for a bright evening.

FREE test convinces thousands

Pompeian is 60 cents at any toilet goods counter. We'd really rather you tested it free. Fill in the coupon and drop it in the mails—right now, while you read this message.

POMPEIAN MASSAGE CREAM

The Pompeian Company, Dept. 900-A, 595 Fifth Ave., New York. Gentlemen: Please send me a free trial tube of Pompeian Massage Cream . . . enough for two cleansing, invigorating facial massages.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

This tooth brush reaches every tooth every time you brush

TO keep all your teeth, brush them all. Here is one tooth brush that reaches every tooth.

The Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush is sold in three sizes in the U. S., Can., and all over the world. Prices in U. S. and Can.: Pro-phy-lac-tic Adult, 50c; Pro-phy-lac-tic Small, 40c; Pro-phy-lac-tic Baby, 25c. Made in three bristle textures—hard, medium, soft—white or colored transparent handles—red, green, orange. For those who prefer a larger bristle surface, we make the Four-Row Pro-phy-lac-tic. Price 60 cents. Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush Co., Florence, Mass.

Why I Do Go to Church

(Continued from page 25)

citizen though he may be, is leaving to others the care of an institution which makes his neighborhood a safer place for his children to play in.

We are a queer lot about church. We can be married by justices of the peace, but most of us prefer clergymen to tie the knot. We can have our loved ones buried by undertakers, but most of us insist that a clergyman shall say the last sad prayers. In times of sickness and trial and trouble, beyond and above all the assistance of kindly neighbors and friends, we seek the aid and counsel of a minister.

As a reporter, I was a witness to this scene many times:

Someone is dying. The doctors have done all they can do. It is the last hour for a human being.

"Who knows where a minister can be found?" says someone in the room. One is located somewhere, and because the cry comes from the brink of the grave this clergyman answers the call.

"We haven't been churchgoers," sobs the mother, or the wife, or the father, or the son, "and we didn't know whether you'd care to come to us or not, but we'd feel so much better if you'd pray for him and for us."

It is one o'clock in the morning. That clergyman has been roused out of his slumber by total strangers. He strengthens and comforts a passing soul, and sustains for the time being those who remain behind to mourn. They had no use for him yesterday or the day before. But now that they themselves stand in the presence of death, they ask him to come to them and bring with him that faith and comfort which they have never supported, and, it seems, never expected to need.

I GO to church because I believe in it and in its service. When death comes into my home, I shall want a minister whom I have helped and worked with. I shall want to be able to look him in the eyes and greet him without apology. I don't want to say to him: "I have scorned you and your kind and make your works my mockery, but now I need the very thing I have been mocking. I have never given a dollar to the church, but I want the church to bury me."

Most of us are for the church when we are dying. If many of us were not for the church when we are in health, there would be no clergymen to come at our bidding in the last sad hours.

I don't want to beg my prayers at the finish.

I believe that the church is vital to community life. I believe that neither business nor government, nor social service workers, nor any other organization could do the work of the church. A man who has had no religious instruction is not an educated man. We may laugh at the Sunday-school, but therein lies the cornerstone of our manhood and womanhood.

God is as much a part of this life as he is of the life to come. I do not vision Him as one dwelling in a far-off place, to be encountered some day as a stern and frowning judge. I believe that much can be learned about Him now. There is a need for religion. Most of us want our children to be trained properly in our faith. Business has no time to teach them; Government has no time to teach religion; nor could it do it wisely if it would, because the paths which lead to God are so many and so varied. This is the proper function of the church and the difficulty now is that the church is struggling to do its duty against terrific odds which we ourselves have raised.

We are all looking to the ministry to give us a finer church. They could do it easily if we would give them a finer and more helpful body of laymen and laywomen.

I go to church and help to support it, not only because I think I need it or may some day need it, but also because I think the church needs me. If all of us who give money thought our duty ended there, the church would die. It exists not on dollars but on men and women.

PERHAPS there are clergymen who have failed to put forth every effort to hold the interest and enthusiasm of their congregations. But it is easy to find an excuse for not going to church.

I myself can always do it. On a lovely June Sunday morning, I much prefer a round of golf to our Episcopal Church service. That God can be worshiped as well under His blue skies and green trees and on His rolling meadows as within His dimly lighted building, I have often said. It is a soothing balm to my conscience. The only difficulty about this is that when I am playing golf on Sunday morning I give little thought to worship.

I can say that the minister doesn't interest me, and it may be all true, and it may also be more my fault than the minister's. If I go to church only to be interested by an orator, and not to participate in a service of worship, then my excuse for non-attendance is good. But the fact is that if I am truly sincere in my church attendance, I can worship my God in a house conducted by a minister I personally do not like, just as well as I can in the presence of one whose eloquence both charms and uplifts me.

President Coolidge, on his vacation, attended a little country church in which a boy student preached his first sermon. It isn't likely that the President was prompted to go to that church merely to hear that youthful minister. He must have known that this young man would not say to him anything he had not heard said many times before and perhaps in a much more forceful way. Certainly in that little Western community church there was no great choir to draw him there. The service was simplicity itself. The President that day set a high example for us all. He showed us clearly and vividly why more of us should be churchgoers.

Regardless of all the costly trappings which have come in to make churchgoing attractive, the fact remains that we should go for the sake of worshiping our Creator and participating in the service of our own choice. Either we are hypocrites or fools when we let one man's blunder, or one man's arrogance, or one man's intolerance, drive us away from that one thing which we know to be vital to our peace.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

So I continue to go, though I hear the same things over and over again better said or worse said by men I know well and am fond of, or by men I personally dislike, or by total strangers.

To say that I don't need the church is mere bravado. I needed it when my father died; I needed it when we were married and when our babies were taken from us, and I shall need it again sooner or later, and need it badly. I am in good health now, and I could, I suppose, get along very nicely for a time without the aid of clergyman, or choir, or even prayer; but what sort of man is he who scorns and neglects and despises his best friend until his hour of tribulation?

During the summer, which I spend with my family at Pointe Aux Barques, Michigan, I go to church to hear Professor William Lyon Phelps, of Yale University. Born and trained as a Baptist, during the three months of his summer vacation he gives his time and thought and strength to the little Methodist church of Huron City. Every Sunday afternoon he conducts religious services for the benefit of the community at large. For money? No. For publicity? No. For the sake of hearing himself talk? Not at all. It is because he believes in churches and the things for which they stand.

Farmers and summer resorters sit crowded side by side in that little House of God listening to this man's words. They are simple and direct and almost old-fashioned, but they carry with them comfort and hope and faith and courage that could come from no other source than a supreme and abiding faith in God and Jesus Christ. If Professor Phelps, with all his learning, has found comfort in the things of the Church, who am I to say they are not there?

THE Church is accused of being constantly after money, and I fancy there is basis for the charge. A more liberal laity could wipe out this degradation.

A constantly begging minister is the living symbol of a niggardly congregation.

I fancy no clergyman enjoys very greatly the money-raising part of his job. A wise and an active vestry or board would save their minister from this humiliation. They would see that the funds necessary for his work were raised for him. They would themselves assume the material burden, and free him for the spiritual work of his parish. In this way, they could make him a welcome visitor everywhere instead of a feared and unwelcome one.

The church is an earthly institution. It was built by men to satisfy their spiritual needs. It has been called the House of God, but it is really occupied by human beings, and suffers from every need of human habitation. God does not run the bills or pay them. Men put on the mortgages and men must lift them. Debts can be paid only with money, and money can come only from those who have it. Staying away from church will not lessen its indebtedness. It will only increase it. The difficulty, as I see it, is that now those who do go to church are carrying twice the burden they should. They are maintain-

Some back-to-nature facts

First off, let's discount all Arabian Nights stories about the miracle of instantly curing dandruff; the miracle of quickly putting hair on a perfectly bald head. Our native horse-sense makes us ask: If such promises are true why is any man bald?

Now that we have put fairy-tales aside—what are some simple facts?

Physicians have been studying the hair and scalp for years and they have learned a lot. For one thing, they went right back to Nature to get one of their most effective scalp remedies—pine tar; pine tar from the pine woods—where the very air snaps and crackles with health.

So about 60 years ago Daniel Packer began to incorporate pine tar in a soap—Packer's Tar Soap. And ever since then doctors have been recommending this fine soap as the most convenient and pleasant way to give your hair the benefits of pine tar.

We have never offered Packer's Tar Soap as a cure-all. But we do know and promise you this: There is no more sensible way for the average man to care for his average head of hair than to wash it regularly with Packer's—and massage the lather in.

To get acquainted with Packer's is to get acquainted with a real man's soap if there ever was one. Pile up the snowy, generous lather, a lather laden with the tingle and aroma of the pine woods themselves. Your scalp glows with cleanliness and life and health. (If you run across a finer shampoo soap than Packer's won't you send us a sample? We would like to try it ourselves.)

If you are not soon using Packer's for luxurious baths—well—you will simply be missing some real fun.

Send 10c for Sample and Manual

For 10c (stamps or coin) we will send you a generous sample of Packer's Tar Soap and a copy of our new Manual, "The Care of the Hair." This profusely illustrated 28-page book presents the most scientific thought on the care of the hair; suggestions for the care of dry hair, oily hair, falling hair and dandruff. Fill in coupon, clip and mail.

THE PACKER MFG. CO., INC., Dept. 6-A
Box 85, G. P. O., New York, N. Y.

I enclose 10c. Please send me sample half-cake of Packer's Tar Soap and your Manual, "The Care of the Hair."

*Name*_____

*Street*_____

*City*_____ *State*_____

(PRINT CLEARLY to avoid mismailing)

© 1927, P. M. Co.

PACKER'S Tar Soap

"PURE AS THE PINES"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A dash of Lilac—skin safety!

Prevent those shaving infections!

Embarrassing—those small skin eruptions! They seem to show a lack in scrupulous cleanliness.

Yet soap and water can't prevent them. Only antiseptic care will ensure clean, clear-looking skin all the time.

That makes Pinaud's Lilac an essential after every shave.

For Lilac is a real antiseptic, and healing, too. The same wonderful ingredients, newly processed, make Lilac blander than ever before!

Buy a bottle tonight at any drug or department store. The genuine Lilac has the signature of Ed. Pinaud in red on the bottle. Pinaud, Paris, New York.

PINAUD'S LILAC

[Lilas de France]

Copr., 1928, Pinaud, Inc.

ing an institution for others who now profess not to need it, but who later on will call upon it for help.

I am inclined to the opinion that as laymen we churchgoers are not all we should be or could be. If the church is not attractive to other people, and especially to young people, we must assume our share of the blame. We cannot in justice shove it all onto the minister. Even the most up-to-date clergyman has to depend upon the old-fashioned Bible and the old-fashioned truths and the old-fashioned faith, for his inspiration and his teaching. It is a church and not a show-house he is conducting. The layman can, by his presence and his support, help make his church an interesting meeting place.

"The people I meet in churches don't interest me," I have heard said countless times. The critics are talking about us churchgoers now. Maybe something is the matter with us. Perhaps we have let our religion make us finicky and supercritical and smug-faced and even hypocritical and bigoted. If our neighbor has no religion of his own, and thinks he wants one, we haven't made him feel that ours is a product to be desired. Apparently it hasn't made us happy and cheerful and helpful and honest and fun-loving. As samples of what our religion does we are all trade killers more or less.

As a matter of fact, we ourselves aren't convincing in our desire for the church. Of course we go and we pay to its support; but our enthusiasm is not whole-hearted. We're not earnest enough about it. Most of us couldn't convince anyone that the church fills a genuine need in our lives. If this were so, we should be active laymen and laywomen. We should be busy in the church affairs. We should be planners and workers and dreamers for it. At least we should be able to convince our own children that it is a good thing, and even in that most of us seem to fail.

The way to interest young people, and all people, in the church is to make it interesting. How? I think that is the question for the laity to decide. They have established a church for the nurture of the spiritual side of life. They support trained clergymen to preach the gospel and teach the doctrines of their church, but, that done, they have rested. What church members should do is to go out and demonstrate to the world that their religion and their churchgoing makes them human and lovable and kind and brave. The wave of doubt which is spreading comes not from the clergy but from the laity.

So I attend church when I can, and do for the church what I can, because I believe in it. I have found nothing in my religion that has interfered with my progress for a single moment. I have never been held back from a single opportunity. It has been my source of inspiration and strength and comfort, and I should be an ingrate and a fool to desert it now. Criticized and derided and belittled, ridiculed and mocked as it is, the Church still stands for all that is finest in our thought. It is still the mother of our greatest sons and daughters.

I do not join with the non-believers and the non-churchgoers, because I see no hope where they would take me. I see them trying to lead me and my children into license and debauchery; into a cruel struggle for existence on the earth and to a hopeless deathbed at the last. I will not set my face or the faces of my children toward such a wilderness.

Helga Lind and the Bright Noël

(Continued from page 23)

funny," Helga said to herself. "It tears you in two, thinking of it!"

The next day Abbie said, "Would you think it was queer if I was to call the baby Jim, after Jim MacFarlane, that wanted to marry me? I don't want as he should grow up like Ernie. . . . Once Jim give me arbutus in the spring."

Helga went to Jim MacFarlane after that. She tried to tell him about Abbie.

"I wonder if you'd come see her, Jim," she said. "I never knew her much, and I can't be to her what some old friend would be. No one comes—and she probably won't get well."

But Jim's head went back stubbornly.

"Now her city friends have gone back on her, she'll take what's left, eh?" he said. "No, thanks! I've had my dose of Abbie Pritchard, 'n' I don't mind saying it was a bitter dose—I don't hanker for another!"

Helga went away from him with her heart heavy.

"He wanted to come," she thought; "but he's too proud—she must have hurt him badly."

Well, that was that. But she didn't quite give up. She went to Jessie Sutton, a girl of Abbie's age, and asked her to come. Jessie said she would; but there'd probably been gossip at home, and she was busy with Christmas shopping. She never came. Helga spoke to nearly all the neighbors, and some did mean to go in—but Abbie had been a pert little thing; she hadn't meant much to anyone. No one went, no one at all, and it fell upon Helga alone to ease the child's loneliness.

They wanted Helga to help put on the Christmas pageant at the church. But she wouldn't. She was angry at them all for being so numb about Abbie and, too, she couldn't bear to leave Abbie alone for long. For Abbie was getting very weak now.

"We'll have a wee Christmas tree for Jim," Helga told her cheerfully. "Emil's brought him the funniest, softest little cat, and Hulda's embroidering him a dress, and Mother's doing something—she won't tell what. Shall we have the tree up here by the bed?"

Abbie tried to smile.

"You're awful good," she said. "But I guess it won't matter about where you have the tree—I don't believe as I'll be here Christmas."

"Nonsense!" Helga said, and managed to laugh. "I'm hoping you can sit up for Christmas dinner!"

Abbie smiled again and did not speak.

It was snowing next morning, great soft flakes that were very beautiful.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Looks as if we'd have a white Christmas," Helga said to Abbie, as she took her untouched breakfast away.

Abbie looked steadily at the drifting flakes.

"It never used to snow like that in the city," she said.

Before Helga left for the day on the Route, she fastened the curtains back so that Abbie could watch the snow.

"I love snow too," she said to Abbie. "It's so quiet and so clean—and so beautiful. I like to feel it on my face."

"I used to like to coast—down Kollop Hill—when I was a kid," Abbie said wistfully.

There it was again: "When I was a kid." There was a lump in Helga's throat as she drove out into the snowstorm. When she came home her mother said, "Abbie's had a couple bad spells this afternoon. Go up quietly—I think she's sleeping."

Helga called Doc Davy.

". . . And won't you please stop at the Pritchards' and get one of them, anyway, to come up? She's so homesick."

BUT when Doc Davy came he was alone. There was a raw red mark across his face.

"I tried to make him come, and he took the horsewhip to me," he said, a little grimly. "I don't believe Abbie really wants him—don't seem possible!"

Helga called the Pritchards' the next morning, hoping to talk to Abbie's mother; but Israel Pritchard answered, and Helga hung up. She asked Sary Overhiser to go down and see if she couldn't tell Mrs. Pritchard about Abbie. Sary did go, but it was no use.

"She don't dare say her soul's her own!" she said impatiently over the 'phone. "Don't know what's got into Israel—he didn't use to be so hard when he was younger."

"Well, you come down some afternoon, Sary."

"I'll try to," said Sary. But Helga knew, by some sudden indifference in her voice, that Sary wouldn't come.

Helga looked out of the window at two cutters passing. If only they would stop—she had an impulse to go out and shout to them to stop, just for a moment's friendliness to Abbie. But the bells became faint in the distance and Helga went slowly up-stairs.

That night Abbie said:

"Pa thought as I wasn't married to Ernie—but I was, all right!" After a little she whispered, "I guess Pa don't know how much awfuler some things is than not bein' married!"

Later that night, she became very weak.

"I wish Ma was here," she said faintly. Then—"I wisht I was home!"

Presently she opened her eyes and spoke quite clearly.

"I used to think my room to home was kind of ugly; but I guess it wasn't. It was so kind of clean, like this one, 'n' out the window I could look at the hills 'n' the creek—funny how you can get lonesome for hills, isn't it? I didn't never suppose you could miss land 'n' water same as folks."

"Yes—you can," Helga said. "I know how that is. Would it hurt you too much if I should pull your bed over a little in the morning? Then you could see the hills, you can even see your house."

How offices in Chicago . . . keep step with growing business

Mr. Otto R. Geuther, of Marshall-Jackson Company, replanning an office to handle more work efficiently

BETTER looking, smoother working offices. Planned, equipped and supplied scientifically. Floor-space measured, apportioned, to make every square foot return full value for the money invested in it. Equipment selected only after most careful analysis of the particular business it is to serve.

In Chicago, such offices are now being planned for the Northwestern Railway Company, the Chicago Office of the Fire Association of Philadelphia, and other progressive firms. The work is conducted by Marshall-Jackson Company, Globe-Wernicke Agents for Greater Chicago—under the personal supervision of Mr. Otto R. Geuther.

The planning method used by Mr. Geuther—and by authorized G-W agents everywhere—is known as Globe-Wernicke Service. It is a method perfected after almost half a century's experience in making fine office equipment, and exhaustive research in actual office conditions.

This emblem appears on the window of every dealer authorized and qualified to render Globe-Wernicke Service. Look for it Globe-Wernicke Service saves you money—on floor-space, on equipment. It enables your office to turn out more and better work in less time. It gives your office an appearance which reflects the prestige and efficiency of your business.

In your city, or close by, there is an authorized Globe-Wernicke agent. You will know his store by the emblem shown below. At your convenience, he will gladly send his trained consultant in office equipment—wholly without obligation on your part. Phone him today.

GLOBE-WERNICKE EQUIPMENT includes

Steel Filing Cabinets • Steel Shelving
Steel Safes and Storage Cabinets
Sectional Bookcases
Safeguard Filing System
Visible Record Service
Office Furniture Library Equipment
Stationers' Goods

Descriptive literature on any of these items sent free on request. Address The Globe-Wernicke Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Globe-Wernicke

OFFICE EQUIPMENT SERVICE

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Have that "WARM SUN" feeling on icy mornings

for ⅓ less fuel

THE average heating system requires approximately 1½ tons of coal (or 190 gallons of oil) a season for each radiator. By replacing ordinary air-venting valves on the radiators of your one pipe steam system with Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves, you save ⅓ of this fuel.

By this saving, you earn 50% to 65% on your investment in Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves—the first year. At the end of the second, you have your original investment back—plus a profit. Every year (after this) you make yourself a gift of approximately $5 a radiator.

Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves make radiators hot in 15 minutes (not an hour). Radiators stay piping hot 3 hours (not 30 minutes) after fires are banked. Hence greater comfort besides this saving of ⅓ of the coal or oil you formerly used.

SEND FOR BOOK. Like any investment, this one is worth studying. For complete facts (explaining the clever invention which makes this amazing comfort and fuel saving possible) send for an illustrated book, "How to Lock Out AIR—the heat thief". Just write your name and address on the edge of this ad and mail to Hoffman Specialty Co., Inc., Dept. P-12, 25 W. 45th St., New York, U. S. A.

HOFFMAN No.2 VACUUM VALVES

"No—'twouldn't hurt," said Abbie.

But in the morning Abbie was worse. They got her over by the window though, and she smiled a little, seeing the hills of home, the frozen creek between bare trees, her father's red barn and silo. Helga hated to leave her.

"To-morrow's Christmas," she said, "and we have the dearest tree for the baby! I'll bring it up to-night and show you. It's going to sparkle so you can see it a mile off."

Abbie did not answer, only lay quite still and stared out at the white world.

When Helga came that night, Rush Sloan was there. Much as she had wanted him, she only put her hands in his for one glad moment, and then went to Abbie.

"Sorry, Rush, but she's awfully sick—she needs someone always with her!"

"Can't I come too?"

So they went together up the stairs, and she told him in hurried whispers about Abbie. When they entered the bedroom Abbie lay quite still, her eyes closed.

"Abbie! Abbie!" Helga said gently.

Abbie opened her eyes, tired-of-life child's eyes, but she did not seem to see them. Helga put out a hand to Rush, suddenly afraid. Abbie began to whisper, and Helga bent to listen. It was quite dark outside, but Abbie was saying:

"Don't the snow look pretty—so soft 'n' clean? It was so . . . dirty . . . in the city! It's so . . . soft . . . 'n'—"

Helga's eyes were blinded with tears; she dropped on her knees by the bed.

"Abbie, Abbie dear, can't you wait till Christmas?" she begged. "Abbie! Abbie!"

But tired, hungry little Abbie Pritchard did not answer.

IT WAS after nine when Helga came into the living-room and said: "I'm going to do something queer, Mother. Seems as if I've got to do it—for Abbie—for Abbie's Christmas! Rush, will you come with me? Down to the church? And, Mother, where's that white blanket? I'm going to take the baby."

"Why, Helga!"

"I know! But you can't touch some people in ordinary ways—and he's never seen the baby! He didn't use to be so hard, Sary says; it's just that he hasn't been made to see—to feel! And there's all the old friends, that have been too busy making Christmas presents . . . and Jim MacFarlane!"

So Helga and Rush Sloan took Abbie's baby and walked down the snowy road toward the church.

"I'm almost glad—for Abbie," Helga said once. "Life's always been too much for her. It was too much for her here, where she wanted to be a girl, free and happy. It was too much for her, out there, where she wanted to be a woman. Now she's rested, she'll never have to fight life any more. . . . But the baby, Rush, that's different. I think she wanted the baby to grow up at home. I know they're hard, the Pritchards, but it seems to me they need this baby to soften them, to make them understand their own hardness, and Abbie!"

"But you said you'd tried—"

"Yes, I have, and the neighbors too. Doc Davy went to him but they've never seen the baby, really seen it! Maybe I oughtn't to do this—before all the neighbors; but they all know, and some of them have been hard, too!"

They were there before the church—in the vestibule. And then it was that the miracle happened. Perhaps only a miracle of love and Christmas; but a miracle all the same.

The church was dim, and on the platform was the Manger scene. It was really beautiful, for Sweden Hollow—the Wise Men kneeling, the carols softly chanted in the distance. And into the hearts of the Sweden Hollow folks had come a gentleness, a forgetting of petty neighborhood quarrels, a tenderness for young, believing things. You could see it in their faces.

And, as they sat there, quiet and listening, Helga Lind walked up the aisle and up onto the platform. She stood there before their startled eyes, a moment, holding the baby in her arms. She was somehow profoundly beautiful, looking down at us all with both compassion and sternness in her gray eyes.

When she spoke, her voice was very gentle, but clear.

"It seems so strange," she said, "that at the blessed Christmas time, a little girl could die among us and have no one with her but strangers. It seems so strange that, with all the world giving and loving, anyone could come home . . . to Sweden Hollow . . . and find no welcome for herself or her child!"

And then—whether she had thought of these words before, or whether they came to her as she stood there, I know not—but then she held out the baby, and said with clear and beautiful sadness:

"'The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man hath not where to lay His head'!"

And Abbie Pritchard's mother, with tears falling unheeded, came running up the aisle, reached for the baby. And Israel Pritchard came awkwardly after, his hard face working with strange and awful pain. And Jim MacFarlane knelt with his head against the altar rail and sobbed, forgetting us all in the bitterness and shame of his grief. And in the hearts of many of us was the unforgettable knowledge that we had meant to see Abbie, and had not gone!

SO Abbie Pritchard's baby came home, and so the folks of Sweden Hollow learned a lesson of thoughtfulness that would stay with them as long as they lived. And I say it was a miracle of the Noël—a miracle of love and forgiveness.

On the way home, under the frosty stars, Rush Sloan said, humbly:

"Helga, sometimes I feel I haven't any right to you, you're too big for me. To do what you just did, without melodrama or hurting unduly—I couldn't have done it. I don't know anyone else who could have! There's something about you that's as big as the world is big. . . . Why, what is it, Helga?"

For Helga had paused in the snowy road, and her hands went out to the hands of Rush Sloan.

"Oh, Rush, I don't want to belong to the folks here—I want to belong just to you!" she said tiredly.

"Helga—sweetheart!"

And the stars of Christmas Eve made bright shining upon the miracle of their love.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

I Am Proud That I Was an Orphan!

(Continued from page 9)

quickly rose in his own right. He became the head of the boys' band and a leader in student activities.

Scotland school was on a far grander scale than Chester Springs. It was modern, well equipped, and set in beautifully landscaped grounds. There was a football field, as fine as that of any minor college; a baseball field big enough for a dozen diamonds; a parade ground circled by a half-mile of gravel driveway; a private lake, on which we skated in winter, and a clear stream in which were deep swimming holes; there were acres upon acres of playgrounds, a big farm that supplied vegetables in season, a modern gymnasium and an indoor swimming pool. The school had its own laundry, its own lighting plant, and a fully equipped industrial training building, where were taught printing, tailoring, cabinet-making, machine work and tool-making. Pupils, after reaching certain grades, were permitted to take up stenography, typewriting, and telegraphy. Every girl was taught dressmaking.

William C. Bambrick was the superintendent in charge of boys, with the title of "Colonel." He was a former West Virginia University man, and there he had been one of the pioneers of football, and active in military and physical training. His assistant was Major "Phil" Johnson, himself an orphan and former pupil, and an excellent baseball pitcher. "Tod" Skinner, a 'varsity halfback at Dickinson in his law-school days, was one of the teachers.

THESE men brought the spirit of college to Scotland—the college spirit of twenty-five years ago. The football and baseball teams which they trained played the freshman and scrub teams of such famous schools as Mercersburg Academy, the old Carlisle Indians, Shippenburg Normal, and amateur aggregations for miles around. It was rarely that they lost more than one game a season. Our football teams would "walk away" with the ordinary high-school elevens. On gridiron or diamond they couldn't be beaten in those days, except by much older boys.

I was, next to Billy Allison, the youngest boy in the school, and one of the smallest. Consequently, I didn't shine in these big Saturday contests except as a spectator. But every one of us kids had visions of some day "making the team." The "spirit of the team" began at the top, and didn't stop until it had percolated to the very bottom; and that spirit was, "They've got to be big to beat an orphan!"

My first baseball game at Scotland made me proud that I was an orphan. Whom we were playing I've forgotten, and what the score was, too. But I remember that we came into the ninth inning tie, and "Tony" Jordan, our pitcher, struck out in succession the invader's three best sluggers to let us beat them in the closing half. And then five hundred young throats, among which mine was one, burst forth with the victory yell:

When rubber slips Weed Chains Grip

Only one thing is worse than getting stuck in the mud—and that's getting stalled in the snow. It takes tough steel WEED Chain cross links to make safe traction at such times. No substitute for steel, no variation of the Weed Tire Chain principle can grip as well as WEEDS. Remember "There can be no compromise with safety." So always keep WEEDS handy in your car until you need them —then put them on for dependable traction.

A PRODUCT OF THE AMERICAN CHAIN COMPANY Inc. in business for your safety for sure traction in snow, mud or on ice

WEED CHAINS

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

See the World FREE!

Taste Romance and Adventure In the Far Lands of the Earth

How often you've longed to see for yourself the awe of Egypt's pyramids—the beauties of the gorgeous Mediterranean sunset—the squalor of China's ancient cities!

Spend a few years, or the rest of your life, tasting high adventure on the seven seas and in all the world's great ports—roving the earth's highways and byways! You can do it FREE—all your expenses paid—and earn a good salary besides!

Only one profession will carry you around the world at will, traveling like a gentleman, but that's the most interesting and pleasant work there is—Radio Operating! Easily and quickly learned, there's no other profession like it for the man who wants the experiences and pleasures of world-travel. Radio operators are needed—all sea-going ships like the one shown here must carry from one to half a dozen or more.

Take a Look Beyond the Skyline Without a Penny's Expense

Radio operators aboard ocean liners live luxuriously—they rank as officers of the ship. Meals, a private cabin, all other living needs are furnished free, and besides the operator draws a good salary. You can learn quickly and easily at home in your spare time to be a Radio operator through our practical training methods. Take a look at the FREE BOOK which tells how—mail coupon below.

This U. S. Government-recognized school has been training successful operators since 1914. Our graduates are all over the world. We maintain an Employment Department to put you on your own ship. The world-famous NATROMETER, our own patented invention, obtainable only by students of this Institute, is recognized as the best and easiest way to learn the Radio code. A few short months, with the aid of the famous Natrometer and our quick home training, and you too can be a fully qualified Radio operator, sitting in your cabin like the one shown above, bound out for Liverpool or Nagasaki!

Read the Free Book that tells all about this fascinating profession and our practical Government-recognized methods of training you for it. Send coupon TODAY—no obligation. Special tuition offer now on, includes world-famous Natrometer free of extra cost with your course! Act at once.

NATIONAL RADIO INSTITUTE
WASHINGTON, D. C.

SPECIAL OFFER COUPON

National Radio Institute,
Dept. 1B, Washington, D. C.
Gentlemen: Without obligating me in any way send me your free book and information about your offer of Natrometer with course.

World-Famous Natrometer

Name.....

Address.....

Zip, Boom, Bah!
Zip, Boom, Bah!
ORPHANS, ORPHANS!
Rah, Rah, Rah!

No Yale man ever cheered for Old Eli with greater pride than we did as we ripped out yell after yell for our school. And at chapel service that evening, Colonel Bambrick spoke of the victory. He began, "We showed them to-day something of the stuff of which an orphan is made." Sunday morning I read in every Philadelphia paper, "ORPHANS WIN!"

This pride of ours in our orphanhood was a subtle thing, that grew as a river grows, by the contributions of a thousand tiny streams. A boy would be hurt in play, even to the extent of a broken bone, and yet he wouldn't whimper—an orphan didn't. The story of a swindle would appear in the newspapers, and the comment would be final with us, "They couldn't pull anything like that on an orphan!" The hero in the novel might bog down, exhausted by his hardships, but to the freckled-nosed orphan reader he no longer would be a hero unless he rose up and went on, "like an orphan would." The highest compliment one boy could pay another was to say, "You acted like a true orphan." It was a magic, reverenced word.

I WAS fifteen years old before I knew that, in the world's eyes, an orphan should be an object of pity; and when I made that discovery I was the most surprised orphan alive. I was on duty in the colonel's office and he was seated at his desk going through some mail. "Read this," he invited.

The letter was from a woman. "My heart goes out," she wrote, "to all those poor orphan children, and I would like to do something for them. Perhaps I could send you some blankets and some clothing my own children have outgrown."

"That woman is like most people," explained the colonel. "She thinks of an orphan as a puny, half-starved, ragged little urchin who goes about with tears in his eyes and who is kicked by everybody. I wonder what she would think if she saw our football squad."

I was incredulous, certain that the colonel was playing a joke on me, and when he convinced me that he was not, the joke appeared even funnier. Had I been the poorest, most miserable boy in school I wouldn't have changed places with this woman's son—no, not with any rich man's son, either. We looked down upon rich folks' children, especially their boys. They were "sissies," afraid to get their feet wet; and any good orphan could thrash a dozen of them in a bunch, was our belief.

There was real physical training at Scotland, real athletic competition, real play. We could swim, skate, run, jump, and tussle. I wasn't in school a month until I was an expert with Indian clubs, dumbbells, and could do a calisthenic drill perfectly. I knew the rifle drill and bayonet fighting. I could take a wallop from a bare fist and give one. My muscles were hard, my wind was sound, and I could do a turn on the horizontal bar and chin myself twenty times without stopping. I was far too glorified a being to wear anybody's cast-off clothing, when I could get a brand-new uniform simply by "accidentally" ripping my old coat on a nail, in a place where the mend would be conspicuous.

But we learned more than pride in this orphans' asylum. Our days were full; they were interesting. Half of each day was expended in the classroom, the other half in the shop. Every evening when the weather was nice there was a dress parade, then dinner, then chapel, then an hour of study under teachers who saw that we actually studied, and at nine-thirty, bed, with "Taps" and "Lights out" at ten. Play periods, drill periods, gymnasium periods interspersed this daily routine. Saturday was "clean-up" day and inspection; Sunday a day of ease, and church.

Every boy picked his trade himself, and if he found after a trial that he had chosen unwisely, he was permitted to change. I began at Scotland as a student of cabinet-making, and was taught the uses of woodworking machinery, how to distinguish the different kinds of woods at a glance, how to veneer and inlay, and to carve with a chisel. Much of this knowledge has been invaluable at times, though I never became a cabinet-maker.

Later I took up stenography and typewriting and joined the school literary society. We furnished material for the school's paper, which was printed in the school shops; conducted debates on every subject under heaven, learned something of oratory and how to conduct a meeting. I am a writer to-day largely as a result of work done in the literary society at Scotland.

There was an excellent library in the school and books were free to any boy or girl who wanted them. During one winter I read more than a hundred books—Scott, Mark Twain, Lamb's Tales of Shakespeare, Abbott's histories, Milton, Chaucer, Pope, Poe, and a dozen others. I was such a persistent reader that I was made librarian.

We had a school band, and as a member of it I learned music and to play a reed instrument, under Conductor Charlie Mentzer, as kindly and as lovable a bandmaster as ever waved a baton. The band occasionally played in nearby cities and marched in the great parades of the state.

I don't believe, had my parents lived, that I would have learned any music, for ours wasn't a musical family. I don't believe I would have had opportunity to visit the cities of my state, and to know the thrill of marching with thousands, and to see and hear the great orators of the day. I don't believe I would have had a wonderful library of good books at my command, or a society to interest me in literature and help me to understand its priceless works. I don't believe that either of my parents or the public schools would have taught me anything of woods, machines, and fine furniture-making, or of stenography and typewriting, all before I was sixteen years old.

AT HOME, I probably would have been taught a creed, and to be distrustful of all other creeds; at school, I was taught of God and the Bible, without creed, without narrowness, without rancor. I didn't know the difference between a Catholic and a Protestant until after I left school. At home, I might have learned to judge folks by the amount of money they had, or by the kind of house they lived in; at school, I learned to judge them only by what they did or tried to do, regardless of race, nativity, or color.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Wire-Haired Fox Terrier

Saved his Dog from Distemper

"Of four pups, I lost three from distemper before I used Sergeant's Distemper Medicine. The fourth, the only one having this medicine, was saved, and is now perfectly healthy."

Now is the time of year to watch for this dread scourge of Dogdom. Few dogs escape it. Many beloved animals die because their masters don't know what to do for them. Use Sergeant's Distemper Medicine.

Symptoms
Cough, fever, dry nose, vomiting, loss of weight, thirst, hot skin, little desire for food, dull coat, tendency to sleep.

Would You Know?

If Distemper attacked your dog, would you know what to do? Isn't it worth while to find out, particularly if this information costs you nothing? There are effective remedies for every dog ailment, and it is a simple matter to find out when and how to use them.

DONT'S for Dog Lovers
Don't fail to keep your dog in condition.

Famous Dog Book Free

We urge you to write for a free copy of Polk Miller's Famous Dog Book. It contains the accumulated experience of fifty years. In clear, non-technical language it tells the symptoms of dog diseases and the best treatments for each. There are useful articles on the breeding, feeding and rearing of dogs. This book has been the guide for millions of dog lovers. It is revised yearly and kept up-to-date. It has saved the lives of untold thousands of valuable dogs.

Expert Advice Free

If your dog develops a condition not fully explained in Polk Miller's Dog Book, write us at once. State age, breed, sex, and all symptoms. Our expert veterinarian will answer personally, sending, without charge, complete instructions for care and treatment. Sergeant's Dog Medicines, standard for over fifty years, are on sale by dealers everywhere. If you cannot obtain them, order direct. Address Polk Miller Products Corp., 1567 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

Write for Your Free Copy of Polk Miller's Dog Book.

Sergeant's DOG MEDICINES
"A medicine for every dog ailment"

Certainly I would have enjoyed no private gymnasium at home, no private instructors in physical culture and sports, no such rigid and scientific regulation of the conditions under which I lived. Only sixteen deaths occurred among the pupils at Scotland in twenty-five years, and at one time there was not a single death during a period of eleven years. Is there a public school anywhere in this land that can boast of a better record?

The orphan school taught me to fight my own battles, and to fight fairly. It taught me to make my own decisions, to live my own life, not as older folks wished me to live it but as I myself wished to live it. My mother used to say, "We'll make a doctor of him," and my father would object. "No, he will be a painter." The orphan school said, "There is the world; go into it and do what you can best do." It gave us freedom; and more—it taught us how to use it.

HAVE I pictured an ideal school, grinding out only ideal pupils? I did not mean to. Our school had faults, as all schools have. Our instructors were not without fault. There was little mischief in the realm of boydom into which we husky, well-fed, physically fit orphans did not get. We raided the ice cream intended for the directors' dinner, stole pies from the bake shop, played havoc in nearby melon patches, and received thrashings untold for our misdeeds. It required a strong arm to hold us in check.

No, the school wasn't ideal; but it tried to be! No school in the land had a higher aim, no teachers were more conscientious or faithful, no training course was more carefully thought out or more earnestly executed. And while every boy and girl did not go out into the world to shine, hundreds of them did. A year or two ago I made a check of a group of my orphan schoolmates, and found a near-millionaire, a college professor, a preacher, a business executive, and a banker, before I had exhausted a dozen names. Others had wives and families and jobs and homes of their own. Not one of the twelve had failed to make a go of life. Five of them were college graduates.

And a year ago, when the American Legion held its national convention in my home city of Philadelphia, I got one of the great thrills of my life. I was watching the parade as it passed down Broad Street. As various units and bands marched by, the crowds that lined the curb burst into applause. Up the street I heard what was a roar of applause rolling toward us. People craned their necks. For a time we could not see what this extra measure of enthusiasm was about.

Then into view came a band—a band of boys. They wore the blue of the old army. Their heads were up; every line was true; in perfect time and harmony they blared forth "The Stars and Stripes Forever." The applause swelled around them above the music of the stirring march, but, like regulars, not one youngster looked to the right or left. Their bass drum came opposite me, and as I read its bold inscription the lump in my throat choked my cheers and my pride made me dizzy. It was my old school band! In memory, once again I heard the victory yell: "ORPHANS! ORPHANS!"

✦ ✦ ✦ ✦ ✦

On the Right Track

Boys and girls who are taught today that 3-in-One puts pep and go in their engines, motors, bicycles, skates, etc. and makes them last longer, will later need no prompting to use this good oil for all other oiling purposes.

3-in-One
Prevents Rust - OILS - Cleans & Polishes

has been a real life-saver for home and office mechanisms for over a third of a century. Pure, penetrating, non-gumming—distinctly different from and better than ordinary machine oil. 3-in-One is a compound of high-quality oils.

A merchant near you sells 3-in-One in Handy Cans and Bottles. Look for the Big Red "One" on the label.

FREE: Generous sample and Dictionary of Uses. Request both on a postal.

THREE-IN-ONE OIL COMPANY
130 William St., New York, N. Y.

Make a wonderful dustless dust cloth by sprinkling a little 3-in-One on a piece of soft cloth. Cheap. Effective.

KR976

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Turn Your Handicap to Your Advantage

(Continued from page 33)

other words, people often achieve because of the very existence of a handicap!

An old woman started a newspaper stand near the corner of the main thoroughfare. She had many competitors. In fact, each of the four corners of the street intersection also supported news-stands. She could not make a go of it.

Then, as luck would have it, she swallowed a pin which lodged in her throat. She was taken to the hospital and operated upon. Her life was saved, but her voice was affected. When she recovered her voice had a peculiar hoarse, raucous, mannish quality. She reopened her news-stand but with many misgivings. How could she make a living with a damaged voice, when she had not been able to make both ends meet before?

But this woman with the mannish voice soon attracted attention. When crying "What d'ya read?" people turned to see whence came this strange voice. They stopped. They engaged her in conversation to hear her talk. And they bought papers. Her news-stand soon was a paying proposition.

Ben Turpin is another case like this. I don't say he might not have scored in motion pictures had he not been afflicted with cross-eyes, because I know nothing of his inherent acting ability. The fact remains, nevertheless, that this physical deformity is what he features on the screen. He has become a movie star because of it.

ONE of the most fascinating cases on record is that of Clifford W. Beers. He, too, applied the principle of compensation. When a young man he became insane. He was confined to an institution for the mentally deranged. All his bright hopes for the future seemed to be shattered.

But what finally happened was this: Beers recovered. And he remembered not only the torments he, himself, had undergone, he remembered also the deplorable state of affairs he found in some of the asylums where he had been a patient. Moreover, as a patient he had been able to obtain the inner, personal viewpoint of other psychotics in a way that no physician or attendant or relative had ever obtained before. In short, he got the actual "low-down," as they say, on mental suffering.

All this he put in a book which is now famous, "A Mind That Found Itself." Thousands of copies have been sold. And then Beers started out to help the cause of insanity in a still more tangible way. He resolved to devote his life to his fellow sufferers. He organized a society, the aim of which is to study and perform researches upon every phase of the ever-increasing insanity problem. His earnestness and enthusiasm, bred of actual experience, impressed leaders of thought in the medical profession, in every other field. He interested capital in his project. Finally, the National Committee for Mental Hygiene came into existence through his efforts. Beers is still its secretary.

Beers took the handicap of insanity which ordinarily floors the average man and woman, and turned it into a national humanitarian triumph. And besides, Beers has created a reputation for himself that will be written in the annals of American medicine.

A pianist, a composer, whose songs and dance music were not taking hold at all suddenly contracted an infection of his right hand. The hand had to be amputated. In despair he concentrated all his efforts in making his left hand proficient. Again the principle of compensation came to the rescue. The left hand developed abilities that his right had never known. He wrote a folk-dance called "Bourrée" which is played with only one hand, the left. It scored instant popularity. The fact that it is played with the left hand became an advertising asset. The loss of the right hand brought the composer fame and fortune.

This brings to mind the case of Robert Schumann. It is said of him that while practicing to become a pianist, and doing so many hours of finger exercises each day to improve his technique, he permanently injured his right hand. He had to give up his ambition to appear before the public.

A compensatory reaction quickly followed, however. When the mind no longer can express itself through action it lets off steam, as it were, through intensified imagination. The more you give out nerve-energy through movement the less you use it up in thinking and feeling. That is why creative artists can easily dissipate their energy in the wrong direction by leading a muscularly active life.

At any rate, Schumann's paralysis activated his mind as never before. He became one of the world's greatest composers. His actual playing gift was not great enough to have made him immortal. But his reinforced imagination was a blessing in disguise for him as well as for the world at large.

Have you ever cultivated roses? Well, if you ever do you will have to make up your mind whether you want a large number of average roses on every bush, or whether you will be satisfied with one or two superior roses to a bush, and let quality take the place of quantity. In the former instance, allow all the buds to bloom. But if you crave an unusually long-stemmed, glorious flower, cut off all the buds but one as soon as they appear.

THE same thing holds true with human performance. If you concentrate upon one single interest you are bound to excel in that particular field.

Now then, a handicap really forces you to specialize. A handicap, whether it be physical or mental, of necessity narrows your field of activity. You have simply got to limit your field of interest. You cannot work or play as you might were you not handicapped. If you are wise, instead of letting this discourage you, make it rebound to your benefit.

I do not mean to claim that the all-around, healthy, robust, non-handicapped person is necessarily a mediocre individual, or that folks without a handicap should rush out and get one.

What I do claim is that handicaps are often responsible for greatness. Directly or indirectly, they have made greatness possible in countless instances. This is because they force people to concentrate, make them put forth their best efforts in a single direction. And, lastly, whether the disabled want to or not, compensatory reactions invariably develop.

If you have ever been confined to your bed for any length of time you must have noticed how your viewpoint of life begins to change and how differently you begin to think. The first day or two you fret and fume. You are restless and irritable. You want to be up and doing. Solicitous inquiries about your well-being annoy you.

And then there gradually descends upon you a feeling of calm and poise that you may never have enjoyed before. How small and trifling the ways of man really are, you think. Why all the struggle and fuss and rivalry and animosity? What is it all about? Why not get a perspective on life? Why not let reason hold the emotions in harness? Why should not everyone, you wonder, feel as calm and peaceful—yes, happy—as I do?

MANY a patient has told me of feeling that way. I have experienced it myself. There is no question but that, if your activity is restricted and your life slowed down, you change, and change for the better.

Eugene O'Neill, the playwright, had no idea of writing before he was sent to bed for several months with incipient tuberculosis. Up till then he had been unable to discover what he was best fitted for. But while restricted by illness he began really to think for the first time. He had a heart-to-heart talk with himself. He made a searching study of his fundamental, inner self. His writing genius began to make itself manifest, and it was in bed that he conceived and wrote his first play.

I have already spoken of the advantages of calm, poise, concentration, and perspective that illness brings about. It is my opinion that an additional advantage exists. It is the actual stimulation of the imagination by the disease toxins themselves.

If you study the lives of the greatest men the world has produced, you not only are struck by the large number who were handicapped by illness but you are impressed by the fact that the sickest ones possessed the strongest imaginations. A powerful imagination is undoubtedly the outstanding quality of mind one finds most frequently associated with chronic illness.

A few years ago a man consulted me about his nerves. He was a newspaper reporter. Examination revealed the fact that he was on the verge of a nervous breakdown, and in addition there existed tuberculosis of the right lung in rather an advanced stage. I ordered him to bed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Teeth may shine like tinted pearls

STILL . . .

Too often, all seems so safe because teeth gleam in their natural whiteness. Then suddenly Pyorrhea swoops down on the unwary.

Clean teeth still gleam. But gums break down and Pyorrhea poison sweeps through the system leaving in its wake a trail of havoc, often causing many serious ills which destroy happiness. And beauty vanishes with lost health.

As the penalty for neglect, 4 out of 5 after forty and thousands younger pay Pyorrhea's high price.

These Odds Can Be Bettered*—Easily

For safety's sake, protect your gums as well as your teeth. Visit your dentist regularly. Have him examine your teeth and gums thoroughly. And start using Forhan's for the Gums, today.

Without the use of harsh abrasives Forhan's easily and safely restores teeth to their natural whiteness and protects them against acids which cause decay.

In addition, if used regularly and in time, it helps to keep gums sound and healthy and so safeguards precious health against the attack of dread Pyorrhea.

This dentifrice is the formula of R. J. Forhan, D. D. S., for many years a Pyorrhea specialist. It is compounded with the correct percentage of Forhan's Pyorrhea Liquid, used by dentists in the treatment of Pyorrhetic conditions.

Don't wait for danger signs, for gums to bleed and recede from teeth, or for teeth to loosen in their sockets. Be on the safe side and start using Forhan's for the Gums regularly, morning and night. At all druggists—in tubes, 35c and 60c. Forhan Company, New York.

Formula of R. J. Forhan, D. D. S.

Never Feel Down-in-the-Mouth

More and more people are using Forhan's Antiseptic Refreshant, morning and night, as an indispensable part of the correct practice of oral hygiene. This scientific triumph cuts and neutralizes the after-taste effect of tobacco or too rich foods. It leaves the mouth tingling with delightful freshness for hours after using. It is pleasant, refreshing, harmless and safe. For keeping breath and taste sweet and fresh use Forhan's Antiseptic Refreshant. There's nothing better! 35c and 60c in bottles.

Make This 10 Day Test

Here's something worth knowing. Gums need the same stimulating massaging that keeps a woman's face youthful and free from the wrinkles of age. Lazy, lethargic gums invite disease. Forhan's for the Gums is designed to keep gums firm, sound and alive. So make this test: Before brushing teeth with Forhan's exercise your gums, following closely the directions in the booklet that comes with each tube. Do this for 10 days . . . . See how much better your gums look and feel!

Forhan's for the gums

MORE THAN A TOOTH PASTE . . . IT CHECKS PYORRHEA

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

© 1928, LIGGETT & MYERS TOBACCO CO.

A good resolution

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

I told him that if there was any chance of saving his life he would be compelled to remain flat on his back for at least a year.

"I'd just as leave die right now and get it over with," he said. But I persuaded him to see things in a different light. I pointed out the advantages he might gain by being sick, the very ones I have been discussing.

At first he was incredulous, but he did as he was told. For a week he had a hard time of it. Then the calm, resigned period set in. His mind began to adjust itself to the new situation, to prepare for the long siege of illness.

One day he said to me, "It's curious, Doctor, but since I've been lying here my mind works like a house afire. I used to be pretty good at the writing game, but nothing to brag about. Would you mind opening that drawer over there? I've started a novel, something I have wanted to do for years. I wish you would read it and tell me what you think."

I'm not a critic but the first few chapters impressed me most favorably. He finished the novel, taking his time, his strength not permitting him to write more than five hundred words a day. He sold it without the slightest difficulty.

Since then he has sold at least a half-dozen novels. The tuberculosis never really was arrested and he will always be compelled to live in a warm climate. But now he is a novelist, whereas before he was only a reporter.

What he told me later is interesting, too, in this connection. "I have noticed," he said, "that when I have had a flare-up of this trouble for a few days it is invariably followed by heightened and intensified imagery. If I'm stuck with my plot, or have gone stale in the writing, such a spell of illness will always help me out. I believe these bugs give off something that peps up my mind."

MY OWN experience with illness has convinced me of the same thing. Much research is necessary to prove it conclusively, of course, to correlate the facts. But this much can be said now: If you are doomed to illness, do not despair. Watch that imagination of yours light up.

And is not imagination the greatest single asset there is? Is it not responsible for all our inventions, all our art, all our civilized progress really? If you can exchange physical discomfort for a more powerful imagination can you honestly believe that you are the loser?

A roused and stimulated imagination brought on by disease is, in effect, another form of the mechanism of compensation. If the body cannot move as freely as it normally should, the mind makes up for it by manufacturing more mental pictures. Even if you must be confined in a plaster jacket your mind will automatically be enriched. Nature is very fair and just, after all.

If you suffer a handicap at the present time, or if circumstance should unexpectedly bequeath one to you, be sure you think, and think hard, about this principle of compensation.

No general rules can, to be sure, be laid down as to how your special handicap can be turned to your advantage. Every handicap differs from every other. But they are all alike in their possibilities regarding compensation.

Study it carefully, painstakingly. You will be surprised what the application of this principle of compensation will do for you. Go at it fearlessly. Whatever your handicap may be, make it work for you.

We are accustomed to think of deformity and illness as something which can only be destructive. Yet who can deny that the forward march of civilization has been accomplished largely, if not wholly, at the expense of individuals who either were forced or were willing to sacrifice health and strength for accomplishment? We should therefore have a wholesome regard for illness. We should realize how often it has been, how often it can be made, an undeniable blessing.

Even if physical perfection be an aim, as it should be, it stands to reason that thousands will never attain it. Thousands also will break under the stress and strain, under the hectic onslaught of present-day living. In the old days the weak ones, the handicapped ones, went to the wall. Nowadays they only go to the wall in order to find a resting place to turn around and fight back.

Seeing Things

(Continued from page 27)

always be so. Many women had come here, the same as I had. Those too weak or too fearful to "dominize" had either been quickly crushed or taken away. There was no escape.

When I found that some of the old Negroes were watching to see how I met the plantation's challenge, I couldn't disregard it. I tried to find out just what "dominizing" meant, and at last I made out that in order to "dominize," the plantation mistress must achieve enough wisdom and courage to meet any occasion with composure and grace.

I HAD always laughed at superstitions; but here, where people lived and died by them, they were hard to ignore, and an uneasiness that was close kin to fear began stirring deep down in my heart. What must I do? How could I find out what I needed to know?

Life, or Nature, or whatever it is that animates us, must somehow make us think and believe what we need to think and believe. At any rate, I resolved to keep my eyes open, to try to watch and observe and think and learn, and then to pretend to have courage even when I lacked it most.

I soon discovered that the ability to see is an acquirement. It takes skill to mark differences between things that look just alike, and to make out distinctions between forms that are very close kin. To learn how to do it requires time and patience, and not only a keen wish to know about things themselves but also to know how all things are bound together into one common whole.

Our individual worlds are made up of the things we perceive, and no two of us ever see things alike. The impressions given us by our senses may be accurate or false; they may be a record of absolute truth, or a jumbled confusion of mistakes; yet, whatever they are, the sum of them constitutes for us the only information we can ever have concerning the particular world we live in. No two of us live in the same world. We must each make our own environment and mold our individual universe, and the only material we have to use for this purpose is what our senses have gathered for us. There is no way out of it. All well-being depends on seeing things. The more things we see clearly, the more interesting is the exclusive world that we must make for ourselves.

It has taken time for me to become aware of the great tide of life that flows around me, for its stealth and silence are deceiving to the untrained. But I find that its current is filled with things that not only excite pity and terror, but that also stir devout admiration and wonder.

The plantation is somewhat removed from the beaten track of civilization, and changes take place here slowly, quietly, almost too quietly to be noticed when they come. Few things appear to happen except what the seasons bring or what the sky sends of cloud and sunshine and wind and rain. But here, the same as in the world outside, change is the only permanent thing.

Forms of life here are ceaselessly varied and shifted and interchanged. Nothing abides. Not even beauty is spared. Not a flower or fruit or sunset cloud can escape the ever-moving circle. Men, beasts, crops, trees, rise up, grow strong, then weaken, give way, and pass on into the multitude of things that have been, to be melted, changed, merged into something else, something young and new and strong.

TO THE Negroes, this bit of earth has a definite entity. It is the center of the whole universe, with Heaven, the home of the Great I-Am, in the sky, straight overhead. There on His throne, which is higher and brighter than the sun, He not only directs the clouds and stars and sun and moon as they patiently mark out the patterns He sets for them but He also listens to the plantation prayers and watches the plantation happenings.

For His children, the rain falls and the sun shines. His voice speaks to them when the thunder rolls and the wind howls and sings. Every inanimate thing is endowed with intelligence and intention. Some are kind and helpful, others malicious and envious. Things have sense, like people, and are sometimes good, sometimes evil; but all things forever keep warning men to prepare to meet the Hereafter. When the sun heat burns them and the rain drops wet them and the strong winds whip them, they are all saying, "Pray! Do try to escape Hell if you can."

Hell, the terror of all the plantation

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Wanted Home Women to Decorate Giftwares

No Special Ability Needed

This is the wonderfully interesting occupation that it is now possible for you to enter through the instruction of Fireside Industries. The work pays exceptionally well. There is no canvassing, no monotonous drudgery. Many say they never dreamed that such a wonderful way of earning money at home existed. New system of instruction devised by M. Gabriel Andre Petit makes the work so easy that almost anyone can do it.

Fascinating Home Work

Can you imagine anything so fascinating as decorating Giftwares at home? Could any other kind of work be so pleasant as applying beautiful designs in colors to such artistic objects as candlesticks, wooden toys, parchment lamp shades, wall plaques, picture frames, sewing tables, gateleg tables? Then there are greeting cards to be colored, and cushion tops and other textile articles to be decorated in Batik, and fascinating objects of copper and brass to be etched in beautiful designs.

Many women do this work solely for pleasure, but it also is a splendid way to make money at home for there is a tremendous demand for these giftwares.

Satisfaction Assured

Fireside Industries assures entire satisfaction to each of its members. If, after completing your instruction, you are not entirely pleased and satisfied, your money will be refunded in full. You have only to follow the directions and it is amazing to see what beautiful things one can make. Think of earning $2.00 in just one hour, for example, by decorating a magazine rack! Do you wonder that members of Fireside Industries are so enthusiastic about the work?

M. Gabriel Andre Petit
Art Director

BEAUTIFUL BOOK SENT FREE

The beautiful Book of Fireside Industries, illustrated in color, which explains all about this new way to earn money at home, will be sent to you on request. Read how women earn money and beautify their homes and their lives. Just like a beautiful dream come true. Wonderful outfit furnished without extra charge. Simply mail coupon, or write, enclosing 2c stamp to help pay postage.

FIRESIDE INDUSTRIES
Dept. 60-A, Adrian, Mich.

FIRESIDE INDUSTRIES, Dept. 60-A, Adrian, Mich.
Please send me FREE, the beautiful Book of Fireside Industries, explaining how I may earn money at home by decorating Giftwares. I enclose 2c stamp.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....
(Write in pencil, please—ink will blot) people, lies dark and deep and terrible straight down underneath the plantation woods and fields, its hot fires swarming with the poor, pitiful souls of the dead who have passed into eternity without making peace with the Great Creator.

The present must be endured patiently, no matter what hardships come; troubles are to be borne without resentment, because true life does not begin until after Death. Then the blessed join the angels in Heaven and are happy forevermore. Feet that walk along the plantation paths and roads, with soles toughened and cracked with dust and mud, will wear silver slippers and walk on golden streets. Weary bodies accustomed to patched, faded garments, will don shining white robes and wings. Tattered old hats will be replaced with golden crowns. Hands grown callous from jerking hoes in the fight with grass or with holding plows straight to the row will pluck out tunes on harps of gold.

BUT every spring, as a tide of green rises and spreads through the forest and fields, and life multiplies the birds and beasts and insects and people, it is easy to see how the trees in the graveyard raise rich bold heads above their fellows, as if they boasted that proud plantation masters and mistresses lie still, under their feet. On all sides, with no effort at concealment, youth and strength can be seen rising out of decay.

The game in the woods is carefully hued to match the autumn leaves, and wild bodies are fashioned to be nimble and swift to keep out of harm's way, yet these are ruthlessly crammed into hunters' bags, limp, blood-stained, the warmth of fur and feather chilled, in order that black pots on open hearths may steam with savory stew which may add pigment to dusky skins or light to eyes already bright.

Riddles are here to be answered, paradoxes, to confuse and perplex. Clues to answers appear, then are shrouded in mystery. Thoughts that flit through human foreheads seem to matter no more than the tunes hummed by the wind through the trees. The lagging steps of a tired man or mule seem to be of no more importance than the traipsing up and down of the beetles that creep under the bark of mighty pines and kill them. I reach conclusions, then discard them for new ones, as I learn a little more about seeing things.

If I can learn, like my black neighbors, to meet the present blithely and calmly and to face the future with faith and fortitude, I shall count that a feat; but meanwhile, simply trying to see things has become for me an absorbing game.

No sooner did I learn that Life is thick around me, everywhere, urging things onward, forward, than I began to see also that Beauty is as universal as Life, and that every living thing seems under rigid orders to become as nearly perfect as possible, to be as beautiful as lies in its nature.

The trees around the Big House are very large and fine, and almost every newcomer expresses the greatest admiration for them; but after living with them a while I had found their silence gloomy and disturbing. How miserable to stand in one place for a hundred years, casting shadows this way or that, making leaves and bending to breezes. Better to be a cricket and hop around and chant for one single summer than stay rooted to one spot forever.

Not until a storm came and wrenched and twisted and broke a number of them to pieces did I discover that no one of them ever put on a new branch carelessly, but that each new shoot was heedfully placed so as to recover the old symmetry and grace and hide the damage that had been so ruthlessly wrought. Such marvelous patience and pains! I saw those trees deliberately strive to become as faultless as they had ever been.

At last I knew what the black people meant when they said trees had sense like people, like the wisest of people too. And they changed, quick as thought, from a grove to a group of individuals that had accepted the life granted to them, and that had achieved the strength to meet misfortune and overcome affliction.

How could a human being learn to do it? The answer to this question has not been easy to find, but perhaps the first part of the answer is simply to accept one's environment, to resolve to become friends with it, for, no matter what or where it is, Life is there, working miracles. Nothing is too small or unimportant for Life to overlook or pass by, and everything exists under Life's law, we human creatures the same as the rest.

MY LONELINESS suddenly ended as soon as my interest in becoming acquainted with things began. What had seemed to be a depressing stillness, I found filled with myriads of clear, distinct sounds and voices, all with a meaning of some kind. Unsuspected colors and forms stood waiting for seeing eyes. Elusive scents were everywhere, warning or inviting.

The black people have been glad to tell me what they know, to show me what they see, and I have found out some things for myself; but the chief joy in seeing things comes through wanting, wishing to know more about them, what they are, why they are, what will they become?

But instead of my dominizing the old plantation, I find that the old place has played a trick on me: it has made me merely one of its creatures whose destiny is bound up with everything else here. Not only with the trees and beasts and men, but with this silent red earth that feeds us all, and that will some day, certainly, take back all that is mortal of us, and turn it again into its dust.

AROUND the historic figure of Abraham Lincoln numerous stories have grown up; stories maybe with a germ of truth in them, but which, with the passage of time, have been twisted out of all recognition. Next month in "Lincoln, the Most Lied-About Man," Honoré Willsie Morrow lays low many of these stories, and gives us a clear, vivid picture of the Great Emancipator, whom she rediscovered after immersing herself for eight years in the vast realm of Lincolniana. In her article the legendary Lincoln gives place to a man of flesh and blood.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

It's Easy

BOYS, here's your chance to get in on the best game of life. Wouldn't it make you happy to know that a place is now open for you on a team headed for money and prizes? An opportunity for you to be a member of the Crowell Club of Junior Salesmen who are the liveliest and peppiest bunch of boys in America.

Win Prizes—Earn Money

Crowell Junior Salesmen are boys like yourself who spend a few hours of their spare time in the evenings after school. They deliver three of the best known magazines to regular customers. When they started they had no experience. We taught them how to get their customers. They always have their own spending money jingling in their pockets, and it's never necessary to ask Dad or Mother for ice cream soda and movie money. Aside from having their own spending money, they win prizes selected from our big Prize Book containing over 300 articles.

Score the Goal

You can score the winning goal by placing your name and address on the coupon and mailing it today. You will then be started in business for yourself and made happy by cash profits as well as prizes. Membership in a great organization is open to you! Join now!

Mr. Jim Thayer, Dept. AA119,
The Crowell Publishing Company,
Springfield, Ohio.

Dear Jim: I want to score the winning goal. Show me how.

My Name.....

Address.....

Town.....State.....

The Little Land That Gave Us the Year One

(Continued from page 55)

land had heard of her. They had sought her out and felt her greatness. This, in spite of the fact that women on the whole had little credit. The notion had got abroad that she was the fortunate one who was to bear the promised Messiah. I wonder if some of those shepherds, tending their flocks on the hills, whom she and Joseph had probably passed on their way up to the village, were not old friends with whom the travelers had tarried for bread and conversation. This very likely incident would illumine the part which the shepherds played in the great event of Christmas night.

As I stood in Pilate's Chamber and the Way of the Cross my thoughts went back to those closing scenes in the great drama. I never quite understood the pathetic words of counsel at the supper when He was eating and drinking with His beloved friends until, in imagination, I tried to put myself in the scene. Those men all knew that their Master's end was near. His companionship had inspired and lifted them up out of the darkness in which they had once lived. They were now strong men filled with the new Light. They had been telling Him of their love, of their sense of obligation, of their sorrow that their travels were ended. This is what I think He meant when He spoke of the bread and wine:

"I KNOW, my beloved ones that I have been as your bread and wine. Therefore, when you eat bread, may you see the face and form once familiar to you, and when you drink wine may it remind you of my blood. My spirit cannot be taken from you."

Imagination has to help us in all serious study. We should get little out of history, philosophy, art, or mathematics without the use of the imagination. Why leave it out in the study of the Scriptures?

Most of those who read these words live in a land of many schools and colleges, of innumerable hospitals and homes for the aged and infirm, all of which signalize the charity and generosity of its inhabitants; a land loving beauty and favored with every comfort and convenience; a land where the humblest may rise to power and honor, and where no honest man need suffer want.

Do we forget what is behind this great democracy, this love of progress and peace, this doctrine of charity to all and malice toward none? Is it not the spirit of the first Lover of Light, the spirit of the first great Teacher of charity and good will? Whether we admit it or not, His spirit is mainly the spirit of America. Whatever they may say or think, Jew and Gentile, atheist and scoffer, have it in common with the rest of us. It is in very truth the spirit of Christ, the spirit of Christmas, the spirit of Santa Claus, the spirit of charity, generosity, and progress which pervades and possesses our people.

✤ ✤ ✤ ✤ ✤

What Are YOUR Mistakes in English?

They may offend others as much as these offend you

IF some one you met for the first time made the mistakes in English shown above, what would you think of him? Would he inspire your respect? Would you be inclined to make a friend of him? Would you care to introduce him to others as a close friend of yours?

These errors are easy for you to see. Perhaps, however, you make other mistakes which offend other people as much as these would offend you. How do you know that you do not mispronounce certain words; are you always sure that the things you say and write are grammatically correct? To you they may seem correct, but others may know they are wrong.

Unfortunately, people will not correct you when you make mistakes; all they do is to make a mental reservation about you. "He is ignorant and uncultured," they think. So you really have no way of telling when your English offends others.

FREE Book on English

Sherwin Cody; perhaps the best known teacher of practical English, has perfected and patented a remarkable device which will quickly find and correct mistakes you unconsciously make. Correct English soon becomes a HABIT.

If you are efficient in English, it will give you greater confidence; if you are deficient, you surely want to know it, so that you can correct your mistakes.

Mr. Cody's remarkable new invention, the 100% Self-Correcting Method, has already improved the English of more than 50,000 people. No useless rules, no tedious copying, no hard study. Only 15 minutes a day required. You learn by creating the HABIT of using correct English. Nothing like Mr. Cody's method has ever been used before!

A new book, "How to Speak and Write Masterly English," is ready. It explains Mr. Cody's surprisingly easy method. Get a copy free and learn how to stop making embarrassing errors. You do not want others to judge you unfairly. Merely mail the coupon or a postal card. Sherwin Cody School of English, 91 Searle Building, Rochester, N. Y.

Sherwin Cody School of English
91 Searle Building, Rochester, N. Y.

Please send me your Free Book, "How to Speak and Write Masterly English."

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

DEARBORN
"Capitol" of the World's Greatest Industrial Empire

THE EYES OF THE WORLD are focused upon Dearborn, the heart of Henry Ford's greatest industrial triumph. Here, he will dwarf all past production records.

Dearborn is the logical place to live for the thousands upon thousands of men who operate the millions of dollars of machinery in the great River Rouge plants. The City of Dearborn is rushing in public utilities to speed the building of homes for Ford workers. The wonderful future of the once quaint little village of Dearborn is assured.

Will you be one of the many wise investors in Dearborn property? "Detroit"—a profusely illustrated book, tells the wonderful story of Dearborn.

You should have this book. It is mailed Free upon request—write, wire or telephone.

Wanted—Experienced colonization men in every state.

GLOVER WATSON ORGANIZATION, INC.
Washington Blvd. Bldg., Detroit, U.S.A.

Free!

DISCOVERS
Million Dollar Can Opener!

Here's the most amazing way to open cans you ever saw! Imagine a little automatic device that opens any can, round, square or oval, at the turn of a crank! Holds the can and cuts out the top in 3 seconds, leaving can rim slick, smooth and clean! No wonder thousands of housewives have banished old-style can openers to the scrap heap!

AGENTS Make Big Money selling this lifetime device—$7, $8, $9 in an hour! It's also a truly amazing fund-raiser for churches, clubs, etc. The manufacturer is now making a special advertising offer that gives you a wonderful opportunity to get one for your own home. Write today for full details to Central States Manufacturing Co., Dept. A-921, 4500 Mary Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

Old Money Wanted Will pay Fifty Dollars for nickel of 1913 with Liberty head, (no Buffalo). We pay cash premiums for all rare coins. Send 4c for Large Coin Folder. May mean much profit to you.
NUMISMATIC CO., Dept. 453, Ft. Worth, Tex.

HIGH SCHOOL EDUCATION at HOME ~ Only $15.85
Fascinating question and answer method. Used in High Schools. Every subject covered. Easy terms. Certificate awarded. Write for free folder.
HIGH SCHOOL HOME STUDY BUREAU, Inc.,
(Dept. 231) 31 Union Square New York City

BOYS
Knock 'Em Dead
You can get this dandy punching bag and hundreds of "Knockout" prizes.
Besides, you can earn your own spending money and build up a paying business of your own by becoming an agent for Collier's, Woman's Home Companion and The American Magazine.
Write me to-night
JIM THAYER
The Crowell Publishing Company
Dept. A-2, Springfield, Ohio

My Worst Fault and How I Overcame It

FIRST PRIZE

My Fault Nearly Cost a Little Girl Her Life

FOR years I went along happily, putting off answering letters and invitations, putting off returning books to the library, and putting off going to the dentist and doctor. Why do a thing to-day when to-morrow will do just as well? was my philosophy.

Something which happened last summer broke me of this habit. I had put off getting the brakes of our car tightened, thinking each day that I would do it to-morrow. Then, one day I was driving down-town when suddenly a little girl about five years old ran out into the street. I blew the horn, pushed in my clutch and foot brake, grabbed the hand brake, shut my eyes and prayed. I heard a terrified scream; but the car kept on going, for the brakes wouldn't hold. Finally, the car stopped.

I opened my eyes and looked back. The little girl was lying on the pavement a few yards behind the car. My heart stopped beating. I jumped out and ran back. It took all my will power to force myself to look at that child; but when I did so, and saw she was apparently unhurt, I had to sit down on the pavement to keep from fainting.

The car had knocked her down between the wheels and thus avoided killing or hurting her. I picked her up and carried her back to the car. I drove to the doctor's. He examined her carefully, and said she had been only stunned a little by the fall. Needless to say, I got my brakes tightened that very day.

That cured me of procrastination. Since then, every time I start to put something off I think of that scream, and the way that little girl looked when I first saw her huddled on the pavement. My motto has become: "Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day." And I honestly try to live up to it. T. Y.

SECOND PRIZE

I Was a "Worrier"

WHAT havoc worry can cause to one's happiness and peace of mind I well know. For I had so many things in my favor—youth, health, friends, happy home and business life—yet I obscured them in a cloud of petty griefs.

I don't know why such little things bothered me. My life was calm; I had no great burdens to carry. I finally realized that I must conquer foolish fears, or be forever weighted down with them. So I invented a cure.

Each day I wrote in a little notebook lists of the things that worried me. I headed them "Things to Worry About To-day," "Things I Need Not Worry About Until To-morrow." Many of these pet worries seemed so trivial when I put them on paper that my sense of humor nearly got the better of me; but I put them there just the same.

What a list I had the first day! Even I had to laugh. Then I crossed out the ones I felt I could do without, and gravely studied the "important" ones. Against each "important" worry I allowed two columns headed, "What I gained by this worry," and, "What I lost."

I followed this system faithfully for a week; then I burned the book. For I had learned several important things:

Most worries never happen.

When you look a worry squarely in the face, it usually withers away—put it on paper and try it.

A lot of worries can be put off till to-morrow, and to-morrow never comes.

And, lastly, worry won't help you anyway. I know this, because my "gain" column was always blank.

So I cut out worrying as a waste of energy, thereby saving what disposition I have, and what friends I have managed to hang on to. Mine is a great little scheme! G. H.

THIRD PRIZE

I'll Never Tell Another Lie!

I COULDN'T stick to the truth. When I tried to repeat a conversation I had heard, I usually added and subtracted so much that the original theme was entirely lost.

My cure came about in a most dramatic manner:

I visited a small resort last summer, and stopped at the leading hotel there. One day a party of us were sitting on the porch and someone inquired what I did.

I informed the crowd that I was a trained nurse, just graduated from a large institution. Though I am a bookkeeper, and the only time I was ever near a hospital was during a tonsil operation I had some time ago, I went into a lengthy discussion of my training, and the methods we used in ministering to our patients for various maladies.

I said good night and retired to my room, but I had no sooner fallen asleep than I was aroused by the ringing of my telephone. It was a summons to come to room 209, at once.

I struggled into my bathrobe, and hurried down the hall. When I entered the room, I saw a child lying on the bed writhing in agony. The mother looked at me appealingly. "Oh, Nurse," she said, "I know you can do something for my baby!"

I was petrified. But, somehow, the thought came to me of an old remedy my mother used when I had a bad case of indigestion. I grabbed the child in my arms, ran to the bathroom, and gave her a steaming hot bath and some peppermint, which the mother happened to have on hand. I put the child to bed, and in a short time it was sleeping soundly.

I suppose that mother thinks she was most fortunate to have secured my expert services for a mere "thank you." I think I was more fortunate that it was not smallpox instead of cramp colic.

I lost no time in checking out of that hotel the next morning. And now, whether I'm talking to strangers or to friends, I stick to the facts, and don't try to make an impression by bluffing. E. W. M.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Ten Dollars for a New Hat— I'll Have It Tomorrow!"

ALWAYS to know where those extra dollars are coming from—the dollars you need to carry out your plans—wouldn't it give you a pleasant feeling?

Of course it would!

I know more than ten thousand girls and women who are enjoying that pleasant feeling of security.

In this first month of 1928 their hopes are high, because they are ready to meet almost any unexpected expense that may come to them.

Very quietly in their homes, in their spare moments, they are adding extra dollars to their present incomes. Some are business girls, a good portion of them home women, the mothers of little children, who have found to their great satisfaction, that in The Pin Money Club, The American Magazine's money-making department, they can quickly earn $25, $50 or more.

You can do this, too, and you are invited to join us. Mrs. Ethel W——, Illinois, writes:

"I want to thank you for the lovely stationery you sent me. You couldn't have sent me anything I'd have appreciated more. I don't know where the money for all the fall clothes for myself and two small children, for the Christmas gifts I purchased, also, would have come from if I were not a member of our wonderful Club. "May your highest hopes come true in this New Year!"

You see what The Pin Money Club can do for a busy mother.

Miss M. A. Smith, a school teacher, tells us—

"I've been making more money this year so I've divided my 'Pin-money' dollars. A portion I have used for church—with some I bought myself a dress and next week I will pay my insurance. Perhaps I might call my dollars earned in the Club 'life savers' rather than pin money. They are mighty handy and useful."

COULD you use more money right now? Then do write to me now and I shall tell you how to make $25 or more this very month.

The Pin Money Club offers you a chance—the best chance ever—to make money in these first days of 1928.

Margaret Clarke

Secretary, Pin Money Club
Department Q
The American Magazine
250 Park Avenue New York City

Nowhere in Particular

(Continued from page 51)

himself upon his shoulders with his feet high against the wall. Thus inverted he lost bolts and nuts out of his trousers pocket, and they had to be gathered up. Allen was losing his public.

"Wait a minute, can't you!" he said desperately. "I'll show you if it's the bunk."

The face of Breckinridge Jones gleamed sardonically across the footlight.

"I s'pose he had to eat oatmeal for breakfast," Breck said to his fellow critic. "And mow the lawn. My, ain't that terrible?" The last was in that hated falsetto note used to represent the feminine voice.

"Is that right, Al?" asked Click. "Is that all that is the matter of you?"

"Go on and tell it, and get it over with," said the taunting Jones boy.

The worst had now happened to Allen Lansford: his thunder had been stolen. He had meant to tell a devastating tale of an unnatural mother, who had insisted that he eat oatmeal when his very being cried out for waffles and sirup, of his refusal to eat the wholesome, disgusting food, of his father's hateful words: "Well, then, breakfast is over. When you have mowed the back yard you will probably get your appetite back." This was not a brand-new grievance; Allen had mentioned such matters before. He was now in a desperate situation, requiring desperate remedy. He found it in Breck's last word:

"HOME!" he repeated. "I haven't got any home, any more."

"Since when?" asked Breck sharply.

Click's feet came to the floor with a bang, and he sat upright.

"What do you mean, you haven't got any home?"

Allen Lansford had his public back again!

"If you would of only of give me a chance, I would of told you." A retentive memory for words aided here. "I would of told you all." Allen scratched his knee reflectively and sparred for time. His hand encountered a tender spot on his shin, incurred while romping with Zip. "I guess I better not tell you, after all. You only make wise cracks and interrup."

"Go ahead," urged Click. "I won't interrup."

Breck likewise pledged himself not to "interrup." The three heads leaned over the stage camp fire, and three black, shapeless giants looked down from the walls. Only a faint ray of daylight filtered into the room. There was a damp and cellary chill, a mingled smell of moldy sawdust and smoky kerosene, and so sepulchral a silence that one could have heard a watch tick if there had been one present.

"You guys go in and play with Zip once in a while," said Allen mournfully. "He'll be kind of sad and lonely, I s'pose."

Now that Allen had cut himself loose from drab realities, he did very well indeed. He drew upon his capacious store-

Write Now For This Free Book

EVERY dog owner should read Dr. H. Clay Glover's famous book, "Your Dog". Gives scientific home treatments for the prevention and remedy of all common dog ailments. Gives details on proper feeding. Sent free if you write to H. Clay Glover Co., Inc., Dept. A., 119 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

If Dogs Could Really Speak

then every dog owner would know these facts

MOST dogs look healthy. Yet practically all dogs at all ages suffer from worms. These intestinal parasites weaken a dog's health and spoil his appearance and disposition. They cause untold suffering. Often they lead to fits, distemper and other fatal diseases. No dog is immune.

Don't guess that your dog is free from worms—make sure! Give him Glover's Worm Capsules or the liquid, Glover's Vermifuge. Used and endorsed by leading dog fanciers and breeders and by dog lovers everywhere. All puppies should be treated monthly and older dogs regularly four times a year. Easy to give and entirely safe.

Sold by Drug Stores, Pet Shops and Kennels

The cruelest and most dangerous thing to do to a dog is to give him a medicine of questionable quality. Insist upon Glover's Imperial Dog Medicines. All are tested prescriptions, proclaimed by foremost specialists as the highest standards of safety and efficacy. Below are listed those few which are most often needed in the home that has a dog.

GLOVER'S
IMPERIAL
DOG MEDICINES

Glover's Worm Capsules	65c
Glover's Vermifuge	65c
Glover's Distemper Medicine	$1.25
Glover's Mange Medicine	65c
Glover's Condition Pills	65c
Glover's Digestive Pills	65c
Glover's Laxative Pills	65c

End Fleas!

Glover's Kennel and Flea Soap safely does away with fleas. Keeps the dog's skin healthy and promotes a fine, thick glossy coat. Contains nothing harmful to any dog.

25 cents per cake

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I shouldn't decide it alone"

A MAN with a few thousand dollars to invest has a perplexing range of possibilities before him. Values must be appraised, past records studied and future trends estimated. But the investor should not try to decide alone. He can get the considered opinion of a world-wide investment organization—it is his for the asking. National City judgment as to which bonds are best for you is based on both strict investigation of the security and analysis of your own requirements.

The National City Company
National City Bank Building, New York

OFFICES IN 50 AMERICAN CITIES · INTERCONNECTED BY 11,000 MILES OF PRIVATE WIRES · INTERNATIONAL BRANCHES AND CONNECTIONS

Salesmanship

Sheldon Points the way to complete mastery in Salesmanship and BUSINESS BUILDING

Thousands of America's leading business men attribute their success to Sheldon training. Write for "MEN WHO KNOW"

It is free for the asking. No obligation.

THE SHELDON SCHOOL
916 North American Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Short Story Writing

DR. ESENWEIN

A practical forty-lesson course in the writing and marketing of the Short Story, taught by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, famous critic and teacher; Editor of The Writer's Monthly.

One pupil has earned over $5,000 writing in his spare time—hundreds are selling constantly to the leading publishers.

150 page catalog free. Please address
The Home Correspondence School
Established 1897
Dept. 134 Springfield, Mass.

house of recollections, things learned from books, newspapers, and moving pictures. This was the old, bitter story of starvation and brutality. Mr. and Mrs. Lansford, who posed before the Pequot public as kindly and respectable people, were, it was now revealed, fiends in human form. Allen, who was in outward-seeming a singularly well-fed boy, was practically starving.

"No wonder I couldn't stand all that talk about bakeries and ever'thing. When we looked in at Grandma Reisner's window—all those doughnuts and—" Allen put his hands over his eyes to shut out the mental picture. Between his fingers he could see an audience pop-eyed with interest. "Mebbe I could stand it a little longer if it wasn't for the beatings. Ever' little thing that goes wrong, my father grabs a club and lams me with it. Last night he lammed me on the leg." The victim carefully rolled down his stocking and gave the audience a splendid view of his bruised shin. "It's more," said Allen, "than flesh and blood can stand!"

"WHAT are you gonta do, run away?" asked Click.

"If I tell you, will you promise not to tell?" (This was too weak.) "Will you swear not to reveal it to a single living soul?"

Allen was now mentally living from hand to mouth. While his companions crossed their hearts and hoped to die if they ever revealed his secret, Allen was concocting the secret—out of a vague thought of a quarter of an hour back. It was finished just in the nick of time. He lowered his voice impressively.

"I'm going to hide. I'm going to hide in a place where they wouldn't never find me in a million years. They'll scour the country with detectives and bloodhounds, and look in all the woods and mountain caves, and in the slums of the great cities, and all the time I'll be sitting—just as comfortable and happy—"

"Yes, but where?" asked Breck.

"Nowhere in Particular!"

A flattering silence fell upon the A. B. C. Club. The great drama had made a tremendous hit. Author and audience alike were held in the grip of a thrilling idea. They were in the presence of a masterpiece.

Presently, practical details began to intrude upon this lovely dream. Breck raised a point which was never far from his thoughts:

"What are you going to eat, Al?"

"I'll eat, all right." Allen was not yet ready for the question. "Just think—no grass to mow, no problems to work, no scoldings and lammings. Nothing to do but sit around and read. Pretty catsy?"

"It wouldn't be catsy to starve to death!"

"I'll go out raiding gardens at night."

"Vegetables!" Breck's nose registered disgust.

"And break into candy stores and bakeries."

"That would be stealing."

"I could keep a count of it, couldn't I? I could write it all down in a book, couldn't I, and pay up when I get rich, couldn't I?"

The novel idea of committing burglary on a charge account had its appeal.

"There's another place where I can get

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

stuff. I know how to get in, all right. My home—I mean what used to be my old home before. That wouldn't be stealing, would it?"

All parties agreed that taking things from what used to be one's old home before would not be stealing, but simple justice.

"You could bring me something your own self, Breck, once in a while."

Breck was silent for a moment.

"No, I couldn't do that. I got a special reason. I won't be home."

"Where you going?"

"No place. I'm there now. I'm gonta live right here with you. They's other people in the world besides you that gets treated brutal at home. Hard work and lammings is all I get."

Breck, also, uncovered a pitiful state of affairs. Perhaps his tale was too similar to Allen's to be entirely convincing. The Jones boy had always been more voracious for food than for books.

"Then," said Allen, "Click could bring us stuff. You could sneak out some pie and cake and stuff, couldn't you, Click?"

"Like fun, I could! You don't catch me hangin' around that ol' house, and goin' to school and gettin' jawed by ol' Benson and everything, while you guys are livin' catsy here. I'm comin' too!"

"All right. I'd just as leave. We could have more fun with three."

"Three is better for raids," added Breck.

"If one of us stayed at home," Allen reflected, "they would proba'ly be tortured until it was more than flesh and blood could stand, and they would break down and tell all."

"WELL," asked Click, "when'll we commence?"

"I've commenced already," Allen answered. "You don't catch me going back to that miser'ble ol' house again. You guys can go home, and get—"

"Not me," said Breck. "If I go back to that ol' house now, and no rakin' done, it'll be all my life is worth."

"It'll be a cold day," added Click, "when I ever go back to that ol' house."

"If we'd only laid in some grub—"

"Oh, shut up, Breck!" cried Allen. "All you think about is your stummick."

"To-night we'll bust into Grandma Reisner's bakery," said Click.

"Oh, boy!" exclaimed Breck. "Bread and rolls and cookies. And doughnuts. They gener'ly always make doughnuts on Saturday. Then we'll go down to Mrs. Plank's candy store and bust in—oh, boy!" His imagination now ran riot in the little confectionery shop until the ill-fed Allen, who had not only spurned his breakfast oatmeal but also cheated on the milk, was in deep distress. He had to think of something to take the public mind off of food.

"Won't ol' Benson be sore though? Oh, boy!"

This was a highly successful ruse. Ol' Benson, so-called, was known in the Pequot public school system as Miss Eileen Benson, and she was twenty-five if she was a day. It was Miss Benson's rich privilege in life to pour daily knowledge into all three of these boys, in Room Four, Center Ward, and sometimes she did not seem to appreciate this boon as highly as she might. Only yesterday she 1000 Hotel Positions Open!

Hotels, Restaurants, Clubs, Apartments, Institutions, Schools, Colleges, Hospitals, etc., Everywhere, Need Trained Men and Women. Over 70,000 High-class Positions Paying $2,500 to $10,000 a Year Are Open Each Year in the Hotels of the United States. Nearly One and Three-quarter Billions of Dollars' Worth of New Hotels, Clubs, Restaurants and Institutions Built This Year Will Need Over 200,000 Trained Men and Women.

I Absolutely Contract to Teach You

In my home-study course on hotel work what the leading experts know about the business—men earning from $5,000 to $50,000 a year—and at any time there are over 1,000 hotel positions open in this industry.

I Put My Students in Touch with Positions

All over the United States they are eagerly sought by the biggest and best hotels. Hotels start you at salaries up to $3,500 a year with your living usually included. If you want a steady, permanent position, with quick advancement, big pay and fine living, which also usually includes free meals and apartment—you can find it in hotel work.

No Previous Experience Needed

You need no previous experience when you take the Lewis Course. We train you by mail in your spare time at home with the Lewis Simplified Study Plan, and put you in touch with big opportunities. All of your training will be under the personal supervision of Clifford Lewis, former U. S. Govt. Hotel and Restaurant Expert, now Managing Consultant for over 225 hotels throughout the United States.

FREE Mail Coupon Now!

Opportunity Coupon
1000 Hotel Positions Open!

Lewis Hotel Training Schools,
Room AP-1418, Washington, D. C.

Kindly send me, without obligation, a copy of the FREE BOOK, "Your Big Opportunity", with details of the Free Registration in your National Employment Bureau.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State.....

PROOF!

Our files are crammed with letters like these, which prove that the hotel industry is the field of big opportunity today.

Franklin Moore:—"My present position as Manager of Penn Harris Hotel at the age of 30 is due to the Lewis Course."

Catherine H. Alexander:—"I accepted the position of Stewardess in the Logan House. I am sure the help the Lewis Schools gave me shall enable me to give entire satisfaction."

D. A. Robinson:—"I was appointed Manager of St. Clair Country Club at double the salary I earned before taking the Lewis Course."

Mrs. J. S. Wickett:—"I never had any hotel experience and this position as Assistant Manager of an Apartment House is my first."

FREE BOOK Gives Full Details

There are opportunities for you in this big paying hotel industry. Many students have obtained hotel positions paying as high as $2,500 a year, even before they had finished the course. My Free Book "Your Big Opportunity" shows you how you can do as well. The coupon above will bring you by return mail this vitally interesting, illustrated book, which shows how YOU can become a high-salaried hotel executive; also tells how our students are winning success with Lewis Training, and explains how you obtain Free Registration in our National Employment Bureau, and our Money-Back Agreement.

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOLS
Clifford Lewis, President
Room AP-1418 Washington, D. C.
Charter Member National Home Study Council.

Are You Ever Ashamed of Your English?

Do you say "who" when you should say "whom"? Do you say "between you and I" instead of "between you and me"? Do you mispronounce common words in your speech or use them incorrectly when you write?

Many a man has been held down all his life and suffered untold embarrassment because of mistakes in English.

You do not need to make these mistakes any longer. Right at home, in the privacy of your own room, you can make up the education you missed in the days that you should have been at school.

The International School of English will teach you, just as it has taught thousands of other men and women, by a simple new method which shows you instinctively which word to use and how to use it.

Mail Coupon for Free Booklet

INTERNATIONAL SCHOOL OF ENGLISH
Division of the International Correspondence Schools
Dept. 7484-E, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation, please send me full details of your home-study course in ENGLISH

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

9 to 1

OUT of every ten authors listed as famous in a standard reference book, nine got their start as newspaper writers—only one succeeded without newspaper training. Those are facts of interest to everyone who would know the logical approach to a writing career.

WRITING—a source of income that many people neglect

MANY who should be writing never try it because they just can't picture themselves making "big money." They hear so many fabulous stories about millionaire authors that they become awe-struck, and entirely overlook the fact that $25, $50, $100, or more can be very conveniently and frequently earned for material that takes little time to write—things that they might turn out in spare time if they tried.

If you would learn to write START WRITING

Almost every month you hear of some new author of whom it is said; "He used to be a newspaper man." Training in journalism has come to be a passport to literary opportunity.

That is why the Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on journalism—continuous writing—the training that has produced so many successful authors and authoresses.

Here you have a course of home study, prepared by active New York newspaper editors, which gives you real writing experience of the kind gained by metropolitan newspaper workers, to add to your present ability.

Newspaper men teach you

Newspaper Institute training is based on the New York Copy-Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. Your work is watched, edited and guided just as if you were working for a big metropolitan daily. Experienced New York newspaper men are in direct charge of your instruction.

In other words, you get practice—real work, not just theory. The course costs less than a month's living expenses at most colleges—so little in fact, that anyone who is at all eligible can be sure he can afford it.

Test yourself in advance

To insure prospective student-members against wasting their time and money, we have prepared a unique Writing Aptitude Test. This tells you whether you possess the fundamental qualities necessary to successful writing — acute observation, dramatic instinct, creative imagination, etc. You'll enjoy taking this test. The coupon will bring it to you without obligation. Sign and mail it now. Newspaper Institute of America, 25 West 45th Street, New York.

Newspaper Institute of America
25 West 45th Street, New York
James McAlpin Pyle, Pres.

Send me your free Writing Aptitude Test and further information about writing for profit.

Mr. / Mrs. / Miss .....

Address .....

(All correspondence confidential. No salesmen will call on you.) 9A308

Be a Nurse

Earn $30-$35 a Week

You can learn at home in spare time to be a nurse. Courses endorsed by physicians. Thousand graduates. Est. 28 years. Nurse's equipment included. Money back agreement. Free booklet.

CHICAGO SCHOOL OF NURSING
Dept. 71
421 S. Ashland Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

Become an Artist

Make Money While Learning

at home in spare time. You can quickly learn to draw pictures, that sell, through remarkably simple Home Study Method. Good artists earn $50 to over $250 a week. Earn while learning.

Write for Free Book and Offer to New Students
WASHINGTON SCHOOL OF ART, Room 351-F
1115-15th St., N. W., Washington, D. C.

had disagreed with Allen on the subject of denominate numbers, showing no tolerance for those who differed with her. Within the week, Click had been sent to the principal for constructing an infernal machine which cast death-dealing paper wads. All now gloated over the impending misery of their common enemy.

"She'll be sorry how she acted," said Breck, who had lately suffered the confiscation of a two-cent lollipop scarcely licked. "She'll worry and worry and worry!"

"Sometimes their hair turns white with grief." This was the well-read Allen's contribution. "In one night their hair turns white. Proba'ly to-morrow morning her hair'll be all turned white."

"Mebbe she'd not hear about it today," said Breck. "Mebbe she won't know about it till Monday when she calls the roll."

The calling of the roll struck Allen's lively fancy, and he gave a rendition of the impending scene, using the conventional squeaky tone.

"'Allen Lansford.' . . . No answer. 'Breckinridge Jones.' . . . No answer. 'Clinton Smedlay.' . . . No answer."

It was a glorious thought, the sole drawback being that the A. B. C.'s could not be present to enjoy their own absence.

THE revolt against adult society went on beautifully. Other citizens besides parents and teachers were now marked for reparation and revenge for past indignities: old Botely, who chased worthy people out of orchards with a heavy stick; Tony Maresi, who gave practically nothing for old iron and bottles; Daniel Kleck, who did not permit swimming in his pond. Other tyrants and killjoys, other sinners against youth, were put upon the index, and ways would be found to make them rue the day they were born.

Meanwhile, the three would be living here in a parentless, teacherless paradise, never going to bed until they felt like it, and never getting up until they were quite ready. They would not wear rubbers, wash their faces, comb their hair, or say "Please." It would be a thoroughly masculine world with no trace of petticoat government. They would never have to associate with girls, who screamed at every little thing, and were afraid of spiders, toads, and snakes.

The mention of girls led to a thought by Breck:

"I wish I hadn't slung that turnip back at Til. Mebbe it was all right inside."

"Tilly will think she is smart," said Allen quickly. "She'll be the last one that ever saw us alive. Well, I'm glad we'll never have to look at Tilly any more." Literature was again invoked. "She has went out of our life forever!"

But Breck would not be sidetracked.

"I wish it would hurry up and get night, so we could go out raiding. I'm getting kinda hungry."

"Le's play casino," Allen replied. Out of the orange-box library was produced a deck of well-worn cards; and the outlaws, lying upon their three empty stomachs, plunged into this sinister game, slapping the cards down like rough characters, and swearing great round "goshes," "hecks," and "darn yous." Breck made himself unpopular with the downtrodden masses by winning too often, and he got himself pretty thoroughly denounced for his obnoxious conduct. The culprit retaliated by talking about food.

"Oh, you make me sick," Allen snorted. "I'm not going to play casino any more. I'm going to read."

He got out a favorite book, started to read, then threw the story down in disgust. The first thing his eyes beheld were the distressing words:

"Horace Livingston quickly built a camp fire, and soon the air was filled with the welcome odor of coffee and broiling venison."

As Allen went to put the book out of his sight, his eyes fell upon the bright and toothsome picture on the end of the orange crate. All life, art, and literature were in conspiracy to make him hungry and break down his morale.

"MEBBE it's getting night now a little," he said. "Le's go up in the lookout and take a look and see how it looks."

The so-called lookout was a little cupola in the extinct livery stable. When they emerged from their hole in the ground they found it perceptibly darker, though the fact that the sky was now overcast made it impossible to tell what time of day it was. They reached the lookout, after great precautions, without seeing any search parties, police, or bloodhounds.

As the window panes in the little steeple were broken, they had a fine, clear view of the surrounding barnyards, the bakery, and several back yards. In one of these Allen now saw something that gave him acute distress, something fraught with peril to the expedition. He would not mention this sight to his weak companions; but it held his own eyes with a terrible fascination.

"Well, I don't see any search parties," said Allen. "Let's go back—ee! Look at that, would you!"

It was a fatal slip. The sharp-eyed Breck caught the direction of his glance.

"Well, what do you know?" he exclaimed. "The little fat squab!"

Tilly Rickhill had not gone out of their life forever, after all!

Only two low structures stood between their conning tower and the Rickhill estate, and current events there could be clearly observed. Tilly was eating—either yet or again. Moreover, unless this was an hallucination of starving creatures, she was giving a tea party. Those who graced her festive soap box were not living, breathing, gobbling girls, but three dolls. And Tilly was eating for the entire company, offering delicacies to her guests, and then putting them into her own interior. It was an awful thing to see a little girl indulging the lower side of her nature and making a beast of herself.

"Looks to me," said Breck huskily, "like bread and butter and jam."

"We could easy make a raid," said Click, "and take it away from her."

"No; that wouldn't be right," replied Allen, who quickly added the explanation: "because it would give us away, and spoil the whole business. We've got to wait till night. That won't be long now. So we must—"

Another command had come to an untimely end, this one in a sniff. The

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Burpee's Seeds Grow

The Flowers or Vegetables you would like to see growing in your garden—read all about them in Burpee's Annual; The Leading American Seed Catalog.

Write for your Annual today. It's free.

CUT HERE

W. ATLEE BURPEE CO.
Seed Growers Philadelphia

Please send me a free copy of Burpee's Annual.
1

Name.....

R. D. or St.....

P. O.....State.....

Kunderd

Gladiolus Book Free

TELLS how to grow the finest gladioli successfully—Kunderd's own directions and methods. Also describes hundreds of Kunderd Gladioli—Ruffled, Laciniated, Plain Petaled, Primulinus Hybrids and the two new types, Snapdragon and Recurvii Gladioli. 68 illustrated in color. 100 new varieties introduced. Use the coupon.

A. E. KUNDERD, 464 Lincoln Way West
Goshen, Ind., U. S. A.
Dear Sir:
Please send me your free Gladiolus Book.
Name_____
St. or R. F. D._____
City_____State_____

FAMOUS DINGEE ROSES

SEND for hints on rose gardens, "Grow Bettter Roses." Free new manual for beginners and others. Our illustrated catalog, "New Guide to Rose Culture," offering over 500 roses, plants, seeds and bulbs, also free on request. Dingee roses favorites for 78 years. Grown on own roots. Safe delivery guaranteed. Send $1 for our trial offer of 8 bushes. Address
THE DINGEE & CONARD CO., Box 125, West Grove, Pa.

WONDERFUL POULTRY BOOK 40 BREEDS
The Nation's Great Poultry Manual tells about Mrs. Berry's success. Blood-Tested, Pure-Bred Poultry, Hatchery, Feeding, Housing, Diseases & Remedies. Makes LOW PRICES on best Fowls, Eggs, Chicks, Supplies. Pullets lay at 4 months. Send only 5c to help mail.
BERRY'S POULTRY FARM, Box 111, Clarinda, Iowa

OSSEGE-BIG C.O.D. CHICK OFFER
Pay for chicks when you get them. Pure-bred selected stocks of high-laying ability. BIG CATALOG FREE. Write today for free illustrated catalog.
J. W. Ossege Hatchery, Dept. 4, Ottawa, O.

BECOME A LANDSCAPE ARCHITECT

Dignified, exclusive profession. Little competition. $5,000 to $10,000 incomes for experts. Easy to master under our correspondence methods. Assistance extended to students and graduates. Established 1916. Write today for full details.
American Landscape School 72 Newark, New York

leader of the revolution tried to make his nose behave, but with no success whatever. This disease spread quickly and all sniffed the scented air. By a trick of perverse fate a vagrant, harmless little breeze starting in a summer cloud somewhere out west of town, had come into Pequot and passed light-heartedly over Grandma Reisner's bakery.

"Doughnuts!" exclaimed Click miserably.

"What did I tell you!" argued Breck. "I said they made 'em on Saturday, didn't I?"

"To-night, we'll have all we want. Oh, boy!" A sensitive ear could have detected a hollow note in Allen's enthusiasm.

"I can't wait till night," said Breck. "I'll be starved."

"You can't starve as quick as that, you dumb-bell! People floating on rafts and things can live for days and days s'long as they have water to drink. If they've got no water they die in hor'ble agony. It don't matter at all about food— Gee! that looks like cake!"

Tilly Rickhill was again in the public eye, and her little guests were eating by proxy some rich and deleterious substance.

"I'm going home," said Breck.

"Yes; and get a lam from your father for not raking the yard!"

Allen meant well by this warning, but one word was ill-chosen.

"Lamb!" said Breck. "Lamb chops is what I'll get."

"If it's all goin' to bust up," said Click, "I might as well—"

"Listen here, I got a catsy idea." This was not really a well-thought-out plan of Allen's. It came from desperation. But something had to be done.

They would now carefully approach the Rickhill domain, and by fair words lure Tilly out into the barnyard. From her they would demand something to sustain life, under threat of kidnapping. It would not be necessary to carry out this threat. Tilly was small and easily scared; she would run back, and give them the remains of the tea party. Then she would go out of their life forever again.

"Le's hurry," said Breck, "or she'll have it all et."

THE Rickhill barnyard was a secluded spot, beautifully adapted to the dark deed they were about to do. Behind it lay the outlaw country, where criminals with their loot could disappear as if the earth had opened and swallowed them. The place was separated from the neat and civilized yard by a high board fence, with a gate of like architecture. Through this gate Allen cautiously poked his head. He saw no signs of adult life, only a little girl roistering with her dumb companions.

"Say, Tilly, come here a minute," he called out gently. "I want to show you something."

Allen half expected her to shriek with alarm at the sight of one given up for lost; but Tilly made no scene whatever.

In the innocence of her guileless youth the victim came trustingly, came through the barnyard, with a look of curiosity upon her countenance and the remains of a cookie disappearing within the same. Allen closed the gate behind her and put his back against it. Tilly was trapped!

There will never be a better time to start than Right Now

YOU'VE thought for a long time that you'd like to play some musical instrument. There will never be a better time than now to start with a

BUESCHER
True Tone Saxophone

This is the one instrument you can be sure of learning to play. If you can whistle a tune, you can't fail with a Buescher. You can quickly learn to play, and with comparatively little effort.

Join the R. F. D. Band

With the aid of the 3 lessons given on request with each new Buescher, many learn scales first hour and play tunes first week. You can teach yourself, and in 90 days join the band, or play with an orchestra, at good pay.

Only Buescher Assures Success

But only with a Buescher is this rapid progress assured. You don't have to fuss and favor for certain notes. Just open the key and blow normally. Every tone full, clear and true.

Six Days' Trial. Easy Terms

Take any Buescher Instrument home for 6 days' trial. If you like it, pay a little each month. Send coupon for beautiful catalog and details of this liberal plan. There will never be a better time to start. Write today.

BUESCHER BAND INSTRUMENT CO.
Everything in Band and Orchestra Instruments
2186 Buescher Block Elkhart, Indiana

BUESCHER BAND INSTRUMENT CO., 381X
2186 Buescher Block, Elkhart, Ind.
Gentlemen: Without obligating me in any way please send me your free literature. Mention instrument interested in.
Age?.....Name instrument.....
Name.....
Address.....

10 BIG WEEKLY ISSUES 10¢
of The Pathfinder, America's liveliest, most unique, most entertaining weekly magazine. Full of wit, humor, information, news events, pictures, special features, best fiction. Once you read THE PATHFINDER you will never do without it. Send your name and 10 cents IMMEDIATELY!
THE PATHFINDER, Dept. G-3, WASHINGTON, D. C.

LAW Free Book

Write today for FREE 128-page book, "THE LAW-TRAINED MAN", which shows how to learn law in spare time through the Blackstone home-study course prepared by 80 prominent legal authorities, including law school deans, lawyers, and U. S. Supreme Court justices. Combination text and case method of instruction used. All material necessary furnished with the course, including elaborate 25-volume law library, which is delivered immediately upon enrollment. Many successful attorneys among our graduates. LL.B. degree conferred. Moderate tuition, low monthly terms. Money-Back Agreement.

Write for free book today
BLACKSTONE INSTITUTE, 4753 Grand Boulevard Dept. 21 Chicago

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You Will Love it on Sight

Campbell's Automatic
Electric Fireless Cooker Range

Electricity costs very little to use in a Campbell Automatic Electric Range. Heating elements are as fast as gas. The automatic oven control insures steady, even heat—uses current only one-third of the cooking time. The automatic control in the Fireless Cooker also saves electricity, and think of the flaky pie crusts—cakes that just melt in your mouth, roasts done to a juicy tenderness, all possible through the kind of electric cooking you can have with a Campbell Electric Range. The biggest surprise of all is the low factory-to-you price. Write and let me send you full details. Just say "Send me your range catalog." A post card will bring it to you at once.

THE WILLIAM CAMPBELL CO., 1601 Union Ave., Alliance, Ohio
Manufacturers of a full line of electric kitchen cooking equipment

It's Now Ready

—actually the most wonderful electric range we have ever offered. Made with new quick ring heating elements which actually

Cook As Fast As Gas

40 per cent more efficient, which means 40 per cent less electricity and less cooking time. Just think of it—boil water and cook food as fast as gas. Results are astonishing. Never before has any one offered an electric range as quick to operate—as economical,

as simple, convenient, practical, time-saving, work-saving, substantial, attractive, and truly beautiful in design.

Wm. Campbell
The Original Fireless Cooker Man

Write and Get My Factory Price

You will be surprised at our low price and the easy payments. Remember, no other range has Campbell features. Automatic oven control turns the heat on and off as needed. Oven door, large cooking top and splasher back made entirely of aluminum. Lifetime luster. Range beautifully finished in silver white enamel. Large aluminum lined electric fireless cooker in the bottom slides in and out like the drawer in a desk. Also automatically controlled. But, write and

Get My Catalog and Special Offer. Send Today

I sell only to users direct from factory. You save money in buying—you save work, worry and drudgery in use—you will love the range the minute you see it. Thirty days' home trial to prove what I say. Write today.

Print Your Own
Cards, Stationery, Circulars, Paper, etc. Save money. Print for others, big profit. Complete outfits $8.85. Job press $11, $29, Rotary $149. All easy, rules sent. Write for catalog presses type etc. THE KELSEY CO., P-30, Meriden, Conn.

WANT WORK AT HOME?
Earn $20 to $50 a week retouching photos—men or women. No selling or canvassing. We teach you at home, furnishing working outfit and employment service. Write today. Artcraft Studios, Dept. D, 3900 Sheridan Road, Chicago.

It's hard to go wrong!

TODAY you can get a flawless, fadeless, full-fashioned Iron Clad hose—pure sheer silk to the hem—powerfully reinforced with mercerized foot and garter top—in the season's latest lovely shades—with an Iron Clad guarantee on every pair—for only $1.50!

It's hard to go wrong when you buy an exquisite, full-fashioned, sheer silk stocking with features such as these—at a price as low as this—with an absolute guarantee of satisfactory service—and behind it all a 50-year-old reputation such as Iron Clad's!

14,000 STORES are selling Iron Clads. If your dealer can't supply you, mail us your remittance of $1.50 a pair, with a request for style 907, and we'll mail your hose direct. State size (8 to 10½) and color (black, white, gun metal, mauve taupe, French nude, parchment, atmosphere, champagne, blonde, grain, silver grey, moonlight, skin, peachbloom, Aloma, sandust, rose blush, pearl blush, pastel parchment, flesh, pink, evenglow, Manon, light gun metal.) We'll pay the postage!

COOPER, WELLS & CO., 204 Vine St., St. Joseph, Mich.

"Iron Clad"

"Get us something to eat," he demanded. "We haven't had a bite since we left home."

Tilly ostentatiously chewed and swallowed.

"There's not much left," she replied. "And I need that for my party."

"Get what you got and bring it here quick, and no nonsense. We are starving."

THREE burly ruffians glowered down upon her. Tilly was only nine, and she was no match for these big brutes.

"If you don't do it," cried Breck, maddened by the pangs of hunger, "we'll kidnap you away."

The girl had had few educational advantages.

"What's kidnap?" she asked sociably.

Allen explained: "We'll carry you off to our secret den, where nobody—where no living souls can find you. We'll hold you there until—until you listen to reason."

"You either get us some grub, or off you go!" muttered Breck, with scowls.

Click also growled to the same general effect.

One might suppose that all was now made clear; but the half-witted young lady seemed to think she was being invited to a party.

"That'll be nice. When are we going to have it?"

"Have what?"

"The kidnapping."

"If you don't bring us something to eat, we'll carry you off right now."

"I can't go now, Al; it's too near dinner time."

"Din—when do you have your dinner, anyhow?" Allen demanded.

"Half past twelve—that's when Papa comes home. We're going to have cherry pie."

As if in confirmation of Tilly's incredible words, the noon factory whistles now blew. It might even be said that they blew up the whole conspiracy. The chances of getting any nourishment from Tilly's tea party were slim, and if it was only twelve o'clock the boys would never last until night.

"Le's let 'er go, Al," Breck implored. Three sufferers now had mental pictures of hot dinners in the offing. Breck added, "What do you say, C.?"

The use of the cryptic initials was forbidden in the presence of rank outsiders, but Allen in the moment of defeat was not aware of this lapse.

"Well, all right," he said. "Le's give 'em one more chance. Mebbe it'll be a lesson to 'em. You can go now, Till."

Tilly looked at the three, and there was a new light of understanding in her eyes. In her slow, lethargic way she had put two and two together and reached an answer.

"I can be kidnapped this afternoon," she offered gayly.

"No; we don't want you," Allen answered.

The girl ignored this breach of etiquette.

"I'll ask Genevieve and Mildred and—"

"Oh, my goo'ness, no!" Allen exclaimed. "Girls are not allowed in our secret lair."

"It's no place for girls," added Breck.

"Girls couldn't even get there," Click declared.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Tilly disposed of all of these objections at once:

"I've been there loads of times. My uncle Dave Wildman gave me a key to the old shop. A. B. C. Club, Nowhere Particular—I never knew who was in it before."

"You think you're smart, don't you?"

This was the very best Allen could do in the way of repartee. He was a badly deflated upriser. His elaborate conspiracy had collapsed, and now his carefully guarded secret seemed about as private as a circus parade. It was a severe blow, but he was not yet beaten. His head was bloody but unbowed.

"Well, anyway, you can't come!"

"I don't think that's a very nice way to talk." To the relief of the boys, Tilly now showed signs of departure. "Well, I got to go now. I've got to telephone my uncle Dave. I've got something particular to tell him."

Allen felt that introducing Old Man Wildman here was bad taste.

"Who's afraid of him!" he said unconvincingly.

Tilly resumed where she left off:

"About how people are trespassing under penalty of the law. He's my own uncle, and I've got to tell him if people are trespassing around there and burning lanterns. Well, goo'by. I don't expect I will see you very soon, because you will all be in jail."

"Hey, Till, don't do that!" This was Allen's unconditional surrender.

THE conqueror's terms were unquestionably stiff. After dinner, the three big brutes were to repair to their club with a broom and a dusting cloth. They would sweep the floor, shake out the carpet, and clean the lantern chimney. Tilly herself would provide some decent pictures of flowers to nail up on the wall. At three she would bring her girl friends and some olive sandwiches. Tilly ended with a crack of the whip:

"You must wash up and comb your hair, and not look like bums."

"You won't tell anybody where you're—where we're going?"

"No—not if you all act nice. I can get away easy. My mother is going out this afternoon. So is Mildred's mother, and so is Genevieve's mother. You know where they're going?—to the Pequot Club. It's ladies' day. Well, so now it's going to be ladies' day at the A. B. C. Club. Or else—else—" Here the fair blackmailer reverted to the subject of jails, dwelling with morbid relish upon the details.

There was a hunted look in Allen's eyes.

"Aw, well, you can come if you want to!"

"No, that's not the way, Al. You must say, 'The pleasures of your comp'ny is cordily invited'."

"The pleasures of your compn'y is cordily invited," Allen growled.

"Say it, Breck."

"Aw, go on, Till!"

"All right, if you want to go to jail—you old turnip thrower."

"The pleasures of your comp'ny is cordily invited," muttered Breck.

The pleasures of Tilly's company were also invited, under pressure, by Click.

Thus, ignominiously, the great revolt against petticoat government ended in ladies' day at the A. B. C. Club!

✤ ✤ ✤ ✤ ✤

Only Half There

Always behind the other boys

a victim of cachexia (run down condition)

That boy of yours—is he thin, listless, sallow, underweight and understrength—at work or at play always lagging behind the other fellow?

Give him yeast; pure yeast in tasty little tablets that he'll like—Yeast Foam Tablets. Let him eat all he wants. Then watch the youngster come into his full mental and physical powers.

5c for the daily supply at all counters or 50c for the big 10 day bottle.

ON COUNTERS EVERYWHERE

YEAST FOAM TABLETS

WANTED!

100 Men ..... 100 Women

To earn from $25.00 to $40.00 in their spare time during the first month of the New Year acting as special subscription representatives of Woman's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's.

Chief of Subscription Staff, Desk 62A
The Crowell Publishing Company,
250 Park Avenue, New York City.
Please send me FREE outfit and instructions for earning money as your representative.
Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You May Have a Desk

—but do you get the salary?

The desk in the private office of Robert Pentland, Jr.—member of the Florida State Board of C. P. A. Examiners and partner in the largest firm of Certified Public Accountants in Florida—is about the same size as the desk he had when a clerk, in 1919. And there's no great difference in looks—

But his income today is more than ten times as large. His firm has offices in nine cities, and employs fifteen C. P. A.'s and thirty other accountants. And he is not yet thirty!

"This rapid progress in six short years," writes Mr. Pentland, "is largely due to my LaSalle training."

Send for Free Book—
"Accountancy, the Profession that Pays"

A complete plan whereby you can advance to positions of responsibility and power in the Accountancy field is clearly outlined in LaSalle's new 64-page book, "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays." The information it contains is of priceless value to the man eager to achieve success in business—and LaSalle will send it to you free.

If you have the urge and the will to increase your income—clip and mail the coupon NOW.

— — —Find Yourself Through LaSalle!— — —

LASALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY
The World's Largest Business Training Institution

Dept. 133-HR Chicago

I should be glad to have your 64-page book, "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays," also a copy of "Ten Years' Promotion in One," all without obligation.

☐ Higher Accountancy
Training for positions as Auditor, Comptroller, Certified Public Accountant, Cost Accountant, etc.

Other LaSalle Opportunities: LaSalle opens the way to success in every important field of business. If more interested in one of the fields indicated below, check here:

☐ Business Management
☐ Modern Salesmanship
☐ Traffic Management
☐ Railway Station Management
☐ Law—Degree of LL.B.
☐ Commercial Law
☐ Industrial Management
☐ Modern Foremanship
☐ Personnel Management
☐ Stenography
☐ Banking and Finance
☐ Modern Business Correspondence
☐ Expert Bookkeeping
☐ C. P. A. Coaching
☐ Business English
☐ Commercial Spanish
☐ Effective Speaking
☐ Stenotypy
☐ Telegraphy
☐ Credit and Collection Correspondence

Name _____

Present Position _____

Address _____

Save Your Feet

When all else fails, end your suffering with the

Heefner Arch Support
No Metal

Fully patented. It re-adjusts the entire foot. Write for free book and statements from doctors and users.

Heefner Arch Support Co., 556 M. E. Taylor Bldg., Louisville, Ky.

LEARN HOW TO WRITE SHORT STORIES

RECENTLY an American writer was paid $1800 for a single short story. By learning to tell the stories of her dreams this woman has found her way to fame and fortune. You can learn to write, too. A new practical course of instruction will give you the training right in your own home during your spare time. Endorsed by eminent writers, including the late Jack London.

Write Today for new booklet "The Art of Story Writing." No obligation—booklet is free. Special offer is now being made. Also special course in English. Write Today—NOW! HOOSIER INSTITUTE, Short Story Dept., Dept. 1061, FT. Wayne, Indiana.

You Can Work for Yourself While Working for Someone Else

(Continued from page 43)

get into some line of work related to finance. That, of course, was only the initial push toward a goal, but it was important, for a bent indicates a liking, and without joy in work nothing great is done.

"A specific turning point came for me when, as a young man, chance brought me into this bank to see one of the vice presidents. That was in 1898, when I was working for Mr. Peavey.

"The year 1898 is remembered in Chicago for a famous attempted corner in the wheat market. Joseph Leiter, in the autumn of 1897, began buying wheat on the Board of Trade, and continued buying so heavily that at the beginning of 1898 he was the largest individual holder of wheat in the history of the grain trade up to that time. When the corner collapsed, as it did, there was a very complicated situation to be untangled. It was necessary to sell the grain which Mr. Leiter had bought, and yet, if possible, market it in such a way as to prevent a collapse in grain prices. Two able men, Mr. P. D. Armour and Mr. Peavey, were appointed to straighten out the tangle, and to see that every creditor received his fair dues. Mr. Armour shortly withdrew, leaving Mr. Peavey to carry the burden of the situation alone; and he in turn put me in charge of the accounts.

"ONE of the creditors was the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank. I knew about the bank, of course, for we had had many transactions with it; and I knew that Mr. John J. Mitchell, one of the leading bankers of the Middle West, was at its head. But I had never been inside its doors; and I thought of it with awe.

"Having determined the amount due the bank from the Leiter deals, I called to make the settlement.

"I soon came to the astonishing realization that there were some things about the situation known to me which the vice president I saw, even if he was one of the top officials of that bank, did not know. In short, he was merely another human being. Once he must have been young, as I still was; and therefore, if he had risen to the position he held, it was possible for me to do the same. That was a knockout thought for me, for advancement had never occurred to me in just that light before."

Stevens had been married shortly before, and his salary had been boosted to twenty-five hundred dollars a year, which was good money for his age at that time. Advancement was certain. But he concluded he would not be happy until he went into business for himself in the field that attracted him. With a total capital of a thousand dollars, which he borrowed from a friend, he did so.

"You've got a good deal of nerve, haven't you!" exclaimed Mr. Peavey, when Stevens told him his decision. Mr. Peavey was silent a moment, then said: "I'll hate to lose you. But if I were in your place I believe I'd do the very same thing!"

To take such a step under the circumstances called for self-reliance.

"Self-belief, or confidence," Mr. Stevens pointed out, "is one of the most essential traits, and can be cultivated by the habit of succeeding.

"By 'confidence' I do not mean brash over-confidence, which does not see the need of a long, thorough training, but a reasoned, quiet belief in the ability to learn how.

"Give me a young man who is confident he can learn to do the job he has in mind, and is determined he will, and I'll bet on his future every time.

"Fortunately, I found early that I could get things if I kept trying. I remember how as a boy I wanted a watch. I could not ask my mother for the money—every penny was precious to her. But I found a boy who promised to sell me his watch for two dollars. I set to work to earn that money by carrying bundles for people, and doing odd jobs in stores, taking in a penny or a nickel at a time. In three or four months I had the two dollars and bought the watch. And then it never would run!"

That, however, did not alter the fact that persistence had achieved its aim.

"You can name the biggest kind of job," Mr. Stevens went on; "I do not care what it is, if it is important you will find that persistence, determination, dogged sticking at the job until it is done, is an absolute essential of accomplishment. I find, in fact, just two kinds of ambition in men. One is a matter of vague desires, and no more; the other is a matter of will, of a made-up mind; will to go through the necessary preparation; determination to stick until the job is finished. Such ambition is the rarer kind, but the kind that wins.

"An exceedingly important thing, too, is an understanding of the difference between 'how' and 'why.'"

EARLY in his career, when Stevens was with the grain concern, he was made general auditor, with authority to go to the branch offices of the company and introduce any improvements he considered necessary. Each branch had its own system of accounting, which rendered comparisons between branches difficult, so young Stevens worked out a uniform system. At one of the offices where he installed it, the bookkeeper was an old-timer, old enough to be his grandfather, for Stevens was only twenty-five or -six. The bookkeeper, rather naturally, did not take kindly to the idea of a stripling teaching him a new way to do his work, but submitted with as good grace as possible. Two months later Stevens saw him again; he was beaming.

"Mr. Stevens," he said, "I did not suppose it was possible; but the new method saves just half my time."

Stevens asked him why he had kept on using the old way so long.

"That's the way I started," he replied.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Menthol Heals The Horehound Soothes

Speakers—For a clear voice—a soothed, comfortable throat—just slip a Bunte Menthol - Horehound Cough Drop in your mouth. Magic!

BUNTE BROTHERS, - Chicago
Est. 1876
Makers of World Famous Candies

Bunte WORLD FAMOUS

Look for the funny fat man on the Red Box

Menthol Horehound Cough Drops

Easing and pleasing 5¢

PATENT-SENSE, free book for inventors seeking largest deserved profits. Established 1869. Write LACEY & LACEY 773 F St. Washington, D. C.

MAKE MONEY-SPARE TIME Fascinating work for men and women! Oil painting photographic subjects. No talent required. Earn big money while learning. Professional outfit included with course. Free employment service. Address Dept. A-4 for free book. National Art School, Inc., 1008 N. Dearborn St., Chicago.

Become a Foot Correctionist A new profession, not medical nor chiropody. All the trade you can attend to; many are making $3,000 to $10,000 yearly, easy terms for training by mail, no further capital needed or goods to buy, no agency or soliciting. Address Stephenson Laboratory, 16 Back Bay, Boston, Mass.

PATENTS. Write for our Guide Books & "RECORD OF INVENTION BLANK" before disclosing inventions. Send model or sketch and description of your invention for Inspection and Advice FREE. Terms Reasonable. Victor J. Evans & Co., 757 Ninth, Washington, D.C.

SHORT STORY WRITING

Particulars of Dr. Esenwein's famous forty-lesson course in writing and marketing of the Short-Story and sample copy of THE WRITER'S MONTHLY free. Write today. THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL Dept. 50 Springfield, Mass.

"And he had started forty years before," said Mr. Stevens. "For forty years he had done only as he was told, without reflecting, and for forty years half his time had been wasted."

A few years ago Mr. Stevens wrote a little paper on this subject, entitled "Is Your Mind a Warehouse or a Factory?" He told about two men he knew. One was graduated from a leading university of this country, took high honors at Heidelberg and Oxford, yet two years later was living practically on charity. The reason, Mr. Stevens pointed out, was that he had made a warehouse of his mind, storing in it facts and "hows" learned by the human race through the ages. But he had not cultivated the analytical or "why" faculty, and, in spite of his stored-up knowledge, he found it almost impossible to turn his hand to useful work.

The other man was one who, as a boy, could not pass his grammar-school examinations for some reason or other, and so never entered high school. Nevertheless, he developed the knack of figuring things out, and to-day is at the head of one of the great banks. His mind was a factory that turned out a useful product.

"I was careful to point out," said Mr. Stevens, "that this illustration was not a slur at education, but was used to show that a man who simply knows the 'how' of a subject has but begun his education; not until he is able to figure out the 'why' is he ready to accomplish things without having to be led by the hand.

"I KNOW, too," he went on, "that it is worth while to give more than passing mention to the simple virtue of accuracy."

Naturally, Stevens as a young bookkeeper made mistakes that others caught, and he was called down. He did not enjoy it, and reached this conclusion:

"I am bound to make some mistakes. If somebody else discovers them, people will lose some of the confidence in me that I want them to have. Very well; I'll check over everything, and try to catch my mistakes before somebody else does."

This double check became a habit. There is nothing spectacular in a habit. But incidents occurred almost daily because of it that helped to pave the way for promotion. One day, for example, the general auditor of a big railroad came to see Mr. Peavey about adjusting a list of disputed claims that had been hanging fire for some time. He brought his statement, and Stevens made up another from the company's books. The lists did not agree. Mr. Peavey noted the fact, and looked at Stevens sharply. The latter assured him his list was correct.

"Do you mean to stand there and tell me that the whole force of accountants working for this railroad is wrong, and you're right," asked Mr. Peavey.

"No, I do not say the railroad people are wrong; but I am pretty certain my figures are correct."

Taking both lists for a check, Stevens soon found an item omitted on the railroad's statement which made up the difference.

"How about it?" Mr. Peavey shot at the general auditor.

"I don't know," the latter confessed; "but I'll wire my office and find out."

Retire in 15 years

on your Present living Budget

by investing in safe 6½% First Mortgage Bonds

Follow the definite plan given in this book, and your financial independence is won.

The plan works just as surely, whether you are now earning $1,000 or $100,000 a year.

The way is certain—each step plainly indicated and absolutely safe—independent of luck, business genius or speculation.

Every fact has been harvested out of the 47 years' experience of Cochran & McCluer in the first mortgage investment banking business.

The plan is so simple, anyone can understand it—so definite anyone can follow it—and so certain, no one can fail.

In addition to the Financial Independence Plan and the unique budget schedule, the book gives suggestions that enable you to enjoy more of the good things of life, both while building your independent fortune and after you have attained it.

We invite the most skeptical to read this plain, straightforward, interesting book.

Send coupon. We employ no salesmen, therefore none will call.

Mail this

Cochran & McCluer Co. A-1-28
42 N. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.
Please send me, without obligation, your book, "How To Retire In Fifteen Years."

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

Cochran & McCluer Co.
Established 1881—Never a loss to any investor.
42 North Dearborn Street, CHICAGO

Be a Tea Room Expert

Tea room managers, assistant managers, hostesses, table directors, buyers, etc., needed everywhere. We teach you entire business in your spare time. You can quickly qualify as a tea room expert, ready to step into a well-paid executive position, or open a tea room of your own. A splendid income, fascinating work and easy hours await you. Send NOW for Free 44-page Book, "Pouring Tea for Profit." LEWIS TEA ROOM INSTITUTE Dept. AP-1466 Washington, D. C.

TYPEWRITER PRICES CUT

World's best makes—Underwood, Remington, Oliver—prices smashed to almost half.

$2 Down and it's yours

All late models, completely rebuilt and refinished brand new. GUARANTEED for ten YEARS. Send no money—big FREE catalog shows actual machines in full colors. Get our direct-to-you easy payment plan and 10-day trial offer. Limited time, so write today. Sent on Trial

International Typewriter Ex., 186 W. Lake St., Dept. 197, Chicago

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He Mailed a Coupon Like This

Rhodes Manufacturing Co., Dept. A-252
1418 Pendleton Ave., St. Louis, Mo.
Without obligating me, please send illustrated description of KRISS-KROSS Stropper and your offer of a 3-Way Razor FREE.
Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....
[ ] Check here if interested in becoming representative

-and it Brought Him

1129 Cool Shaves from One Single Blade!

Another Triumph For KRISS-KROSS, The Most Amazing Shaving Invention Ever Patented! Mr. T. Liddle, of Illinois, Wrote Recently. "I Have Been Using One Of Your Stroppers Since May 1924. I Shave Every Morning And I Am STILL ON MY FIRST BLADE!". Read Astonishing Details, Then Act At Once For Real Shaving Joy.

NO wonder KRISS-KROSS marks such a radical advance in shaving comfort and economy! For now at last it has captured a secret that has baffled scientists for years! It actually reproduces mechanically the diagonal flip-flop master-barber's stroke that gives razor blades the keenest cutting edge that steel can take. Pressure decreases automatically. And in just 11 seconds you are ready for the coolest, slickest shave you ever had!

Get Free Offer

And now—to introduce this sensational device that makes old blades keener than new—we are giving free an amazing new kind of razor. Instantly adjustable to any angle. Comes with 5 new-process blades. Find out all about this astonishing offer. No obligation. Just fill out and mail the coupon to-day.

RHODES MFG. CO.
Dept. A-252
1418 Pendleton Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

AGENTS: KRISS-KROSS representatives make $75—$200 a week and up! It's easy. KRISS-KROSS sells at sight. Check bottom line of coupon and get full details.

GO INTO BUSINESS for Yourself Establish and operate a "New System Specialty Candy Factory" in your community. We furnish everything. Money-making opportunity unlimited. Either men or women. Big Candy Booklet Free. Write for it today. Don't put it off!
W. HILLYER RAGSDALE Drawer 35 EAST ORANGE, N. J.

Does writing pay in Cash?

Here is what three Palmer students say: "I just received a hundred dollar prize for a story." Mrs. C. Y., Atlantic City, N. J. . . . "Just received word of the acceptance of 'Judge Not', a short story. The price was $100." E. M. P., Maplewood, Mo. . . . "During August I wrote two advertising booklets which brought $50 and $100 respectively." R. A. McL., Oakland, California.

The Palmer Institute courses are endorsed by Jesse Lynch Williams, author of many stories in The Saturday Evening Post and other magazines, who says: "The Palmer course . . . is better than any system of teaching the writing of fiction in any of our colleges or universities I have personally investigated, although it may be they have improved since my day."

JESSE LYNCH WILLIAMS
Former president of the Authors' League of America.

Write stories that sell! Use the coupon.

PALMER INSTITUTE OF AUTHORSHIP
Dept. 122-A Palmer Bldg., Hollywood, Calif.
Please send me, without any obligation, details about the course I have checked.
☐ Short Story Writing
☐ English and Self-Expression
☐ Photoplay Writing
Name.....
Address.....
All correspondence strictly confidential
No salesman will call upon you

Learn to write short stories

The reply admitted the error. Like every first-rate man, Mr. Peavey was inordinately fond of having everything in his office as near mistake-proof as possible, and Stevens's accuracy naturally pleased him tremendously.

"A favorable attitude of mind," Mr. Stevens went on, "is another controlling factor in accomplishment. Of course this includes and implies many things: every success thought and every failure thought is part of a man's attitude of mind. But what I particularly want to mention is worry.

"I made up my mind years ago that I would do the best I could at the time, then forget it. Indecision, I think, is one of the major afflictions; worry is its twin brother.

"Let's see what happens to the man who worries. Suppose I were to go home to-night, wondering whether I had done this right, or that right. Worry would say:

"'Maybe you ought to have done so-and-so instead. Maybe you have made a serious mistake.'

"The immediate result would be that I would lose my sleep. The next morning I would come to work unrefreshed, and in an uncertain frame of mind. My decisions would be slower, less assured, and probably less correct. Soon I would be guilty of habitual indecision, and totally unfit for my job. That is the pass to which worry can bring a man.

"Worry is an acquired habit; the refusal to worry is also an acquired habit. And there is a close relation between worry or the lack of it, and physical health.

"WHEN I dreamed years ago of occupying some position of importance by the time I was fifty, I decided I was going to be prepared physically and mentally for the burdens of such a position. And in doing so, there is one habit I have found invaluable. It dates from the days when I was a boy working at the wagon factory. I used to come home for lunch, and my mother bade me lie down after lunch for five or ten minutes. Boylike, I could see no sense in that.

"'Never mind,' she would say; 'you just lie down and relax. It will do you good.'

"I tried it. It did do me good. Within a very short time it became a habit. I found I could simply 'wipe' everything off my mind, and sometimes sleep for a few minutes, waking up refreshed and ready for more work.

"The habit of relaxing at odd times has lasted, and I have known occasions when it was of immense value to me. To this day, when there is any need to I can lean back in my chair at the office, or in the seat of a train, forget everything, and inside of a couple of minutes am sound asleep, waking refreshed.

"The subject of physical preparedness is a big one, and this touches only a small phase; but I'll leave it there.

"The price of mental preparedness is constant study.

"My studies usually took the form of observation. I was always trying to find out, for example, how the men ahead of me in the line of promotion did their work, and why they did it, so that I would be mentally prepared for their jobs if promoted. A question that I think a man ought to ask himself every so often is: How long has it been since I last learned a new thing?

"Ruts are in the mind. A man may go along in the same job, doing about the same work for years, apparently not making much headway, and still not really be in a rut. It all depends on whether he is learning new things and preparing himself.

"In a large organization there is bound to be a certain number of more or less dead-end jobs, usually on the lower paid kinds of work, and a man who allows himself to get in a rut in one of them is in a precarious position. Being such a humble cog in the big wheel, nobody may pay much attention to him, and he may never get the jolt or boost he needs to set him going again, unless it comes from within. In the higher-paid jobs, a man is more likely to be brought up with a rap if his mind goes napping."

AS a lad Stevens used to get to work at seven and work till six. He was supposed to be at the office an hour ahead of the others. Sometimes in winter it would be thirty and forty degrees below zero, and he had to kindle the fires, sweep the floors, empty the waste baskets, and dust—all before anybody else got there. Then he put in a full day at miscellaneous jobs, and after supper his brother and he had to turn out at the wood pile and rustle the saw and ax. After he began keeping books he used to work all day at the office, then go home and keep other sets of books for small concerns.

"Some time back I said," he went on, "there must be an inner urge and necessity to do well, a sense of dignity, of responsibility. That sense came to me rather early, chiefly, I think, because of my father's death and my mother's struggle. It was impressed also on me by particular incidents.

"For example, when Mr. Peavey appointed me the general auditor he directed me to visit all the company's branches and acquaint myself fully with their affairs. He gave me the necessary authority, then made the following remark:

"'Do not regard yourself,' he said, 'as the personal representative of F. H. Peavey. Say to yourself: "I am F. H. Peavey!"'

"It was two dozen years later that I was in Chicago on business, and a friend called at the room in the club where I was staying.

"'I'm on my way to Mr. John J. Mitchell's office,' he said. 'Put on your hat and come along.'

"'I don't know Mr. Mitchell,' I objected.

"'You know who he is, don't you?'

"'Yes, of course.'

"'Wouldn't you like to meet him?'

"'Yes.'

"'Then come.'

"The friend excused himself almost as soon as he introduced me to Mr. Mitchell. I too soon got up to go; but Mr. Mitchell waved me to keep my seat and said:

"'You didn't know, did you, that I sent for you?'

"It was then that he offered me a vice presidency in this bank. I told him I was not looking for a job.

"'No,' he said, 'I know you are not. That is one reason why I want you.'

"'But I have my own business.'

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"'I know.'

"'I'm not sure I would care to work for somebody else again.'

"Then he voiced the thought I am trying to convey.

"'I do not want you to work for somebody else,' he said; 'I want you to continue working for yourself—but in this bank.'

"The inner necessity to do well! I wonder if I make myself clear. It is, in brief, the difference between being driven with a whip, and advancing toward a goal desired.

"And patience. Nowadays, when we move so fast in so many directions, I think we need to speak of this quality and insist on it more than we do.

"Yet patience, I know, is a difficult lesson for youth. My son finished his college course not long ago, ready to take the world by the tail and fling it over his shoulder, and I ventured a bit of fatherly advice.

"'Gene,' I said, 'when you entered prep school, you started as a freshman. When you entered college, you again started as a freshman. Now you are through with those schools, and are entering business. Again you must start as a freshman, and it will be more than four years before you become a senior. When you get impatient, as you no doubt will, remember that there are men at the head of corporations who have worked for ten years and more keeping books!'

"FINALLY, there is the question of understanding that grows with sympathetic effort—the richer understanding of life and its problems, of opportunity and its many aspects, of people, of discouragement, of hope and courage, of values, of what is truly worth while and what is negligible. To me the opportunities of the present seem dazzling.

"Understanding comes with sympathetic effort. So much of life is men. So much of business is men. To know men well is to know both life and business better. There are deep loyalties in human nature. Put your trust in them. They are keys to precious things."

Thus on the day Stevens told Mr. Peavey he was going into business for himself.

"You," said the older man, "have occupied a peculiarly close and confidential position here. I hate to lose you." Suddenly he added, "Have you made your banking arrangements?"

"No."

"Then I want to make them for you. Put on your hat."

Mr. Peavey, whom nine out of ten in the office feared, took his young employee to one of the biggest Minneapolis banks, a bank where he himself was a member of the executive committee, introduced him to the president, and said:

"This young fellow has been with me for ten years. Now he's going into business for himself. He will need a lot of money. I will stake my reputation and every cent I own on his honesty and ability."

That was all. The young man's sole tangible capital was a thousand dollars of borrowed money; yet because of an older man's faith, he found himself able to command all the money he needed.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Before chill air nips your throat—take out

"The cheapest health insurance in the world"

In cold and biting winds, Smith Brothers Cough Drops safely protect your throat. Irritation and hoarseness are soothed and relieved. Your cough is eased, then stopped. Your whole throat is cooled, cleared, refreshed!

A delicious precaution! 5c Two kinds: S. B. or Menthol.

PREPARE FOR AN

ART CAREER

—thru the only art school operated as a department of a large art organization, who have actually produced over a quarter million drawings for leading advertisers. Where else can you get so wide an experience? Home study instruction. Write for illustrated book telling of our successful students.

MEYER BOTH COMPANY
Michigan Ave. at 20th St. Dept. 15, Chicago, Ill.

NEW WATER FERN

Beautiful House Plant --- REQUIRES NO SOIL

THRIVES IN A VASE OF WATER

A peculiar and interesting plant that is admired by everyone; handsome, velvety, fine, fern-like foliage. Curls up and goes to sleep when taken out of water, and keeps in its sleeping or dormant state for weeks and awakens again in a few minutes after being placed in water. Owing to the fact it is capable of sleeping and awakening repeatedly, it is called the Oposum Fern. Do not confuse this plant with the much advertised Resurrection plant. If you want one of the most satisfactory and beautiful "Table Ferns," something entirely new, get one of these marvels of plant life. Plants, 25c each; 3 for 50c; 7 for $1.00, postpaid. BURGESS SEED & PLANT CO., 342 W. F., GALESBURG, MICHIGAN.

Mr. F. J. Persun of New Jersey earned over $900.00 in his spare time last year.

Straight to Big Spare Time Profits!

Follow the arrow to extra cash as a subscription representative of Woman's Home Companion and the other popular Crowell magazines—The American Magazine, Collier's, The Mentor and Farm and Fireside. Hundreds of men and women everywhere are using this opportunity to make more money.

You, too, can make your spare hours pay big dividends. Now is the time to start on the road to Crowell profits. Begin earning money at once—on your very first order. It costs nothing to try.

MAIL THE COUPON NOW

Name.....

Address.....

Post Office.....State.....

The Crowell Publishing Company, 250 Park Ave., New York City.

Chief of Subscription Staff, Desk 63-A

I want immediate profits. Without obligations to me, please send me full details of your easy money-making plan.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF DRAMATIC ARTS
Founded 1884 by Franklin H. Sargent
The foremost institution for Dramatic and Expressional Training. The instruction of the Academy furnishes the essential preparation for Directing and Teaching as well as for Acting.
The training is educative and practical, developing Poise, Personality and Expressional Power, of value to those in professional life and to the layman.
Midwinter Term Opens January 16th
Extension Dramatic Courses in co-operation with COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
Free Catalog describing all Courses from Room 266-A, CARNEGIE HALL, New York

McLean Hospital Training School
Offers to men a unique course in nursing with $30 a month, room and board while in training. Graduates in demand at $5 to $10 a day. Dr. F. H. Packard, Supt., Waverly, Mass.

WHAT
About your boy?
Is he attending the very best school—for him? That question should make you think. If you're in doubt, write for the "Kiski Plan."
Second semester opens February 1.
Write Dr. A. W. Wilson, President. Box 927, Saltsburg, Pa.
Kiskiminetas School for Boys

AMERICAN COLLEGE OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION ACCREDITED CO-EDUCATIONAL 2 yr. diploma, 3 and 4 yr. B. P. E. Degree courses. H. S. graduates admitted. Special students accepted. Free placement bureau. Dormitory. Second Semester starts Feb. 1.
Dept. A. M. 1019 Diversey Parkway, Chicago, Illinois

TELEGRAPHY
(Morse and Wireless) and RAILWAY ACCOUNTING taught thoroughly. Big salaries; great opportunities. Oldest, largest school. Endorsed by Telegraph, Railway, Radio and Government officials. Expenses low—opportunities to earn large portion. Catalog free.
DODGE'S INSTITUTE Noma Street, Valparaiso, Ind.

BRENAU COLLEGE CONSERVATORY
Select patronage 30 states: location foothills Blue Ridge Mts. North of Atlanta. Standard A. B. course; special advantages, music, oratory, art, domestic science, physical culture: 31 buildings, swimming, boating, horseback riding, etc. For catalogue, address BRENAU, Box R, Gainesville, Ga.

Missouri Military Academy
Develops red-blooded American manhood, through carefully co-ordinated military and academic training. Equipment and faculty exceptional. For catalog address
Col. E. Y. Burton, Pres., Box 122, Mexico, Missouri

BUSH CONSERVATORY—CHICAGO
AN INSTITUTION OF NATIONAL PROMINENCE
teaching MUSIC, Dramatic Art, Expression, Opera, Languages, Dancing. 125 instructors. Special courses for teachers and soloists, leading to FREE MASTER SCHOOL. We own our dormitories. Enroll NOW.
A. M. Schwenker, 839 North Dearborn Street, Chicago

LAYTON SCHOOL OF ART
Layton Art Gallery, Milwaukee, Wis.
Courses in Painting and Sculpture, Commercial Art, Teacher Training, Interior, Costume, and Industrial Design. Students may enter at any time. For illustrated catalog address
Charlotte R. Partridge, Director
Dept. A. M. 438 Jefferson St., Milwaukee, Wis.

COLUMBIA SCHOOL OF MUSIC
An accredited school. Every branch of music. 27th year. Year Book free on request.
COLUMBIA SCHOOL OF MUSIC
Box A, 509 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

KINDERGARTEN AND PRIMARY
Training. 33rd Yr. Accredited. High School graduates admitted. 2 and 3 Yr. diplomas. Student residence. Athletics. Second Semester starts January 27. Address Registrar for Illustrated Bulletin.
Chicago Teachers College, 709 Rush St., Chicago

RIDER College
DEGREE of B. C. S. & B. Accts IN 2 YEARS
Equal credit hours to four-year course. Also shorter diploma courses in Business Administration. Also Post Graduate Year for Master degrees. 64th year now in session. Enter now. Positions for graduates. For catalog write Sec., Rider College, Trenton, N.J.

LAKE FOREST
Non-Military. Strictly College Preparatory Academy for Boys
On Lake—hour north of Chicago. Modern buildings—all athletics. For Catalogue address:
J. W. RICHARDS, Prin., Box 149, LAKE FOREST, ILL.

THE WOODS' SCHOOL
For Exceptional Children Three Separate Schools
GIRLS BOYS LITTLE FOLKS
Summer Camp
Booklet Box 172, Langhorne, Pa.
Mrs. Mollie Woods Hare, Principal

The Sargent School for Physical Education
Founded 1881 by Dr. D. A. Sargent
Booklet on request
L. W. SARGENT, Director, Cambridge, Mass.

Five Rules for Rational Living

(Continued from page 37)

literally and actually true that "nothing succeeds like success." The habit of succeeding rolls up like a snowball until it sweeps everything before it. When you have made your nervous system your friend instead of your enemy, it means that in every undertaking all the habits of a lifetime, all your dynamic force, all the faith, hope, and flood of your nature is behind you. You can't fail, for the literal and actual reason that your whole mind is filled with the picture of success, and failure has become unthinkable to you.

Now, one of the greatest elements in developing the habit of success is this: you must have your habit maxims and habit ideals ready in your memory. Let us see why this is so essential.

People nowadays often scoff at the old-fashioned mottoes which we used to work in cardboard and hang on our walls, such as "Dare to Do Right," "Love One Another," "God Bless Our Home." Of course, if you merely hang your mottoes on the wall they are worse than useless. But if you hang them in your mind and heart and think about them, if you flood them frequently with a tide of emotion, it may happen that having the right motto ready at the right moment will be your immortal salvation.

For instance, if your mind is full of right ideals—ideals of courage, determination, nobility, tolerance, generosity—when you are in a tight place they will leap instantly to your aid. A man often excuses himself for yielding to temptation by saying, "I didn't think." The reason he didn't think was because he had not prepared his memory habits in advance, so as to have the right kind of things to think about; he could not get his good resolutions and good ideals called up out of a vague memory quick enough and sent hustling to his motor centers before all the counter-temptations and considerations had had a chance to rush in and head them off. By the time his good resolutions got there they found the field already preëmpted.

YOU see here a clear picture of what is happening inside of you when you are battling against temptation or trying to reach any important decision. The battle is going to turn on just this: Which set of considerations is going to reach your motor centers first? For a long time, like horses getting ready for the race, different reasons and considerations prance about under the starting wire until they hear the word go. And, at this moment, if your habits of success, your ideals and moral maxims are in fine fettle and straining at the bridle, they will get the word first and be off, and you can be sure they will keep their lead until the race is over.

One of the best maxims that I have ever found to have at hand at such moments is a passage which you will find in Professor James's little book, "Talks to Teachers and Students," the book which, I believe, has helped me more than any book in the world outside of the Bible. This particular passage has often come to my rescue when I was in a tight place. Professor James says:

Every smallest stroke of virtue or of vice leaves its never-so-little scar. The drunken Rip Van Winkle, in Jefferson's play, excuses himself for every fresh dereliction by saying, "I won't count this time." Well! he may not count it, and a kind Heaven may not count it; but it is being counted, none the less. Down among the nerve cells and fibers the molecules are counting it, registering, and storing it up to be used against him when the next temptation comes. Nothing we ever do is, in strict scientific literalness, wiped out. As we become drunkards by so many separate drinks, so we become saints in the moral world, and authorities and experts in the practical and scientific spheres, by so many separate acts and hours of work.

I HAVE dwelt upon this first principle of rational living because it is the basis of all others. If you have not discovered how to form successful habits and principles of living, you can make all the fine resolutions in the world and be preached to by the greatest preachers and writers on earth, but it will do you no good. But if you have learned this great fundamental lesson, then the kingdom of success lies open before you. It might be that your practical plans would fail, because sometimes failure comes from causes that are beyond our control. A farmer's plans may fail because of the weather, a salesman's plans may fail because of changed conditions. But you can be sure that if you have learned the habit of success all the forces of will and personality which you possess are on your side. And, even granted that you do not make money and that your plans do fail, you yourself have been a success. When Palissy, the inventor of the famous French pottery which bears his name, was condemned to death for his religion and thrown into the Bastille, King Henry III went to see him in prison and told him that he pitied him very much and would like to set him free, but that he was so "constrained" by his enemies that he could not, unless he recanted his religious faith. The unconquerable old man replied, "It is I, Your Majesty, who pities you when you say, 'I am constrained!' It is not spoken like a king; all the enemies in the world can never constrain me, because I know how to die." Even in death, this old man—one of the noblest heroes that ever lived—was a gigantic success. And precisely that same personal success is open to the humblest man or woman alive.

I wish I could make my second principle of rational living as real and helpful in your life as it has been in mine. It came to me suddenly and unexpectedly.

One Sunday morning, about twenty-five years ago, I was sitting with Mrs. Wiggam, listening to a lecture by Dr. William Churchill King, president of Oberlin College. It was one of the most inspiring addresses I have ever heard. I went away in a glow of emotion—the most helpful and the most dangerous mood a man can get into. Periods of emotional exaltation are exceedingly dangerous unless you do something about them. They fill you with good resolutions; but unless you do something to make these resolutions effective they leave you worse, morally and physically. The man who "gets religion" at

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Complete this Drawing
Test your Ability

If you like to draw, let your talent make your fortune. Opportunities in this field have never been better. Drawing is easy to learn the "Federal Home-Study Way." Learn from over fifty famous artists. The course includes illustrating, cartooning, lettering, poster designing, window card illustrating, etc. Get on the "Road to Bigger Things." Complete the drawing above in pen or pencil. Write your name and address on the margin of the page. Tear it out and mail to us TODAY.

Federal School of Illustrating 1018 Federal School Bldg., Minneapolis, Minn.

FRENCH and SPANISH
Demonstration* Record

A condensed lesson. Printed text furnished with the record. A practical demonstration of how easily you can learn a new language. Endorsed by French and Spanish Embassies. Mail only 25c. Check language wanted

only 25¢

☐ French ☐ Spanish. International Correspondence Schools, Dept. 7485-E, Scranton, Penna.

EARN PROMOTION AND COLLEGE CREDIT
through the
HOME-STUDY COURSES
in 40 different subjects given by
The University of Chicago
215 Ellis Hall, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

900% Increase
Made by C. W. Birmingham who rose from $15 a week to $7500 a year!

Raised My Pay To
$7286 is what F. J. Walsh writes after taking this amazing new kind of sales training.

Let Me Make You a Master Salesman
This New Easy Way!

NO ambitious man need feel that the doors of salesmanship—the highest paid profession in the world—are closed to him because he lacks the "knack" of selling. Master salesmen are made, not born, as some people have foolishly thought. Results secured over the past twenty years by this Association prove that almost any man can master the secrets of selling in an amazingly short time through a simple system of home training. Members of this Association not only receive this training, but when qualified are offered the services of our employment department, which last year received calls for 51,054 salesmen from the largest selling organizations in America.

Fascinating Book FREE

"Modern Salesmanship" is the title of an intensely interesting book which explains in detail the methods that have already carried hundreds of men to the top of the selling profession. This book will be sent Free to any man who aspires to earn $5000 a year or more. Send for it at once. There is no obligation, and it may be the start of a new and broader life for you.

NATIONAL SALESMEN'S TRAINING ASSOCIATION
WORLD'S OLDEST AND LARGEST SALES TRAINING INSTITUTION
N. S. T. A. Bldg. Chicago, Ill. Dept. A-10

every revival and is a saint for a few weeks and then backslides, is a typical picture of our own lives in many directions.

For instance, I have forgotten every word of President King's address, except one line. And the reason I have remembered it is because I acted on it; I incorporated it into my life. It was:

"Always try to feel the emotion that you ought to feel."

"But," you say at once, "how am I going to manufacture the right emotion? If I don't get excited over a picture or a poem, if I am jealous instead of happy over the achievement of some friend, if I don't feel religious in church, if I don't like my job, how am I going to get that way?"

I admit you can't yank yourself up by the nape of the neck and get that way. You can't say, "I will feel right and moral and excited and happy and energetic," and thus lift yourself into the seventh heaven by your moral boot straps. But you can attain these sentiments and feelings if you cultivate the knowledge necessary to attain them, and learn to perceive the beauties and realities out of which all great emotion and happiness must spring. You can like your job if you learn to see what it means to yourself and to others.

For instance, I knew a man who hated his work as an expert accountant. But he began to read up on the work of expert accountants, their importance to our commercial life, the wide influence they exert, and, as a result, his whole life and work took on a new tone and meaning.

THE difficulty is, we all have eyes that see not and ears that hear not. And this is because we have not trained our eyes to see nor our ears to hear the real things which bring joy and satisfaction.

The story is told of an American multimillionaire, who, after roaming aimlessly through one of the great art galleries of Paris, said to his wife, "Well, Amanda, I guess there is nothing much here for us to see." There wasn't much for them to see.

If you do not feel rich and potent emotions in the presence of the great works of virtue and beauty which have been approved by the judgment of time, you may be sure that they are not on trial, but that you are. All one can do is to study them, to try to see why men have turned to them for consolation and courage, why they have made them into their holy altars, and kept sacred fires burning upon them throughout the generations.

Cultivating the right emotion is the work of a lifetime. There is surely no emotion we need more than that of courage. If a man tells you he has never known fear, he acknowledges that he has no imagination. The best way I have found to conquer my fear is not to give it time to come up. If I have a fight in a committee meeting, or a disagreeable task to perform, such as writing a difficult letter or dealing with a cantankerous person, I try to plunge in before I have time to think of consequences.

In a situation of personal danger, I find that if I hesitate even the bat of an eye, I am likely to get scared and run. But if I act instantly, I literally haven't time to get frightened. If you can keep your attention fixed on courage instead of fear, you can literally walk through hell and high water.

"That sore throat was no joke—"

"My doctor said, 'Keep up the Formamint treatment. Formamint releases one of the best germ-killing agents we have over the throat tissues—and is absolutely harmless . . .'

"In a few days I was O.K.—cough gone—grouch gone—talking like a human being over the telephone . . ."

At the first sign of raspiness—Formamint. Amazing how quickly the irritation is soothed. Formamint can be taken anywhere—acts continuously. One every hour to treat sore throat, as a preventive one every two hours.

Formamint
THE GERM-KILLING THROAT TABLET

GREAT CHANCE to LEARN ELECTRICITY in 90 Days—without Books or Lessons

Learn by doing; my new sure method will make you a master of practical electricity in 90 days. New $2,000,000 School; vast new equipment. Wind real armatures; wire real houses; build real batteries; everything real with an instructor available at your elbow. Coyne Graduates get positions leading to $50 a week and up. Free employment service for life. Send now for big 56-page catalog FREE. Learn how you can prepare for the big pay class in 12 short weeks. The great opportunity of a lifetime. Act NOW!

COYNE Electrical SCHOOL
Not a Correspondence School—H. C. Lewis, Pres.—Est. 1899
500 So. Paulina St., Dept. 18-05, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. H. C. Lewis, Coyne Electrical School, Dept. 18-05
500 So. Paulina Street, Chicago, Ill.
Please send me illustrated FREE Book on Electricity and Coyne. No obligation. Also details on free employment service, and radio, aeroplane and automotive courses that are included.

NAME.....
ADDRESS.....
CITY.....STATE.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Young outdoor men wanted

Interesting, vigorous outdoor work in a growing organization where merit wins advancement. Good starting wages. Permanent positions and a real future for men who make good. Our present field force of Davey Tree Experts cannot meet the increasing demand. So we are selecting now, to enter our employ, a few sturdy, clean young men, thorough Americans, single, between 20 and 30 years old, free to travel, industrious, with good practical education, and able to give good references. Write for qualification blank to serve in place of personal interview. The Davey Tree Expert Co., Inc., 858 Federal Bldg., Kent, Ohio.

BE A RAILWAY TRAFFIC INSPECTOR

Start at a Good Salary in a Definite Position

For nine years, our graduates have been offered positions as Traffic Inspector at definite salaries, plus expenses, a few days after completing their studies. Traffic Inspectors start at $120 or more per month and rise rapidly to $175, $200 or $250 per month.

As a Railway Traffic Inspector, you are practically your own boss, see new faces and places each minute, report only to high officials, are rapidly advanced. It's healthful, outdoor work, with regular hours.

Hundreds of Satisfied Graduates

Write today for free booklet, giving full details and contract agreeing to refund your money if position is not secured for you after graduation.

Standard Business Training Inst., Div.-1, Buffalo, N. Y.

Infantile Paralysis

As a result of Infantile Paralysis in January, 1927, my son Francis, aged four, could not stand, walk or crawl. His arms were also involved. Three months later I took him to the McLain Sanitarium and after five months' treatment, he can walk without crutches or braces and uses his arms very much better. I surely recommend this institution to all parents of children having Infantile Paralysis, and will answer all letters of inquiry.

MRS. JOHN W. WOLFORD,
Ethel, Missouri.

For Crippled Children

The McLain Sanitarium is a private institution devoted to the treatment of Club Feet, Infantile Paralysis, Spinal Diseases and Deformities, Hip Disease, Wry Neck, etc., especially as found in children and young adults.

WRITE FOR FREE BOOKS—"Deformities and Paralysis" and "References." Also illustrated magazine "Sanitarium News."

McLAIN ORTHOPEDIC SANITARIUM
835 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, Missouri, U. S. A.

L 1050

And when it comes to creating the right emotion toward drudging work and soul-racking toil—things which very few of us entirely escape—imagining the right emotion helps to bring it about. A number of experiments have been tried on college students who were compelled to work at tasks which they intensely disliked. After working up an artificial enthusiasm by saying to themselves as earnestly as possible, "My, but this is lots of fun!" "Gee, but I do like this work!" or, "I know this work is going to be a great benefit to me and to others," it was found they produced almost as good work as they did when they were really enthusiastic.

Simulating an emotion you do not feel often paves the way for the right emotion. You will never attain rational living unless you see clearly this great fact, that the happiness or unhappiness you get out of any situation or experience depends wholly on your attitude toward it—the way you feel about it.

I knew a city woman whose husband took her to a small town to live. "Oh, how I hate this hole and these dull people," she said to me. "I simply can't stand it." But she began to study why the people who lived there liked it. Two years afterward she said to me, "I love this place, and the people; I hope I'll never have to leave here." The way you cultivate your feelings toward things is all there is to happiness.

I HAVE given you only a glimpse of the psychology of the emotions. It is an immense field, much of which is still unexplored. But beneath and behind all habits of rational and happy living, there is a great physical basis. For instance, the first thing to do in cultivating a strong will is to cultivate a strong body, at least a highly trained body. It is true, of course, that some invalids have carried out almost unbelievable achievements of will power; but they have done it at the expense of racking pain and fearfully overwrought nervous systems. And to attain a sound physical equipment, trained to leap instantly to the aid of the will, nothing is more helpful than play. To me the third great principle of rational living is this:

You must seriously and deliberately plan for times of play.

Just as the influenza epidemic was coming to an end, in the spring of 1918, I went into the office of Vernon Harrison, manager of the Redpath Lyceum Chautauqua System, at Columbus, Ohio. He pointed to a magnificent golf trophy above his desk, and said cheerfully, "That is what the flu epidemic did for me; it cost me twenty-five thousand dollars but I had a world of fun, winning it."

I asked him to explain, and he replied: "Well, the flu canceled nearly all of our lecture courses. Everybody around the office was in the dumps. I saw if I stayed in the office I'd get that way too. Getting the blues wouldn't stop the epidemic. So I took my clubs and went in for the Columbus trophy, and played the best golf of my life. As a result, I am now fit as a fiddle for the summer campaign and ready to win my losses back. I have had the time of my life instead of going to pieces with the blues."

Very often the most heroic thing a man can do when things are crumbling to

City Conveniences in your Suburban Home

Sanitary sewage disposal that adds to your comforts, protects health, and increases the value of your property.

San-Equip
SEPTIC TANKS

Follow the U. S. Public Health Service design. Perfect sanitary disposal. Ten years' record of satisfactory service. Before you decide on any system write for free folder—"How to be Safe without Sewers."

Chemical Toilet Corporation
800 Brighton Ave., Syracuse, N. Y.
Makers also of sanitary waterless toilets

Home Made Candies

Our Home Study Method for ladies and men, taught by retired manufacturer. Turn kitchen into Candy Shop, make money from first day. Many wealthy, started with no capital. Start quick—grow fast. In the Home Made Candy Business the little fellow has the big fellow at a disadvantage. We furnish tools. Free Book explains.

CAPITOL CANDY SCHOOL
Dept. T-307 Washington, D. C.

You can be quickly cured, if you
STAMMER

Send 10 cents for 288-page book on Stammering and Stuttering, "Its Cause and Cure." It tells how I cured myself after stammering 20 yrs. B. N. Bogue, 7399 Bogue Bldg., 1147 N. Ill. St., Indianapolis.

Learn Cartooning

At Home—In Your Spare Time from the school that has trained scores of today's successful cartoonists who earn from $50 to $200 and more a week. The Landon Picture Chart Method of teaching makes original drawing easy to learn. Send 6c in stamps for full information and chart to test your ability. Also state age.

THE LANDON SCHOOL
1446 National Bldg., Cleveland, O.

ROSES OF NEW CASTLE is a beautiful book on the culture of roses and other desirable plants; exquisitely illustrated in natural colors; offers and tells how to grow our famous plants. Write today. It's free.
HELLER BROS. CO., Box 150, New Castle, Ind.

That last-minute Christmas gift!

Maybe there's someone you've overlooked, accidentally. Send them the finest of all Christmas gifts — a year's subscription to

The American Magazine

It goes to your friends twelve times during the year, each month a kind reminder of your Christmas thought.

A beautiful Christmas card, reproduced from a painting by Herbert Paus, accompanies your gift.

Single gift subscription, $2.50. Your own subscription and one gift subscription, only $4.00.

Order today:

Address: The Crowell Publishing Company, Dept. 825, Springfield, Ohio.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

After sheathing his diamond-studded dirk and restoring the dazzling damsel to her parent, he mixed this one—

"The Sultan's Secret" COCKTAIL

TAKE one cup of Welch's Grape Juice. Six tablespoons of Martini & Rossi non alcoholic Vermouth (Italian or Extra Dry). Half a cup of water. Two tablespoons of sugar, the juice of one large orange. Dissolve the sugar in water. Cut three thin slices of the orange for the garnishing of the glasses. The rest of the orange squeeze and strain into the water and sugar. Add the Vermouth and Grape Juice. Mix it but do not shake. Put it on the ice for about one hour to get very cold. Pour out into the glasses that have been garnished with the orange slices. A cocktail of snap and enticing flavor. More Vermouth can be added according to taste.

Send for "Happy Days Recipes"
to W. A. Taylor & Co., 94 C Pine St., New York

MARTINI & ROSSI
VERMOUTH

25th Year

CHICAGO TECHNICAL COLLEGE

LEARN fundamentals of DRAFTING IN 4 MONTHS

Expert draftsmen earn $60 to $150 per week. Get into this profitable field after a Chicago Tech. fascinating short course. Couple this with practical experience and be a big-pay man. Many employment opportunities. Enter any time, days or evenings. Athletics. Also 2-yr. diploma and 3-yr. B.S. Degree Courses in Engineering, Electricity, Architecture. Write for free 84-page "Blue Book."

Chicago Technical College
Dept. A441 118 E. 26th St. Chicago

HELP WANTED

We require an ambitious person to do special advertising work right in your own locality. Pay is exceptionally large. Work is pleasant and dignified. No previous experience necessary. You simply carry out our instructions. Your full time brings you a handsome income — spare time pays you well. If you are making less than $150 a month write at once for full particulars. Costs you nothing to investigate. I will give you all the facts so you can decide for yourself.
ALBERT MILLS, Gen. Manager Employment Dept.
50 Monmouth Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Learn Music

Free—Send for This Amazing Book

It will tell you how you can quickly and easily learn to play beautifully right in your home and in your spare time.

The Open Door to Popularity

Music will open wide the doors of social success—make you the center of popularity everywhere. You will be surprised and delighted to find how easily you can learn with the famous National Academy Method. 200,000 successful students. Low cost, easy terms.

Courses in Piano, Violin, Trumpet, Voice, Banjo, Tenor Banjo, Organ, Spanish Guitar, Hawaiian Guitar, Mandolin. Write Today.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Dept. 41 702 East 41st Street, Chicago

pieces is to go out and play. Even if you can't do better than call in a few friends and have a little game of cards, it may be your moral salvation. No man dares to leave play out of his life without great moral risk. All work and no play not only makes Jack a very dull boy but it also makes him a very mean boy.

THE reason that play is such a means of moral strength and spiritual renewal is because it releases us, as nothing else does, from the high tension under which we live. One of America's great preachers said that one of the very best things we sometimes could do was "to refuse to do good." We take on so many obligations, we undertake so many duties, we get tied up with so many enterprises, and into social and moral debt to so many people, that often our only hope of spiritual balance is to throw it all up and go out and play. That is what Professor James meant when he said that we all now and then need a "moral holiday."

I knew a man who, at the age of sixty, decided that from then on he would make play the serious business of life, and make his work secondary. To his surprise, he found that after playing he came to his work with his brain and nerve centers so thoroughly rested that he got through more work than ever before.

Of course, there are times of emergency when a man can't play. And I imagine I hear some farmer say, "How are you going to run a farm, and play?" Well, I have lived on a farm, and I know what it is to work from four o'clock in the morning until it's too dark to work, and then feed the stock by lantern light. I have worked in the mines with a pick and shovel as long as the next man; I drove a team of mules and a scraper, helping Jay Gould build a part of the Santa Fé Railroad, often in mud and water up to my knees. I suppose Mr. Gould would have got the road built without me, but I did not feel that way at the time. But with all that, I have always found some time, some way, somehow to get in a little play, if it was nothing but pinochle or dominoes, because I found it rested me far more rapidly than simply resting, and enabled me to do better work.

But outdoor, athletic play is by all means the best, partly because of the sunshine and air, but chiefly because it uses the old brain paths that men used in the primitive days. For this reason, athletic play makes a man forget for a little while the strain and rack and pull and tension of the thing we call civilization. And these "moral holidays" are just as necessary to our moral salvation as the carrying out of any other solemn duty or obligation.

The fourth principle of rational living which I have found the most useful in my own life, can be either stated briefly or expanded into a volume. That principle is this:

Never cease to believe in the man you might have been.

I remember many years ago having read a little story by that prose poet, Arthur Colton, entitled, "Mr. Smedley's Guest." Mr. Smedley was a rich man whose mind was wholly absorbed in stocks and bonds. One evening, when the family and servants were gone, Mr. Smedley dozed in his chair, but was suddenly awakened by the entrance of an unbidden guest. Mr. Smedley was incensed, but the

The Atlanta Biltmore
Atlanta

The South's Supreme Hotel

A Bowman Biltmore Institution

"Where Southern Hospitality Flowers"

Guests' comfort above all else

Rates from $3.50

Golf for Biltmore guests

Jno. McEntee Bowman, Pres. Wm. Candler, Vice-Pres.
H. B. Judkins, Manager W. C. Royer, Asso. Mgr.

Give 5 Minutes a Day
Look years younger

Beauty of face is more than skin deep—it depends on keeping young and elastic the tiny muscles just beneath the skin. Lack of exercise causes them to weaken, droop, be flabby. Then one begins to "age", lose youthful expression and fresh complexion.

Kathryn Murray's Facial Exercises

Helps to build up, restore and keep you youthful. Thousands testify to merit. Simple, pleasant, 15 years of success. Selected to individual use. Results assured. Book free in plain envelope. Write today. Kathryn Murray, Suite 188, 6 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

200% PROFIT IN HOME MADE PASTRY

Start a pastry business or tea room in your own home! We teach secrets of famous pastry makers and successful tea room operators in spare time. Earn $25 to $75 weekly. FREE BOOKLET tells how! LEWIS TEA ROOM INSTITUTE, Suite AP-1487, Washington, D. C.

High School Course in 2 Years

This simplified, complete High School Course—specially prepared for home study by leading professors—meets all requirements for entrance to college, business, and leading professions.

20 Other Courses

Over 200 noted Engineers, Business Men, and Educators helped prepare the special instruction which you need for success. No matter what your inclinations may be, you can't hope to succeed without specialized training. Let us give you the practical training you need.

American School
Drexel Ave. & 58th Street
Dept. H-11, Chicago

Money Back When You Finish If Not Satisfied

American School, Dept. H-11, Drexel Ave. and 58th St., Chicago
Send me full information on the subject checked and how you will help me win success in that line.

.....Architect	.....Electrical Engineer
.....Building Contractor	.....General Education
.....Automobile Engineer	.....Lawyer
.....Civil Engineer	.....Mach. Shop Practice
.....Structural Engineer	.....Mechanical Engineer
.....Business Manager	.....Steam Engineer
.....C. P. A. & Auditor	.....Sanitary & Heating
.....Bookkeeper	.....Surveyor & Mapping
.....Draftsman & Designer	.....High School Graduate

Name.....
Address.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Business for You

Making and selling Crispettes. A business to enthuse over. Marini of Calif. reports $11275 sales in 3 months. Jacob Gordon of New Jersey "$4000 profits in 2 months." Alexander of Penna. "$3000 profits in four months." Ira Shook $365 sales in one day. Bram bought one outfit April 5 and seven more by August 28. Iwata bought one outfit and ten more within a year. Mrs. Lane of Pennsylvania says "sold 8000 packages in one day." J. R. Bert says "only thing I ever bought that equaled advertisement." John Culp says: "Everything going lovely. Crispette wrappers scattered all over town. It's good old world after all." Kellog, $700 ahead end of second week.

WE START YOU IN BUSINESS

Furnish secret formulas, raw material and equipment. Little capital required; no experience needed.

Build A Business of Your Own

No limit to the sales of Crispettes. Everybody likes them. It's a delicious food confection. Write for facts about a business that will make you independent. Start now, in your own town.

Big Money Made Monthly

Send postal for illustrated book of facts. It contains enthusiastic letters from others—shows their places of business, tells how and when to start, and all information needed. Free. Write now!

LONG-EAKINS COMPANY
113 High Street Springfield, Ohio

Beauty with economy—permanence

OAK FLOORING displays Nature's beauty in color and figure,—the proper background for rugs, in perfect harmony with furniture and woodwork. At the same time, the cost for each room need not exceed that of a good piece of furniture.

OAK makes a permanent floor, and the surface is easily kept in perfect condition, promoting health and saving housework.

Oak floors add value to property for rental or sale, at a negligible expense compared with temporary perishable floor coverings.

WRITE FOR THIS BOOKLET —containing modern color finishes with suggestions for treatment of various rooms.

OAK FLOORING BUREAU
1270 Builders' Bldg. CHICAGO

stranger was so fine and charming in his manner that Mr. Smedley immediately became delighted with him. The guest talked brilliantly and profoundly of many things of which Mr. Smedley had once dreamed. He talked of literature and art and philosophy and music, and roused all Mr. Smedley's old imaginings of the life of the mind and spirit.

The guest spoke of Mr. Smedley's famous book, which had captivated the world with its felicity and charm. At first Mr. Smedley demurred, saying he could not recall having written any book; but the guest described it in such detail that Mr. Smedley finally remembered it in full. Presently the guest seated himself at the piano and played what he said was one of Mr. Smedley's compositions. Again Mr. Smedley had difficulty in remembering the music. But as the piece proceeded it all seemed to become familiar once more in his mind. The guest also spoke of the pictures which Mr. Smedley had painted, and those too gradually came back in his memory.

As he rose to leave, Mr. Smedley expressed his delight in his enchanting company, but faltered that he had not quite understood his name, and said, "Who are you?" The guest replied, "I am the man you might have been," and vanished.

Perhaps you don't realize it, but you are always painting a picture in your imagination of your future self—the kind of person you would like to be. And, unconsciously, that picture is not so much the person you would like to be as it is chiefly the picture you would like other people to have of you. This is what Everett Dean Martin, the psychologist, has aptly called your "personality picture." The substance of Martin's idea is as follows:

The small boy has one picture of himself as a nice little boy at home, studying his lessons and minding his parents. Not that he really wants to be that way, but that is the picture of himself that he would like to have stamped on his parents' minds. Then he has another picture of himself out among the boys, a swaggering, loud-talking, tough little guy. That's the kind of picture of himself that he wants to impress on the minds of the gang. The little fellow sees no inconsistency in these two pictures. He is not a hypocrite, he merely wants to make good all around.

As the boy grows older, however, he begins to realize that he must cut out some of these "personality pictures" he conjures up to suit the different groups of people he mixes with, and choose the picture of himself that he wants to hang up before the community in general.

AND right here comes the crucial point of nearly all our moral conflicts—Which picture of yourself are you going to be true to? I do not believe that many people are deliberate and conscious hypocrites. The old deacon who is pious on Sundays and cheats his customers through the week is not so much a conscious hypocrite as that he is childish and short-sighted. He is mentally and morally right back where that little boy was whose picture of the world and life was not big enough or logical enough to see the inconsistency between the picture of himself as a good little boy at home and the other picture as a tough member of the gang.

If you want to attain a strong personality, if you want to be known as a man of character, dependability and power, you must choose out of all the selves you might be just one big, consistent personality picture—a picture that hangs together and is harmonious from day to day, year to year, in the home, in the office, or wherever you happen to be. And when you have made your choice, cling to that picture at all costs. That's the only way to build character.

You can't be everything. You have got to make up your mind to that. The fellow who tries to be everything to everybody, in the end becomes nothing to anybody. As Professor James said in another famous passage, "Not that I would not, if I could, be both handsome and fat and well dressed and a great athlete and make a million a year; be a wit, bon vivant, and a lady-killer, as well as a philosopher, philanthropist and statesman, warrior, an African explorer, as well as a tone poet and saint. But the thing is impossible. The millionaire's work would run counter to the saint's. The bon vivant and the philanthropist would trip each other up; and the philosopher and lady-killer could not keep house in the same tenement of clay."

The fifth principle of rational living we can sum up briefly. I got the idea over thirty years ago from America's greatest preacher, Phillips Brooks. It is this:

"YOU get out of life what you put into it. But you get it back many-fold." In order to illustrate this great truth, Bishop Brooks drew a picture which I can only repeat out of my boyhood memory. I want you, he said in substance, to take four men into a field and watch their conduct. The first man picks up the stones, studies the plants, the birds and butterflies, and the treasures of nature. The second man examines the soil, the drainage, the water courses, and the fertility of the land. The third man studies the cliffs, the out-croppings in the rocks, and measures the power of the waterfall. The fourth man hears only the music of the wind, the singing of the birds; he feels the magic of the sunshine and the flowers, and his heart responds in wild response to the beauty of the waterfall.

Come along by that same field at the end of another year and the first man says, "Come and see my great museum;" the second man says, "Come and see my great barns;" the third man says, "See my great mines," and the fourth man says, "Hear my wonderful poems, my beautiful piece of music."

So it is with human life. Put poetry and music and joy into life, and you will get them back a hundred-fold. Put wealth into life and, while you may not gain material riches, you will gain the greater riches of the spirit. Put poverty into life and, even if you make millions, you will die in poverty. Keep a never-ending faith, hope, and belief in the man you might have been, the personality picture of that self which you have painted in your finest, clearest moments of vision and desire, and you will reap an ever-expanding power, influence, and helpfulness in this great and ever happy work of human life.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Big Matt

(Continued from page 31)

honeymoon of his governorship; those who expected favors were not, as yet, disappointed, and those whose interests might be affected by his official acts had thus far no cause of complaint. And then he had Matt to lean upon; Matt could go into the cloak-rooms of the House or Senate and quell uprisings and rebellions, undo conspiracies, and maintain discipline in the party.

He could never be too grateful for Matt; never thank his lucky stars enough for not having yielded weakly to the temptation to secure a spectacular and barren popularity by appointing someone else. To be sure, as he filled the offices, adopting, in most cases, Matt's suggestions, there were disappointments and resentments; but Matt was not troubled by such things.

"It's all in the game," he said, reassuring Blake. "A fellow that wants an office is a temporary friend, but a fellow that's got it is a permanent one; besides, being in office, he's got something to help you with."

Matt's political axioms were a great comfort. When Nelson, secretary of the State Board of Health, in a moment of pique offered his resignation, Matt said:

"Well, let him resign!"

"But he'll get sore."

"Well, let him get sore! Haven't you ever noticed the fate of fellows that resign offices in spite? They think that when they resign the Government will bust up; but nothing ever busts, except their influence. The only stren'th they ever had came from the job; when they throw up the job they throw away their stren'th. No, let him resign, and give the place to Doc Sloane."

"Is he a good doctor?"

"I don't know; I reckon not. But he's got Jefferson County in his vest pocket; and if you ever need a physician, why, you can call in a specialist."

THERE were, however, cases with which Matt was powerless to deal. Pedley, for instance; nobody, Matt explained, could do anything with a man like Pedley. "Remember what Lincoln said about fooling all the people all of the time? Well, you can't please 'em all the time, either. You can't please fellows like this Pedley any of the time. If you'd appointed Stibbard, Pedley would be agin you by now. You got to make some enemies; only see that you make the right ones."

Matt thought that the case of Fenshard was more important. Blake, for some time, had noticed a coldness on Fenshard's part. He never came to the Governor's chambers any more, and when Blake met him in the corridors of the State House, Fenshard either pretended not to see him or gave him a cold, casual nod, and hurried by, his head bent, his brow contracted in a scowl as though he were pondering some deep problem of the law.

"I don't know what's the matter with him," said Matt.

But Blake knew.

"It's the women, Matt," said Blake frankly.

TRADE YALE MARK

will

SAFETYIZE

your home

SAFETYIZE your home. Protect the things you value. Prevent the loss of your property through force or stealth. Do it with Yale Cylinder Locks.

AYALE Cylinder Lock stands guard while you are absent—or asleep. It is a make of lock you can depend on, the kind it pays to get, Yale.

FASTENING outside and interior doors, closets, cellar doors, garage doors, is a sure way to keep out those who should be kept out, if you do it with Yale Cylinder Locks.

EVERY Yale Lock or other Yale product comes to you unmistakably marked Yale—an outstanding assurance of merit.

TO LIVE in a Yale-equipped home is to avail yourself of the fullest possible measure of security and protection.

YOU CAN see and examine Yale products at almost any hardware dealer's near you. Most of them carry the full Yale line, from which you can choose the style and quality you require.

IF THE dealer you visit lacks any Yale product in which you are interested, he can get it for you promptly.

ZEALOUSLY guarding millions of homes, garages, stores, offices, factories, Yale products are given preference the world over.

EVERYONE knows the name Yale—there is only one maker of Yale Locks and Keys. The mark Yale means the name of the maker.

The Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co.

Stamford, Conn., U. S. A.

Canadian Branch at St. Catharines, Ont.

YALE

YALE MARKED IS YALE MADE

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"There's the new Ned Tyson"

He's making big money now

"I USED to know him when I was a kid—we went to grammar school together.

"Then his father died and he had to go to work. Got a job with Brooks & Watson as a clerk, but couldn't seem to get ahead.

"Then overnight something seemed to wake him up. He began making suggestions to the firm—helped them to save a great deal of money.

"Then Old Man Brooks became interested—wanted to know how Ned happened to know so much about the business. Ned told him he'd been studying at home at nights through the International Correspondence Schools. 'H'm,' said Mr. Brooks, 'I'll remember that.'

"He did too. Put Ned out on the road as a salesman for a year or so and then brought him into the main office as sales manager.

"He's getting $6500 a year now and everybody calls him 'the new Ned Tyson.' I've never seen such a change in a man in my life. The I. C. S. deserves a lot of credit."

An International Correspondence Schools course will help you just as it helped Ned Tyson. It will help you to have the happy home—the bigger salary—the comforts you'd like to have. Start today to make good. At least find out what this great school can do for you.

Mail the Coupon for Free Booklet

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
"The Universal University"
Box 7483-E, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation, please send me a copy of your booklet, "Who Wins and Why," and full particulars about the course before which I have marked X:

BUSINESS TRAINING COURSES

☐ Business Management
☐ Industrial Management
☐ Personnel Organization
☐ Traffic Management
☐ Business Law
☐ Banking and Finance Management
☐ Accountancy (including C.P.A.)
☐ Cost Accounting
☐ Bookkeeping
☐ Private Secretary
☐ Spanish ☐ French
☐ Salesmanship
☐ Advertising
☐ Better Letters
☐ Show Card Lettering
☐ Stenography and Typing
☐ English
☐ Civil Service
☐ Railway Mail Clerk
☐ Common School Subjects
☐ High School Subjects
☐ Illustrating ☐ Cartooning

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL COURSES

☐ Electrical Engineer
☐ Electric Lighting
☐ Mechanical Engineer
☐ Mechanical Draftsman
☐ Machine Shop Practice
☐ Railroad Positions
☐ Gas Engine Operating
☐ Civil Engineer
☐ Surveying and Mapping
☐ Metallurgy ☐ Mining
☐ Steam Engineering ☐ Radio
☐ Architect
☐ Architects' Blueprints
☐ Contractor and Builder
☐ Architectural Draftsman
☐ Concrete Builder
☐ Structural Engineer
☐ Chemistry ☐ Pharmacy
☐ Automobile Work
☐ Airplane Engines
☐ Agriculture and Poultry
☐ Mathematics

Name.....

Street Address.....

City.....State.....

Occupation.....

If you reside in Canada, send this coupon to the International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Limited, Montreal

Scientific Facts About Diet

A CONDENSED book on diet entitled "Eating for Health and Efficiency" has been published for free distribution by the Health Extension Bureau of Battle Creek, Mich. Contains set of health rules, many of which may be easily followed right at home or while traveling. You will find in this book a wealth of information about food elements and their relation to physical welfare.

This book is for those who wish to keep physically fit and maintain normal weight. Not intended as a guide for chronic invalids as all such cases require the care of a competent physician. Name and address on card will bring it without cost or obligation.

HEALTH EXTENSION BUREAU
SUITE H-218 GOOD HEALTH BLDG.
BATTLE CREEK, MICHIGAN

Matt, for an instant, looked puzzled.

"The women?"

Blake nodded soberly. "Our wives," he said, by way of identification. It seemed somehow indelicate to speak of it; but he wished Matt to know.

"Your wives—Mrs. Blake and Grant's wife?"

"You see, ah, Mrs. Blake"—the Governor had the old-fashioned habit of referring to his wife in this formal way—"didn't invite Mrs. Fenshard to receive with her at her first reception; and Mrs. F. got her back up. You don't know, Matt, what a lot of rows there are among the wives of the state officials. Why, they tell me that it's as bad as at Washington."

Matt made the brass spittoon ring loudly, then closed his wide, thin lips firmly, clapped his hands on his knees and held them there in a kind of impotent despair.

"I'M AFRAID, John," he said, finally, "that I can't help you much there. When it comes to the women—well, it gets my goat. Grant's a fool to take it up. But I'm afraid you'll have him on your hands."

Matt shook his head hopelessly, thought a while, and then presently leant forward and, fixing Blake with a gaze of intense conviction and seriousness, said:

"John, I tell you the government of the fathers will never endure as a democracy if the women ever get to running it."

Blake, however, was not just then so much concerned about the stability of the Republic as he was about the allegiance of Fenshard. As the session of the Legislature wore on, Fenshard, he perceived, was placing himself at the head of an insurgent movement, the inevitable tendency of the "purer" toward the left wing, a phenomenon incident to all political movements since the cave of Adullam.

Blake had no control over Fenshard, for the attorney general was elected by the people; he might have threatened to defeat Fenshard for renomination, but Fenshard was only at the beginning of his term of office and it was too early for that menace to bring Fenshard back into line.

And Blake saw his administration pass into the second phase, that of weakness and vague unpopularity.

And then, suddenly, from a quarter whence it never had come before, a new trouble appeared. One day, late in June, just before the Legislature adjourned, Laurence Price asked Blake to receive him, not in his chambers at the State House, where Price would have taken any official business, but at the Executive Mansion. He came at the close of a rainy day, and as Price entered the library Blake knew at once, by a certain hesitancy and shyness in Price's manner, that he had come to ask for Joyce's hand.

As Price made his proposal, Blake looked out of the open window onto the drenched lawn, its grass blue-green in the falling light; a robin was hopping across it, and at the bottom of the lawn along the boulevards the motors were rolling homeward with the close of day. A sense of loneliness settled over Blake's spirits. Lose Joyce? What should he do without her? She was all he had, the one lovely and untarnished influence in his life! And now, to give her up to Price!

And yet, there could be no possible objection to Price; even if there were, it would make no difference. Price's coming here and asking for his daughter's hand was nothing more than an empty formality, almost meaningless in these days of emancipation.

"Well, I suppose," Blake found himself stammering, "if Joyce wants it—and her mother consents."

Price smiled, rather too complacently, Blake thought, and after he had expressed his thanks, tried for a moment to speak of political affairs. But Blake wasn't interested.

"I guess you will want to see Joyce now," he said, and got up, left the library and began wearily to climb the stairs to his room.

And in the hall up-stairs he met Joyce, lovelier than ever in the blush that swept over her cheeks, gentler than ever in the pity that suddenly welled into her gray eyes at sight of her father. Words were hardly necessary between them.

"Don't, dear," was all she said, as she buried her face on his shoulder. But the tears streamed down his face as he stood there, his arms about her, awkwardly patting her shoulder.

"He's waiting for you down there," he said, "in the library."

And Joyce ran, somewhat too swiftly and eagerly, down the stairs.

IT WAS not until late in the autumn of that year that the first breath of those rumors that for weeks had been whispered in the dim corridors of the State House reached Blake's ear, and then only when he was two hundred miles from home. He had gone to the city to be the guest of the Chamber of Commerce at its annual banquet.

It had been a kind of holiday for him. Grace and Joyce and Price had gone with him, and the journey had been like a royal progress. People had come into the "parlor car" to see him, to shake his hand; perhaps more to see Joyce and her fiancé, in that romantic interest which people take in a young couple who are going to be married.

Now and then, as the train stopped at stations, small groups of curious folk would assemble, and Blake would go out on the rear platform and smile, and bow, and lean over the brass railing and shake hands with the crowd, and now and then, if the train stopped long enough, make a little speech.

Then the excitement of pulling into the long station; the noise, the clangor, the smoke, the sharp irritating smell of sulphur; the mayor, the committee, on the platform to meet him; the negro porters in red caps, grinning, seizing his luggage; the reporters; the agile photographers springing about, snapping their cameras; the movie-men, cranking their machines at him; the pleasurable sensation of being swept along on a tide of popularity, of having everything done for him; the consciousness that everyone in the restless crowds, as the word went round that the Governor was there, turned to look at him.

Then the motors, and the burly traffic policemen on motor-cycles to clear the way; and then the hotel, and the vast and sumptuous suite placed at his disposal; the enormous bouquets for his wife and Joyce; the smiles, the attention; the reporters to receive his statements.

And then, after he had shaved himself

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

for the second time that day, in the white porcelain bathroom, and Joyce had tied his white tie—she was still there to do that for him—the great banquet hall, the cocktails, in the cozy, crowded ante-room, with the chief of police himself there to protect them, and the noisy excitement, and five hundred men in evening dress standing up to acclaim him at the toast of "His Excellency, the Governor," while he sat there, nervously awaiting the moment when he must rise and speak; they all sang "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow." . . .

THEY were all on their feet again as he came to the last words of his speech, cheering wildly, again and again. He sat down and had to rise and bow again, to acknowledge their applause. He was warm, perspiring, happy; he had an exquisite sense of relief in the fact that it was over, in the consciousness that he had done well, that he had made a hit, that he was honored, admired, loved.

But he must appear to be modest, simple, and, above all, democratic, hail-fellow-well-met with them. And he mustn't let this extraordinary popularity go to his head. He took a sip of mineral water, then lighted a cigar, and settled back in his chair to listen to the other speeches.

The man sitting next to him was Bernard, the owner of "The Herald" and of "The News-Herald" newspapers. Blake knew him only slightly, but during the dinner, feeling that it was a favorable opportunity to make an impression on a man of Bernard's importance, Blake had been attentive to him, and in that friendly atmosphere they had come, on short notice, to rather cordial terms.

After the Governor had spoken, and whilst he was sitting there, smiling and listening, or seeming to listen, to the speakers who followed him, Bernard continued to talk to him, and presently Blake heard Bernard whisper:

"I've already done you one favor, Governor."

"Yes? What's that?"

"I gave orders that nothing was to be said in my papers about Matt Holt. I don't think there's anything in the story myself."

"What story's that?" Blake inquired.

He felt Bernard's large black eyes suddenly fastened upon him.

"You don't mean to say, Governor, that you haven't heard?"

The tone in which Bernard spoke struck Blake suddenly cold with apprehension.

"I don't know what you mean," said Blake. "Heard what?"

Bernard hesitated, and Blake, in a sudden agony of fear, paying no more attention to the facetiæ of the speaker at that moment addressing the diners, turned suddenly on Bernard and said, directly:

"What do you mean, man?"

Bernard blushed in confusion, but went on: "Haven't you heard? Graft in the Board of Public Utilities—the probe."

"The probe?" Blake's heart almost stood still at the word to which the writers of headlines in the newspapers had given such an ugly and sinister connotation.

"You don't mean to say, Governor, that you haven't heard that Hugh Garrett got to Matt Holt—I don't know how much, the stories differ; but that he fixed him on this traction company proposition, and that Pedley's going to introduce a resolu-

© 1927, U. S. C. & F. Co.

MEET the emergency
BEFORE it meets
YOU

Always carry in your car a set of

McK

McKAY TIRE CHAINS

McKAY RED BEAD BUMPERS

Here's another way to meet the emergency—with sturdy, shock resisting McKay Red Bead Bumpers. Besides safety, they will "add good looks and protect good looks." There's a McKay Bumper for every type of car.

McKAY SPRING CONTROLLERS

Put an end to bumping and jumping with McKay Spring Controllers. Simple and easy to install, yet inexpensive, McKays do the work. For Fords, $5.00. For other cars, $6.50 and $8.00. Prices higher west of Rockies.

National Automobile Shows—1928, New York City, January 7th-14th, Spaces C-79-80-81
Chicago, Ill., January 28th-Feb. 4th, Spaces 120-121

U.S. CHAIN & FORGING CO.

UNITED STATES CHAIN & FORGING COMPANY

UNION TRUST BUILDING PITTSBURGH, PA.

Manufacturers of
INDUSTRIAL AND COMMERCIAL CHAINS FOR EVERY PURPOSE

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Learn at Home

Easily—Quickly

THE tremendously increased interest in Interior Decorating has created hundreds of very unusual opportunities for ambitious men and women. It's easy now to establish a business of your own in full or spare time—to qualify for a high-salaried, attractive position—or to mould for yourself an interesting, remunerative and highly respected Career.

$50 to $200 a Week—New Uncrowded Profession

Take advantage of the wonderful opportunities resulting from the pressing demand existing right now for trained Interior Decorators. Get into business for yourself, or earn $50 to $200 a week in work that is fascinatingly pleasant. Either full or spare time. Scores of properly trained Interior Decorators are urgently needed right now—by home builders, large Interior Decorating firms, Department Stores and a great variety of stores selling household furnishings.

And now Interior Decorating can be learned easily—at home in your spare time. Prominent New York Decorators give your work personal attention throughout your course. No preliminary training is necessary—no special talent. It is astonishingly easy to learn Interior Decorating under this remarkable home-study method.

Scores of Letters Tell How Graduates Succeed

Beautifies Own Home

"Your course is a godsend to the home-lover. I have saved money and at the same time given my home a charm and individuality hitherto lacking."
A. V. A., Jamestown, Kan.

Doubles Salary

"My dream of becoming an Interior Decorator has materialized through the aid of the National School of Interior Decoration. I am designer and drapery buyer for one of the largest department stores in this city with a salary much more than doubled." B. C. L., Ashland, Ky.

Send for FREE BOOK on Interior Decorating

It is most emphatically worth while getting full details of this wonderful, new, attractive big-pay profession. A new, up-to-date booklet has just been prepared which explains the splendid opportunities in Interior Decorating as well as this easy new home-study plan. Also tells about special offer to new students. It is FREE—not the slightest obligation. Send for it—now. National School of Interior Decoration, Dept. 351, 119 W. 57th St., New York City.

National School of Interior Decoration, Dept. 351, 119 W. 57th Street, New York City

You may send me FREE and without obligation a copy of the new book "Interior Decorating for Profit," which fully explains the wonderful opportunities in the field of Interior Decoration, your Home-Study Course and Offer to new students.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

tion first thing the Legislature meets, appointing a committee to conduct an inquiry, and calling on the attorney general to act as a kind of prosecutor?"

Blake looked at Bernard an instant, and then smiled.

"Oh that!" he said. "I didn't suppose anyone took that seriously."

He looked down at the reporters bent over their copy below the speakers' table. He looked out over the great banquet hall, at those hundreds of men in dinner jackets, sinking rather wearily now into their chairs, their shirt bosoms rumpled, a panoply of cigar smoke undulating over their heads; his eyes met others looking out of a red face, which smiled at him; another man, sitting near the red face, holding a cigar as large as a torpedo in his mouth, thrust out his hands, and clasped them, noiselessly, applauding the Governor. . . .

A scandal in his Board of Public Utilities! A probe! Matt! My God! . . . He might have known it. . . . He did know it. . . . If! Oh, if! If only he hadn't had that past, and all its associations—Matt and the rest—what a governor he should have been! These plaudits, this popularity, would have been deserved. But now! . . . Matt had been bribed! Of course! And now there would be a frightful scandal! . . . Ah, if only—and yet, if it hadn't been for that very past and those same associations, Matt and the rest, he never could have been governor at all. . . .

ALL that night as he turned and tossed on his bed in the hotel his mind, tortured by a thousand fears, would come back to Matt Holt. That Matt, after all that he had done for him, after the confidence that he had reposed in him, after he had stood by him in the face of all the opposition, braving criticism and abuse for the sake of their old friendship, should have done this thing, brought down scandal and ruin upon him—this was too much.

When he got back to the capital, he would send straightway for Matt and have it out with him, for good and all; and what he would say to Matt! But, deep in the night, something—a kind of fluttering hope—a voice—whispered to him that it might not be true; there was, of course, always that hypothesis.

After all, Matt was no fool; he might be crooked in politics of course, but still he knew what such things meant; he wouldn't take such risks. Blake listened to this soothing and reassuring voice. It couldn't be true; if it were, he should have heard of it long ago. Those super-serviceable friends who were always running to him to repeat things they had heard about him would surely not have overlooked so choice a morsel of scandal as that!

And on this comforting reassurance he would turn over and try to go to sleep; then he would think of Matt again. Matt and Hugh Garrett were together a good deal; they played poker night after night at the Stanley. (They had played once or twice, as a matter of fact, at the Executive Mansion; but nobody knew about that.)

His heart sank down, down, down, to the blackest depths of despair. No use trying to fool himself! The story had the very ring of truth! The fact was that Matt was a crooked politician, as crooked as a rail fence. Everybody knew it; he, John Wesley Blake, knew it.

What had they not done, he and Matt together, in those twenty-five years in Allen County, in the senatorial district, in the congressional district, in the legislature, and in the state? What piece of chicanery, what trick known to politicians had Matt not practiced during all those years? And by what one of them had not he, Blake, profited?

HOW happened it that he was Governor? Not because of those anonymous and applauding thousands who had voted for and acclaimed him—as those men at the banquet had applauded him that evening (the sweet and rapturous sound of it still ringing and echoing in his brain!), no, not that; but that long series of tricks, deals, bargains—that was what had made him Governor, or made it possible for him to be Governor. He couldn't come the moral superior over Matt!

And just now, on the eve of Joyce's wedding! If the thing were to come out now and throw the black, ugly shadow of a scandal over that event, it would break Joyce's heart—and his!

They were stopping over in the city for two days, precisely on Joyce's account; she wished to do some shopping for her wedding. To Blake's delight, or what would have been his delight had it not been for that worry incessantly and remorselessly gnawing at him, Joyce sent Price off with her mother, and said that only her father should go with her.

And together, through the crowded streets, they went from shop to shop. Joyce's happiness shone in her clear gray eyes, glowed in her cheeks, and was radiant all about her like an aura. Blake was immensely proud of her; everywhere they went people recognized them, and turned to gaze at Joyce in admiration, because she was so pretty, because she was the Governor's daughter, and because of her romance.

He tried to forget, if only for that day, but he couldn't; to-morrow he should have to go back and face this thing—and face Matt.

He thought that Matt looked rather queer that morning when he came into his office; on entering, Matt glanced at him with a curiously suspicious and searching eye—to see if he knew. And he was wondering how he should broach to Matt the painful and desperate subject.

But Matt spoke first. "Have a good time?" he inquired, and before Blake need answer, he went on: "I see in the papers where you made a great hit at the banquet."

Matt turned and spat into the brass spittoon. And Blake thought of that evening at the banquet—a good time indeed! Just then he hated Matt.

"Matt," he began, though not in hatred but in an overwhelming pity for himself.

"What you got on your mind this morning?" asked Matt lightly.

"Matt," the Governor went on, "that evening was the most wretched of my life."

"How's that?"

"You know Bernard?"

"Ikey?"

"Yes. Well, he sat next to me, and during the banquet we talked a lot, and he said something that floored me; he might

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

as well have exploded a bomb in my plate."

"What was that?"

"He said that the story was going 'round that you and Hugh Garrett had . . . made a deal, of some kind, and that Pedley and Fenshard were going to call for a committee of investigation in the Senate."

Blake, as he said this, watched Matt's face closely, and he had never seen it more calm or inscrutable at the poker table. It was lifted there before him, in the clear, searching light of that autumn morning, a large, oval blank.

The reddish cheeks closely shaven, their skin firm and tough; the stiff, broad upper lip without a twitch or tremor; the heavy nostrils of the great beak of a nose playing in his breathing, the blue eyes under their sandy brows only imperceptibly winking; that large face, void of all expression, of all emotion or feeling, lifted itself to Blake in bland, dispassionate unconcern.

Blake looked at Matt; Matt looked at him. And presently Matt said, quite casually, as though waiting for Blake to go on:

"Well?"

"Well," said Blake, "that's all. Isn't that enough?"

"Do you mean to say, John, that you hadn't heard that story?"

"No," Blake admitted, with a slight feeling of sheepishness, as one who suddenly discovers that he is not in the know. "I hadn't heard it."

"Oh, it's been going 'round for some little time."

Matt said no more; but waited. And Blake wondered what he should say next, and felt uncomfortable and under a kind of constraint.

"Joyce have a nice time?" asked Matt, having allowed a polite interval to follow this last remark. "Do her shopping?"

"Yes."

"When's the wedding to be?"

"In December."

THEY talked a while about everything except that which was uppermost in Blake's mind and, for aught he knew, in Matt's mind, though he couldn't tell what was in Matt's mind, and then, as Matt got up to go, Blake rose and followed him to the door in a sudden agony of fear, of concern, and in a great longing for help and reassurance.

"Matt," he said, "do you think that Pedley and Fenshard contemplate any such thing?"

"How should I know?" Matt answered, in what seemed a brutal unconcern.

"But if they do, what then?"

"What then? Why, you'll have to meet 'em and fight 'em, that's all."

"Me!" exclaimed Blake. "Me! And what have I got to do with it?"

Matt began to speak out of the side of his mouth.

"Why, don't you know, John, it's you they're after, not me?"

"Me!" Blake's heart seemed to him to have stopped; inside his breast he felt a sudden contraction of fear. A queer little wave of sensation spread upward from the back of his neck and over his scalp. Then his heart began thumping again, so heavily that it seemed likely to rack his ribs loose.

"What's the matter with you?" Matt exclaimed. "You aren't 'fraid of the cars, are you?"

"Here's a Happy New Year!" says Dollar Bill

A happy 1928 for you and your friends too. I can make it the happiest ever by bringing you and your friends eight big new novels by Dorothy Canfield, Alice Duer Miller, Du Bose Heyward and others just as eminent—in twelve sparkling issues of

Woman's Home Companion

And also scores of brilliant short stories by the best modern authors, beautiful illustrations in colors and gravure, smart fashions and patterns, travel charts, cooking recipes, dressmaking hints, and everything else a modern woman will want in 1928—all for only one Dollar Bill a year.

The finest Christmas Present for Yourself and your Friends

Let Dollar Bill solve the problem of your last-minute Christmas gifts. To announce each one we shall send a beautiful Christmas card painted by Herbert Paus, reproduced in nine colors, and bearing your name. If you send more than one, write them on a separate list, attach to this coupon and mail it out today. Each subscription only $1.00 a year.

The Crowell Publishing Company Springfield, Ohio

Gentlemen:

Enclosed find $1.00. Send Woman's Home Companion for one year with the Christmas Card announcement, to

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

My Name..... My Address.....

City..... State.....

826

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

There was, he felt, in Matt's tone, an expression, however slight, of impatience and disgust with what, to Matt, seemed to be his weakness; the old affection on which for so many years he had counted seemed to be no longer there; there was, he thought, a sneer, a hard and cynical smile on Matt's coarse, heavy face. How ugly Matt was! He had no ideals, no love of the people. Matt had not only got him into this trouble, but now he had abandoned him.

And if Matt was ready to desert him, why, two could play at that game! And so, with a significance that he trusted was not lost on Matt, he answered:

"No, Matt; they've got nothing on me!"

"Of course not; that's why they go after me; they know that what affects me affects you."

To be sure! He had appointed Matt; he was responsible for him, and for what he did; their association was of too long standing and too intimate for them to be separated, in the public mind at any rate.

"BUT, Matt," Blake finally yielded to the temptation to say, "isn't there anything that you can do to stop this thing?"

"Stop it?" said Matt. "Can I stop this fellow Pedley? Can you, or can anybody? You know how those lily-white reformers are. But, look here, John," it was something of the old Matt that spoke now, "you aren't looking very well. I'll step in and tell Doc Sloane to come up and look you over, and give you something. Personally, I don't think anything will come of it; I don't think Pedley's got the votes. Anyhow, wait till they start before you begin worrying."

And Matt went away, leaving him more troubled than before, and a moment later, Blake heard him laughing and joking with the reporters in the ante-room—the reporters whom he dreaded now to see, lest, as the visible reminders of that amorphous and anonymous public they seemed to embody and represent, he see in their eyes the first triumphant gleam of that happy recognition which would greet the scandal when it broke upon him.

Half an hour later, Doctor Sloane, the secretary of the State Board of Health, appeared in the doorway.

"Matt said I was to come and look you over, Governor," he said, as he entered the room.

"But I'm all right, Doc," protested Blake. What did Matt want to send Sloane up for? Matt himself had said that Sloane was no good as a doctor. Besides, he was afraid to consult doctors, unless he was sure there was nothing the matter with him, and, even then, you never could tell. For instance, those queer feelings inside him; maybe it was his stomach; but it might be his heart. Suppose that Sloane should discover some organic trouble?

"Well, it'll do no harm to look you over. Come here to the light."

The Governor obeyed, and stood in the light of the northern window.

Sloane took him by the wrist, drew out his watch, and counted his pulse.

"H'm!" said Sloane, when he had finished, snapping his watch and putting it back in his pocket. "Let's have a look at your tongue."

Blake thrust out his tongue, and stood there in the window, trusting that the people in High Street couldn't see him.

"Sit down," said Sloane, and Blake returned to his chair, whilst Sloane sat down beside him and began to ask him questions about the functions of his body, and Blake grew more and more depressed and apprehensive. Perhaps, after all . . .

"Well, sir," said Sloane, finally, "you're sound as a dollar!"

Sloane leant back in his chair and smiled complacently. And Blake had a delicious sense of relief, so intense that he felt that he should be frank with the excellent Sloane.

"I've had a queer feeling here, Doc, for some time," he said, laying his hand on the pit of his stomach, and perhaps, in order to be more precise, slightly over his heart.

But Sloane impatiently shook his head.

"Nothing at all, Governor. A little touch of indigestion, that's all. Too many banquets!" Sloane smiled humorously.

"You're a little run down, a little tired, because you overdo. Oh, I know how hard it is, and what a governor has to go through; it's one of the penalties of greatness. I'm not going to give you any medicine; I want you to eat good, plain food, and not smoke too much. And I want you to take some exercise; if it wasn't winter I'd make you play golf.

"And now, listen, for this is the most important part of my prescription: I don't want you to worry; just cut that out," and Sloane made a sweeping and definitive gesture to show how worry should be cut out. "Just take it easy; and when your term rolls 'round, we'll renominate and reëlect you by a bigger majority than ever."

"Oh, thanks, Doc," exclaimed Blake. "I don't want any more of politics. I've had enough; why, I dream of the day when I can retire and go back to my little old law office in Centreville."

But Sloane laughed at such an absurd idea. "The people won't let you, Governor; they just won't let you."

Doc Sloane was so comforting and reassuring that Blake had half a notion to ask him about the report that was the cause of his immediate worry, but he wouldn't; he feared somehow to compromise the agreeable sensation of relief that he just then felt; he wished to enjoy it before it, too, like everything else, turned out to be an illusion.

IF THERE were only someone to whom he could talk about it! Joyce was happy in preparing for her wedding, all aglow with young life and ardor, dashing about in a joyous excitement, innocent and unsuspecting; he mustn't cast a cloud over this happiest time of her life. There was nothing for it but to wait, as Matt had said; wait and hope that, at least, the blow would not fall until after Joyce's wedding.

Mrs. Blake wished to have the wedding in the Episcopal church, but Blake wouldn't hear of it. It was one of the occasions when he put his foot down.

"No, sir!" he declared, firmly. "We're Methodists! It'll be in the Methodist church!"

"But you've never gone to church since I've known you," said Mrs. Blake. "And, besides, all of Laurence's family and friends are Episcopalians."

"No matter," said Blake. "We're Methodists, I tell you, and it'll be in the Methodist church."

However, if Mrs. Blake could not have her way in this, she had it in all other respects. It was the largest and the smartest wedding the capital had known in years; the newspapers were full of it, and profuse in photographic illustrations; the romance of the Governor's daughter had struck the imagination, and Blake felt that it increased his popularity.

Indeed, he almost forgot his concern; and when he did think of it, such a thing, in a world of such happy excitement as that in which they moved until the moment when, amidst showers of rice, Joyce and Laurence boarded the Limited for the South, seemed remote and improbable.

AND then, the very next day, the scandal broke. Senator Pedley introduced a resolution calling for a committee to investigate the office of the Commissioner of Public Utilities. The news of it flew at once from the Senate chamber to the Governor's chambers, and when, a moment later, Squire appeared in the doorway, Blake, looking up from his desk and catching the expression in Squire's face, knew, without a word, what Squire had come to report.

After the instant of shock and surprise, Blake felt a kind of relief; the suspense and anxiety of the long wait were over, and this, after all, at first, was better than the agonizing fear and uncertainty; now he would be able to take action.

But what action? He hadn't the slightest idea. He sat at his desk, gazing out of the great windows into the State House grounds, across the lawn, blighted by the winter frost, down to High Street, and at those crowds that moved along there, flitting past the great iron palisades like figures in a cinema.

He had been watching those crowds for more than a year, as they streamed along High Street; they had come to stand in his imagination for that huge, amorphous thing called "the people," in whose name politicians prophesied; while always cajoling and flattering it, fawning upon it, trembling before it in terror, living in fear of it as of some terrible monster.

Sometimes Blake thought of it as a kind and loving friend, especially fond of him; again it seemed to him a cruel and savage beast ready to maul him. By long experience in politics he had developed a peculiar sense, so that, by a kind of prescience he could tell just what mood it was in. He knew, so he reflected bitterly, what its mood would be as soon as the extra editions of the newspapers were out, as they would be in a few moments.

Yes, there they were now; he could see the news "boys," athletic young giants, bearing enormous packs of papers; he could hear the booming of their voices, as in triumph they bellowed the bad news that was always good news to newspapers. Instantly, as the extra editions were eagerly bought, the crowd seemed to break out into a flutter of white wings, like a flock of pigeons suddenly disturbed.

Two of the news "boys" were already hurrying up the wide stone walk to the Capitol, and as they came nearer he could distinguish their words as they shouted in heavy, threatening accents, scanning the line as though it were tragic verse:

"Extry! Extry! All about the big State scandal!"

The horrid sound made him ill; he

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

2 Selling Jobs

That illustrate how your firm's national advertising can be used to win orders and build business

Mr. O. A. Madsen has been with E. R. Squibb & Sons for about four years and represents the Company in the southern half of Minnesota and western Wisconsin. In addition to being a salesman he is also a registered pharmacist, having graduated from the Minnesota Institute of Pharmacy

E. R. SQUIBB & SONS have always believed in educating their salesmen on the value of the Company's national advertising. When a Squibb salesman talks to a prospect, he can prove how Squibb advertising creates local demand.

He is able to show, for example, how every Squibb advertisement in The American Magazine lives for 30 days in the home—how many local homes it reaches—how it is read by all members of the family—and what all this means to the dealer. The American Magazine's "Vest Pocket Sales Maker" helps him prove these points.

The letter below, typical of many received from Squibb men, will interest every salesman carrying a nationally advertised line. It shows one way the advertising argument was used to crash a hard prospect.

Mr. John H. Ballard has been with the Bulova Watch Company for 18 years. Every two years he makes a complete circle of the country, from New York to San Francisco. He is therefore one of the best known, as well as one of the most successful jewelry salesmen calling on the trade

How advertising helped me build a new account

By O. A. Madsen, E. R. Squibb & Sons

BY PREVIOUS knowledge I knew the customer upon whom I was calling was a banker as well as a druggist, also that at one time he had intended to sell his store.

After his abrupt, "No, I don't need anything," I asked him to spare me a few moments, to which he consented.

First, I took him through our advertising portfolio, showing him the number of magazines and newspapers carrying our advertisements into his city, and pointing out the advantages of featuring nationally advertised merchandise.

Then I compared his store with his bank this way—advertised merchandise has a definite set value, and you can class it as good assets, whereas unadvertised merchandise is a frozen asset because it represents no set value.

"Suppose you were considering selling your store," I continued, "the purchaser undoubtedly would say, 'You have a certain percentage of standard and advertised merchandise which will be taken at full value, and some unadvertised goods, classed as dead merchandise, which will perhaps be taken at only fifty cents on the dollar.'

"Your bank will not loan money on questionable collateral, so, why should you in the drug store buy questionable merchandise?"

After but a moment's hesitation he said, "How much do I have to buy?" I explained our proposition to him and wrote his order.

And here is another interesting personal experience from a salesman in the jewelry line who also uses his firm's American Magazine advertising as a sales builder.

"He saw the point—and placed a large order"

By John Ballard, Bulova Watch Company

Here is an experience I had in Chicago with a jeweler who operates a chain of 18 stores in the smaller cities of that territory.

Most retail jewelers do only about 5 per cent of their total business in July, although for strap watches July should be as good a month as December.

Knowing this, my company decided to make a strong national advertising effort in July to help build up the business of our retail accounts in their dull season. Among other things, we bought the back cover of The American Magazine.

I called on this Chicago dealer and showed him what we were doing—how we had secured the dominant advertising position in the July American Magazine, and what that meant to him locally.

Then I pointed out that strap watches offered him a big opportunity to increase his July business if he tied up with our advertising.

He saw the point right away and placed a large order for strap watches.

The Vest Pocket Sales Maker will help You get over these facts about your firm's advertising. Send for it

Please give your firm's name. Address Crowell Publishing Company, 250 Park Avenue, New York

1. The American Magazine's circulation of 2,200,000 at 25 cents a copy insures strong local coverage in every dealer's town.
2. Every issue of The American Magazine, containing your firm's advertisement, is alive for 30 days in 2,200,000 homes.
3. The American Magazine is read by all members of the family who influence sales—fathers, mothers and young people.
4. Editorially The American Magazine influences these 2,200,000 families to do more, have more, want more—and therefore buy more.

The American Magazine

THE CROWELL PUBLISHING COMPANY, NEW YORK

THE GREATEST SINGLE FORCE IN AMERICA FOR INCREASING MERCHANDISE CONSUMPTION

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

loathed those hulking and impudent venders of papers, gloating over his trouble and pain; he hated the editors of those papers; and he hated the reporters who would be coming down upon him now in another minute. He thought of Matt; and hated him.

And then he thought of Joyce; somewhere down in Florida Price would get off the train, buy a newspaper, and take it into the Pullman, and Joyce would come suddenly upon those ugly and portentous words.

The reporters were waiting, as he knew they would be.

"Any statement to give out, Governor?"

"Anything to say?"

"Do you propose to take any action?"

"Will you ask to be allowed to testify before the committee?"

"Have you had any conference with Commissioner Holt?"

"Is it true that you have called for the Commissioner's resignation?"

They fired the questions at him in a broadside, each one stinging him with its subtle innuendo. But he knew the power of the irresponsible and anonymous pencils poised in those itching fingers, and controlling himself he said:

"I have given the matter no consideration whatever, and I have no statement to make."

This brought forth another volley of questions.

He forced a smile, shook his head, and said:

"It's no use, boys, I'm not going to say anything now. When the time comes I shall have plenty to say."

But this last remark proved to be only one more welcome excuse for other questions:

"Do you mean that you will have startling disclosures to make concerning the men who are back of the probe?"

"Do you care to mention any names now?"

"Do you expect that the probe will develop wide ramifications and lead to important people higher up?"

And then he lost his temper, and, breaking through the cordon of journalists, said, angrily:

"I don't know anything about it; I'm going home to lunch."

HE SPENT the afternoon in conference with Lewis, the Lieutenant Governor, with Harnley, the party leader in the Senate, and with Griggs, the party leader in the House.

"The resolution went to the committee," said the Lieutenant Governor. "We can only wait until it is reported out."

"Wait!" thought Blake. Waiting just then was the most terrible of mortal agonies, and as, during those unavailing discussions and futile speculations, he realized that this trouble was not to be conjured in a day, but that he should have to be on the rack of suspense for weeks, he wondered how he was ever going to endure it.

But he must hide his fears, his anxiety, from these men; he must appear calm, collected, play the man, act the part of the leader.

How well, he wondered, was he succeeding? Was he impressing them? Those interminable speculations, those multiple hypotheses, those complicated calculations of votes, and all that!

After all, that wasn't the point; there was one subject that no one had broached, one question in the minds of all that no one had dared to ask; it seemed to be taking form, to be gathering like electricity in the heavy atmosphere of the deepening twilight in that room. It must explode before long. . . . When it was dark enough, Blake heard Griggs's voice, rather timidly saying:

"I wonder if they've really got anything on Matt?"

And then silence, heavy with a devastating suspicion; it weighed on them intolerably. Harnley, to the general relief, said:

"Oh, Matt's too smart for that."

Yes, Blake thought, Matt's too smart for that; the only resource he had now lay in Matt's smartness. But Matt hadn't come to see him; he wondered why; was his absence a sign—?

THEY could come to no conclusions. His counselors left and he was alone. Squire brought in the afternoon papers. Blake glanced at the headlines. "State Probe." "Governor in a Rage." He laid the papers down and read no further. What was the use?

At home Grace met him with a look of consternation.

"What's all this in the papers?" she demanded. "I was never so mortified in my life! If you could have seen how all those women at the Contemporary looked at me this afternoon!"

She waited a moment for him to express some opinion, some sympathy with what she had had to endure that afternoon.

"What do you propose to do about it?" she demanded.

"Do?" he shouted. "What can I do?"

"Well, I bet if I were Governor I'd do something; I wouldn't just sit there and take it!"

"Oh, cut it out, Grace, for God's sake!" He was half distraught, and turned to leave the room.

"I wish I was Governor!" She flung the invidious phrase at him in a kind of fierce and bitter reproach, and he felt its intended sting.

"Well, what would you do if you were?" He paused and looked back at her, over his shoulder, as though taking up a challenge.

"Well, the first thing I'd do would be to keep all those hateful reporters out of my office. And then I'd get rid of that old Matt Holt. I always told you he'd get you into trouble, but you wouldn't listen to me; you always had to hang on to him, never able to move without him, and now you see what he's got you into. I think it's a shame the way newspapers are allowed to blacken people's characters; the first thing I'd do would be to have a law prohibiting them from printing—"

But Blake didn't stop to hear the rest.

Happily, they couldn't discuss the subject at dinner because of Johnson's presence in the dining-room. And after dinner Mrs. Blake went to her room and Blake to the library. He sat there alone before the fire, turning over and over in his weary brain the thousand futile and fantastic expedients that came to him, turning them over hopelessly, abandoning them one after another.

And then, at ten o'clock, the butler came softly into the library and said:

"Mr. Holt, suh, hyah to see you."

And there was Matt standing in the doorway.

"Hope I don't disturb you, Governor," said Matt. He paused just outside the circle of firelight.

"Curtains all pulled down?" Matt asked, peering cautiously 'round the room. And, having reassured himself, he approached the fire, drew up a chair and sat down. "I've had a notion," he explained, "that for some days I was being shadowed. Hugh Garrett warned me some time ago that the Good Government League was likely to put detectives on my trail. That's why I didn't go to see you to-day. You understood, didn't you?"

"Oh, yes," sighed Blake, and then wondered again why it was that with Matt he could never be quite himself, never say precisely the things he ought to say. Matt was studying him with interest.

"Aren't worried, are you?" Matt asked presently.

"Well, Matt," said Blake, "I'm not particularly happy over this thing. I should think you would know that!"

"Well, now, look here, John," said Matt, "worryin' isn't going to get us out of the scrape; we got to think of some better way. And, first of all, play the game; don't lose your temper—the way you did with the reporters to-day. What you want to do is to keep a stiff upper lip, and we'll figure out some way to beat this thing. Now, first of all," and Matt drew his chair closer to the Governor's, "I don't think this fellow Pedley's got the votes. Maybe we can kill it in Committee, but if we can't, we've got to kill it on the floor of the Senate. Now just take it easy and sit tight; we've got plenty of time."

Plenty of time!

"But, Matt," said Blake, "I don't want this thing to drag on. I want it settled, quick, and out of the way! My lord, man, don't you see how it troubles me? I can't endure delay!"

Matt clapped his hand to his mouth, got up, took a long stride toward the chimney, hastily chucked his quid into the fire, as though to prepare for serious discussion, wheeled his chair close to Blake's, and sat down beside him.

"JOHN," he began, leaning sidewise over the arm of his chair toward him, and speaking out of the corner of his mouth, "do you want my resignation?"

Blake caught his breath; his heart beat faster for a second. Here, once more, Matt was offering him a way out! If it was a way out!

He considered the possibilities swiftly; if he were to throw Matt to them as a sacrifice would it appease the Pedleys, the Fenshards, the reformers?

Matt, sitting beside him, one leg crossed over the other, his large foot swinging up and down in the firelight, his elbow on the arm of his chair, his large fingers rasping the stubble of beard on his face, was watching him out of the corners of his eyes.

"If you do," said Matt, "you can have it—here and now!"

(To be continued)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Just 15 Minutes a Day

What it will mean to you is told in the FREE BOOKLET below

HERE are two men of equal position and business income. Which of them represents you?

They read about the same number of hours each week. But one has no plan for his reading; at the end of the year he has little or nothing to show.

The other talks like a man who has traveled widely, though he has never been outside of the United States.

He knows something of science, though he had to stop school at fifteen. He is at home with history, and the best biographies, and the really great dramas and essays. Older men like to talk to him because he has somehow gained the rare gift of thinking clearly and talking interestingly.

What's the secret of his mental growth? How can a man in a few minutes of pleasant reading each day gain so much?

Dr. Charles W. Eliot, from his lifetime of reading, study, and teaching, forty years of it as President of Harvard University, answered that question in a free booklet that you can have for the asking.

"For me," wrote one man who had sent in the coupon, "your little free book meant a big step forward, and it showed me, besides, the way to a vast new world of pleasure." This free booklet describes the contents, plan and purpose of

DR. ELIOT'S FIVE-FOOT SHELF OF BOOKS

Every well-informed man and woman should at least know something about this famous library.

The free booklet tells about it—how Dr. Eliot put into his Five-Foot Shelf "the essentials of a liberal education," how he so arranged it that even "fifteen minutes a day" are enough, how in pleasant moments of spare time, by using the reading courses Dr. Eliot provided for you, you can get the knowledge of literature and life, the culture, the broad viewpoint that every university strives to give.

Every reader of this magazine is invited to have a copy of this entertaining book. It is free, will be sent by mail, and involves no obligation of any sort. Merely clip the coupon and mail it to-day.

This Free Booklet gives Dr. Eliot's own plan of reading

P. F. COLLIER & SON COMPANY
250 Park Avenue, New York City

By mail, free, send me the booklet that tells all about the most famous library in the world, describing Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics), and containing the plan of reading recommended by Dr. Eliot. Also, please advise how I may secure the books by small monthly payments.

Name { Mr. / Mrs. / Miss } .....

Address .....

6002-HCC-L

.....

The publishers cannot undertake to send the booklet free to children

Since 1875 COLLIER Good Books

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Goal of Your Ambition

WHATEVER may be the goal of your ambition, financial independence inevitably forms a part of it. Financial independence means successful investment, and this in turn means careful selection of your investments and especially of the House from which you buy.

Whether you call at an office of S. W. STRAUS & CO. and talk to one of our officers, or simply write us a letter or postcard of inquiry, you will be given ample data on the sound bonds we sell, enabling you to make a thorough investigation and a careful selection.

We suggest that you get in touch with us, by a personal call or letter, and let us submit you circulars describing well-safeguarded securities yielding as high as 5½ - 6%. Ask for

BOOKLET A-1821

S.W. STRAUS & CO.

Investment Bonds Incorporated

STRAUS BUILDING
565 Fifth Avenue
at 46th St.
NEW YORK

STRAUS BUILDING
Michigan Ave.
at Jackson Blvd.
CHICAGO

STRAUS BUILDING
79 Post Street, SAN FRANCISCO

ESTABLISHED IN 1882

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

Always Make the Punishment Fit the Crime

HOW to punish children for their various misdemeanors ought to be a serious problem in every home. As a matter of fact, most parents don't give the matter the attention it deserves, simply punishing all children the same way for everything, without considering each particular offense as a separate and individual problem.

We have four children, three boys and one girl. My wife was a school-teacher before I married her, a quiet, resourceful woman, where I am quick and inclined to sudden anger. We have always got on splendidly. Our first disagreement came with our first child, and it was a question of punishment for his disobedience.

The boy, then only a little more than two years old, had been told to put his toys away. On this particular evening, he stubbornly refused to do so. After all my entreaties and threats had failed, and my anger was thoroughly aroused, I started toward the boy with the intention of spanking him into submission. My wife, divining my intention, intervened. "No," she said, "I don't want that method to be used on our children."

Well, I had been brought up under the "Spare the Rod and Spoil the Child" régime, and I didn't believe in these new-fangled ideas of bringing up children. The system that was good enough for my father to use on me was plenty good enough for me to use on my children, and so forth and so on. My wife listened patiently to this harangue. Then she asked if she might try her system first.

SHE told Bobby to put the toys away, and was met with the same refusal. So she gathered up the toys herself and stored them away on a high shelf in the closet. The surprised Bobby looked on with a victorious gleam in his eye. Soon afterward he went to bed. Bright and early the next morning, he wanted his toys, but couldn't reach them himself. He asked to have them taken down for him.

My wife explained to him, calmly and reasonably, that little boys who weren't willing to put their toys away when they were through with them couldn't take them out to play with. For three days Bobby looked up at those toys on the shelf, and remembered why he couldn't have them down. He never refused to put them away after that.

"Always fit the punishment to the crime, and never argue or fight with a tired, angry child. Wait until calm has been restored, and both you and the child can see the light of reason." This was the constant advice of my wife.

It was a firm rule in our household that the children should come in from their play at five o'clock. They had duties to perform before the evening meal—errands at the store, the table to set, wood and coal to be brought up from the basement. Johnny invariably loitered, coming in from a half-hour to an hour late.

"Johnny, you're late again," said my wife one day. "Now listen to me, my boy. We have work in this life as well as play. Whenever one person shirks his work, someone else has to do more than his share, to make up for the shirker. That isn't playing fair. Bobby has had to run your errands while you played. When you come home to-morrow, you will have to do Bobby's share of the work to even up the score." That cured him.

The boys always took turns washing the dishes after dinner. When it came to Jack's turn, we all trembled, for he broke so many. We allowed a generous margin for accident, and then my wife spoke to him about it.

"Son," she said to him, "you don't break your toys the way you do Mother's dishes. You're simply careless, and you must learn to be careful with other people's property. After this, you will have to replace out of your own allowance all dishes you break." Jack's carefulness increased in exact proportion to the number of dishes he had to replace. It wasn't long before he had learned to take time and exercise care in handling not only dishes but other things as well.

OUR children never quarrel, and here's the reason: As soon as my wife saw one of them fighting with, picking on, or teasing another, she parted them, and did not let them play together for several hours. A child's anger is very short. Usually, in half an hour, the quarrelers would want to play together again. Then my wife would explain to them some point she wanted to bring home, such as fair play, respect for the other's property, leniency to the little sister. But she insisted that they play separately the allotted time. During this remaining hour of solitude, the lesson had a good chance to sink in. When play was resumed, there was a new feeling of comradeship established.

I could tell countless stories of important lessons brought home, without striking the child, and even without anger on the part of the parent. Needless to say, I am thoroughly converted to my wife's way of thinking. You will see how simply it all works out. But why is it not universally used by parents? Is it ignorance? No, I believe not as much as it is want of thought and patience. I know it is harder to make Johnny wash the towel on which he has dried his dirty hands than it would be to slap his hands and say, "You naughty boy." But where the latter punishment may have to be repeated a dozen times, I doubt if the former will be called on a second time. H. J. S.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

3 Drafting Lessons

Actually free!

to prove you can learn at Home, in spare time!

We have developed a new simplified, rapid way to teach Drafting, and we want to send you three sample lessons without cost or obligation. So you can test your own ability to master this fascinating work at home, in your spare time. And see for yourself how quickly and easily you can qualify for a fine, well-paid Drafting position.

Home-training backed with an agreement to get you a DRAFTING JOB at a BIG RAISE —or money refunded

Here is a word-for-word copy of the Contract which we have made with 30,000 men in the past three years. I shall be glad to make the same agreement, backed by our entire resources of $1,500,000.00—with YOU!

American School

Guarantee of Position and Increased Pay

To_____

1. WE GUARANTEE to find you a satisfactory position within 60 days after you finish our complete course of home training in Drafting;

And, further,

2. WE GUARANTEE that said position will pay you a salary of at least 50% more than you are earning today, provided your present salary is less than $40 per week;

OR FAILING TO DO SO, we guarantee to refund to you immediately the entire amount that you have paid for this training.

O C Miller
Director
Extension Work

This agreement proves our training does make real Draftsmen. It proves that after you finish, there are well-paid jobs available. And you can prepare yourself without losing a day's pay or time, without quitting your job or leaving home!

Come Into Drafting!

The ability to read blueprints and draw plans is the entering wedge to success in all building and manufacturing lines. Learn Drafting and you'll be "sitting pretty." It's INTERESTING work and Draftsmen are a wonderful bunch of fellows. You're bound to enjoy the good-natured atmosphere of a Drafting office and the contact it gives you with important activities and BIG MEN.

BIG PAY for EXPERT DRAFTSMEN

Pick up the want ads of any big-city newspaper and you'll see why we urge men to go into Drafting. 70,000 fine positions advertised in the past year. Draftsmen are urgently needed in Building Construction, Manufacturing, in the Architectural, Mechanical, Electrical, Structural and Automotive industries. Get in touch with me, and I'll tell you how you can get one of these fine jobs.

The American School

Chartered 30 years ago as an EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTION, and, like the best resident schools and colleges, conducted NOT FOR PROFIT. We offer complete, thorough, up-to-date instruction—prepared by 200 leading Engineers, Executives and Educators. A unique instruction, built to meet the specifications of well-paid jobs as laid down by employers themselves—yet simplified for ready understanding by men with only common schooling.

And we are the first in the home-study field to recognize the need of giving a COMPLETE SERVICE to ambitious men—training plus employment. Which takes you as you are, supplies the equipment you lack, and lands you in the better job you seek. Without risk to you!

O. C. MILLER
Director Extension Work

O. C. MILLER, Director, Extension Work, The American School
Dept. D-11, Drexel Ave. & 58th St., Chicago

I am interested to get particulars of your Job and Raise Guarantee. Also send 3 Drafting Lessons without cost or obligation.

Name_____

Address_____

Age_____ Occupation_____

The American School
Dept. D-11, Drexel Avenue and 58th Street, Chicago

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

—If a gentleman could swear!

Three days now, and the young chief still absent from his band out there in the lot. Three galling days listening to his little sister who refers to him (not without scorn) as "mama's little martyr." Three days of wearing a towel about the neck destined for the collar of a conqueror . . . if only a gentleman could swear!

* * *

Never neglect a sore throat. Look upon it as a warning of an on-coming cold, or worse, and take definite steps to check it.

At the first sign of throat irritation, rinse the mouth and gargle with Listerine full strength. Do it several times a day. Many's the cold and sore throat that this simple precaution has nipped in the bud.

Listerine is antiseptic, and the moment it enters the mouth attacks the countless disease-producing bacteria that lodge there waiting till resistance is low to strike.

Sharp changes of temperature weaken resistance, and crowds pass bacteria along to thrive in stuffy homes and offices. So, during the winter months use Listerine every day for your own protection. Lambert Pharmacal Co., St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.

Never neglect a sore throat

LISTERINE

-the safe antiseptic

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE
February, 1928
More Than 2,200,000 Circulation

Lincoln—The Most Lied About Man In The World

By Honoré Willsie Morrow

HE WILL go into the President's room and he will come out: and when he comes through the door there will be a strange vision of a large foot just behind him, suggesting to any navy constructor the idea of a propeller—"

In other words, Mr. Lincoln is about to kick out of his office a notorious gambler who has tried to bribe him; not the Lincoln of legend, but the real man that his secretary, William Stoddard, set down in his diary: Lincoln, the most lied about man in the world.

No, I'm not about to attempt anything so silly as to muck-rake Abraham Lincoln. There is nothing about him to muck-rake. I'm going to reverse that process!

When, nearly eight years ago, I began to study Lincoln's life with the purpose of writing a novel about him, my mental picture of the Emancipator was the one usual with the plain American citizen. I saw him as the enormously tall, awkward, badly dressed Middle-Westerner who had been self-inspired to free the slaves. I thought of him most frequently with tears rolling down his face, as he gave a reprieve to the mother of some soldier who had deserted or had slept on sentry duty. Or, if he was not weeping, I thought of him as offending some dignitary with the pat obscenity of a story or with the crudeness of his manner. This early Lincoln of mine always was sad, even when he laughed, partly because he was unhappy with his wife and still regretted Ann Rutledge, and partly because his attitude toward life was the one expressed in that curious ode: "Oh, Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?"

Champion rail splitter of the world, proud of it, was the Lincoln I knew eight years ago. He wore only badly fitting black frock-coat suits, wrinkled and unbrushed, and a rusty high hat. He was absolutely patient. He never lost his temper. He never swore. He had no eye for nature. He had no true religious faith. I knew in general that he had been a great statesman, because he had freed the slaves, but chiefly was I concerned with his personal oddities and perfections.

I really loved this picture of Lincoln, and so I resented violently a remark made by my father, who was still living when I began my study. I had told him the way I saw Lincoln.

Father, at the age of fourteen, had been a drummer boy at Shiloh. He had a vivid recollection of the Civil War period. He listened to my description, impatiently.

"But I remember Lincoln!" he said. "I saw him early in January, in 1865. I was in Washington with my father, who was one of a clergymen's committee that was doing some work for the Sanitary Commission. I saw him the first time standing on the corner of Fourteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, talking to a little man; Seward it was. Lincoln may have been a clodhopper when he lived in Springfield, but, let me tell you that, after four years in Washington, he was a magnificent-looking human being; emperor of the commonalty, he was, and, by God, he looked it!" Rising from his chair, his blue eyes blazing as they always did when he gave me this picture of Lincoln: "He had a big gray cape wrapped 'round him and a dark felt hat pulled low on his head. 'And petty men walked under his huge legs and peeped about to find themselves dishonorable graves.' . . . You and your Lincoln—a scarecrow built of a hoe handle and a frock coat. That's the best your generation can do!"

Popular Fallacies About Lincoln

"IN THE course of my eight-year study of the life of Abraham Lincoln," says Mrs. Morrow, "I discovered that many of our pet beliefs about him are unfounded in fact. Probably the eight commonest Lincoln fallacies are these:

That he was a great rail splitter,
That he knew but one poem,
That he had no religion,
That he had no love of nature,
That he never lost his temper,
That he was always wrinkled and shabby in dress, wearing only an ancient broadcloth frock coat,
That he told obscene stories,
That he was unhappily married."

In the accompanying article Mrs. Morrow gives you the evidence upon which she bases her conclusion that these beliefs about Lincoln are unwarranted.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

FROM KEYSTONE VIEW CO., N. Y.

FROM BROWN BROS., N. Y.

(Above) Lincoln the lawyer of Springfield, Illinois; from a photograph made about 1857, and widely used for campaign purposes. (At right) The earliest known picture of Lincoln, probably made when he was a member of Congress. The original photograph was a daguerreotype

"Oh," I winced, "how can you say such a thing?"

"Because it's true!" declared my father stoutly. "We're short on great figures in the country, and Lincoln was chosen for apotheosis by the public prints; but not until long after his death. And this lapse of time gave the liars a chance. Your generation's Lincoln! A stuffed shirt made by county-fair orators and Sunday-school teachers. They've obscured and blighted his name by pinning the rag-tags and bob-tails of silly folk-stories all over him. You've tried to make him a cross between a clown and a god. Lincoln was neither."

He paused—his thoughts where I could not follow.

"Well, what was he?" I asked, after a wait of several minutes.

"I can't paint him," said Father gruffly, "nor can you. But at least you needn't try to cover up your incapacity with bits of trash."

There was sense in this, I admitted, although I felt chagrined over his sweeping condemnation of my "presentation of a man." But I could not reply adequately, because I suddenly realized that I was dealing only in second-hand impressions, while my blessed father had first-hand facts. He had his clean-cut memories. Ah, how I missed them—not least of the thousand poignant losses inseparable from Father's going—when I came to write the novel. He had not only the memories, but he had read more than I. This, at least, I could remedy, and I plunged into the vast realm of Lincolniana.

This article is in no sense a résumé of that reading. It is by way of being a public acknowledgment, with proof, that my father was right!

MAKING one's way through Lincolniana in search of truth is like creeping over vast rubbish heaps, picking out lost jewels—mosaics with which to make a portrait. Rubbish! Rubbish of hearsay and sentimental gush and falsehood and irrelevancies almost inextricably mingled with the dishearteningly small number of facts about Lincoln contained in statements made by intelligent people who knew Lincoln, and wrote about him at the time they knew him.

My mosaic portrait grew with extraordinary slowness: little by little, fact set beside fact, the picture formed itself. I did not make it. The men and women of the Civil War period outlined it, and filled it in. Infinitesimal bits of jewelry—month on month, year on year. It was finished. I looked at it with astonishment. It was not our Lincoln, your and my generation's. It was not my father's. Was it Lincoln at all? I do not know. I cannot know. But, at least, to the best of my belief, it contained none of the things Lincoln had not been. The rag-tags were not there; none of the things I recognized as trash; none of the things we have used to dwarf Lincoln in our passion to bring him within our understanding. And the catalogue of our sins in this direction is not short or unimportant.

An essential part of the popular history of Lincoln is that he was an expert at rail splitting. Yet this is what the President said to Noah Brooks, in 1863 or 1864. Noah Brooks was the Washington correspondent for the Sacramento "Union." He had known Lincoln in the President's Springfield days, and on his arrival in Washington the old friendship was renewed. Brooks was to have been John Hay's successor as a secretary to Lincoln during the second Administration. Brooks wrote diary letters home to his paper. He seems to have had an accurate and painstaking mind. Lincoln must have found him so, or he would not have booked him for a position demanding so large an amount of both qualities.

To Brooks, with whom he was riding through the Virginia

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

woods, Lincoln said that "although he had undue credit for rail-splitting, he did know how to fell a tree; and he gave an entertaining disquisition on the art, illustrated by examples before us. He said that he did not remember splitting many rails in his life. In fact, rail fences were not in his line at all; but he was proud, he said, of his record as a woodsman.

"Somebody reminded him that he had authenticated some rails as of his splitting, during the Lincoln and Hamlin campaign. 'No, I didn't,' he replied. 'They brought those rails in where I was, with a great hurrah, and what I did say was that if I ever split any rails on the piece of ground that those rails came from (and I was not sure whether I had or not), I was sure that those were the rails.'"

BROOKS helps to destroy another much-loved fallacy about Lincoln; namely, that he had little interest in nature and natural beauty. Again, riding through the woods with Brooks, Lincoln observed a vine which wrapped a tree in its luxuriant growth. "Yes," he said, "that is very beautiful. But that vine is like certain habits of men; it decorates the ruin that it makes."

At another time, in the winter woods, just after a snowfall, Brooks found Lincoln standing on the stump of a tree looking out over the landscape. The President called attention to the various subtle features of the view, and said, among other things, that he "liked the trees best when they were not in leaf, as their anatomy could then be studied." And he bade Brooks look at the delicate yet firm outline of a leafless tree against the sky. Then, pointing to the fine network of shadows cast on the snow by the branches and twigs, he said that that was the profile of the tree.

"The very next day," said Brooks, "someone was discussing with him the difference between character and reputation, when he said—with a look as if to remind me of what he had been talking about the day before—that perhaps a man's character was like a tree, and his reputation like its shadow: the shadow is what we think of it; the tree is the real thing."

California, it seems, produces not only Native Sons but other precious bits of Lincolniana on this same theme. The following is from the San Francisco "Bulletin," which published a letter written by a California woman who visited the Lincolns at the Soldiers' Home in 1863. The Soldiers' Home, about four miles from the White House, was used for a summer residence by the President. There were many beautiful trees on the place, as there are still. Near—not too near—the cottage where the family lived, was the soldiers' cemetery, at this time filled with new-made graves. In the summer twilight, the little group of visitors stood looking at the graves, when they were joined by Lincoln. He paused, taking in the scene, then murmured:

"How sleep the brave, who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes bless'd!
And women o'er their graves shall weep,
Where nameless heroes calmly sleep. . . ."

"One of the ladies, catching a bit of green from an intruding branch, said it was a cedar and another thought it was a spruce.

"'Let me discourse on a theme I understand," said the President. 'I know all about trees, in right of being a backwoodsman. I'll show you the difference between spruce, pine, and cedar, and this shred of

(Continued on page 119)

FROM BROWN BROS., N. Y.

FROM L. C. HANDY, WASHINGTON, D. C.

(Above) A faded ambrotype, showing Lincoln in a white coat, taken during the Lincoln-Douglas debates, at Beardstown, Illinois, in 1858. This reproduction was made from a copy in the Congressional Library. (At left) One of the last known photographs of Lincoln, said by some to be the very last, made within a week of his death. A crack in the negative has been painted out in this reproduction

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

It was in pure despair, a blind panic, that she snatched at a two-foot splinter fallen from the paddock gate and struck blindly at the black lip grinning immediately over her

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Black Java Lily

A story

By Ida M. Evans

ILLUSTRATED BY HERBERT M. STOOPS

ALL the way from the great cream-colored stucco farmhouse to the greater red barn, Gorman Dunsberg could not escape his daughter-in-law Dazy's murmur on the east porch to Lee.

A childish voice. A sulky murmur. Past the dairy house, the huge red silo, and even the white-boarded paddock, it followed him. Even though he was out of sight of her small, pretty, doll-like red head, which rested against a cream-colored porch pillar while she and Lee quarreled in undertones.

What did the two argue over? He could take a free choice of five or six subjects. One predominated. In two years, Lee's lean, tanned, good-natured face had become strained.

Frowning, the old man got into his long black car, which a hired man had backed from the garage.

"Everything in, Jerry?"

"Just got gas and oil," declared Jerry with zest. Jerry had nursed the Dunsberg peaches ever since his old rheumatic knees had been scarcely bigger than a clingstone.

The car was a good make. The Dunsbergs could afford the best American-made cars; or the best foreign-made, too, if they cared to spend money foolishly.

The Dunsberg orchards could afford a city daughter-in-law too. They could give her a mink coat and silk-to-the-top stockings.

But the old man's frown stayed as he rode off. He was on his way to the Impleton auction, fifteen miles north. And what for?

Just to buy himself a horse to which he had taken a childish fancy. A spirited black stallion. Fourteen hundred dollars. A present to himself.

Small pleasure in buying yourself a present! He pursed his huge old lips. He would rather, to tell the truth, put the money into a fur coat for a daughter-in-law. Or even a bracelet. Or toys for grandchildren.

But Dazy and Lee had no children. And Dazy did not care much for presents. She had a cold little way of saying, "Thank you, Father." Not a word more.

Nothing but little cold words out of her little cold red mouth, since Lee brought her home from Detroit two Aprils back! She had made it very plain that she did not like farm life.

At first meeting, she had held out a prim gloved hand to her father-in-law. The old man, who had been ready with warm greeting, had taken it with a quick frown. Had it been Thyra Mosby whom Lee had brought home with a grin and a high-priced platinum wedding-ring—well, old Gorman would have lifted her clear off her feet for all her hundred and forty pounds of healthy flesh. And he would have smacked a dozen kisses on the plump cheeks and smiling lips.

Thyra was the eldest daughter of a neighbor peach raiser. Wouldn't that energetic, handsome girl have put a different hand on the management of the big stucco farmhouse? Thyra would not have curled silently for days at a time in her bedroom, while old Gorman and Lee scattered newspapers in living-room and over the porches, and old gray, waddling Lydy and her niece Ophelia ran kitchen, dairy, and even the annual attic cleaning.

It was true that the waddling Lydy had been in the Dunsberg kitchen for eighteen years, and knew its outs and ins as a cat knows its cream saucer. Lee's mother when alive and Lee's capable sister, Milly, now living with a ranching husband in Oregon, had given Lydy a pretty free hand.

But Gorman knew Lydy. She was aware of her place. In the beginning, she had gone civilly to Dazy for directions, and Dazy's childish blue eyes had blinked with distaste.

Yes—plain distaste! Old Gorman told himself that he was no fool. He knew what a look signified, even from a little baby-eyed city snip who blinked foolishly at whole tubs of cheese, and shrank at tree-toads' voices.

LEE had tried several times to frame a sort of apology for his wife. She had roomed around, and wasn't used to a big house. She didn't just know how to take hold, Lee had said, with a nervous laugh (oh, the old man knew his own boy). Just give her time—

Bah! She had had time. Two years. And she might still be a roomer, a small, taciturn, displeased roomer.

No spark of friendship had ever struck between her and her father-in-law. Her fault, the old man often muttered to himself. Why hadn't Lee chosen someone nearer home?

And it had been plain to Gorman in the beginning that Lee had a sort of queer pity for her. He had met her in a department store, where he had gone to match dress goods for Lydy. Her parents were dead. Her father had been a musician in motion picture theatres. Cello or oboe or something.

Lee had spoken proudly about her working, as if she had shown pluck. But clerking was light work in the old man's mind. Besides, it was his opinion, nursed in forty years of help-hiring for his vast orchards, that most people work at what suits their natural talents—or lack of talent. And as for Lee's further explanation, that girls with baby-blue eyes have their own sort of troubles in life, oh, well, maybe so, grunted Gorman; but what had that to do with her coaxing Lee to leave the farm and go somewhere else? Yes—that was what she was doing. He was sure of that.

The fly in Gorman's ointment had fed thick on its salvelike environment. Riding on his way this morning, between two rows of neighbors' orchards, he waved an absent great hand at men in barns or under gray-sprayed trees.

HE WAS a big man; big thighs, big gray head, powerful arms and torso. In years gone past, he could lift a barrel of apples from ground to dray as easily as some men can lift a corncob pipe. But at sixty-eight, one gives over certain former feats as disrespectful to a decent old heart that has done nearly seven decades of lusty pounding. And now, for all his size and well-filled years, a cold little fear made his heart beat as barrel-lifting had never done. Suppose this little doll-person persuaded Lee to leave stucco house and silo and orchards?

Pshaw! Maybe Impleton's black stallion would prove an antidote to an old man's morbid mood. Pretty much of a self-indulgence to pay out so much cash for a toy. That was all the horse would be. A large black toy. But when life sands are running low, and a man has plenty of cash, and nobody better than himself to buy presents for—well, he has a right to self-indulgence, mused Gorman with some bitterness, and sent his car on at a faster clip.

Ever since he fished the Impleton auction bill out of the mail box beside his driveway, he had hankered for that stallion, a four-year-old named Black Java Lily. He had admired him at his birth.

Most of his neighbors were in their orchards as he passed. It was the wrong month for a sale. But the Impletons had disregarded the season.

Careless men, the father and three middle-aged sons. Their two hundred acres were mortgaged. Well—grapes had frozen two successive years; and intermittent horse-breeding is an expensive game.

Gorman had noted that the stallion was not on the sale bill. Likely the list had been carelessly scribbled down for the printer. He had not heard that the horse had been sold.

In spite of the month, there was a fair crowd. Gorman knew everyone present.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He had been born on his own father's government holding in that county. Coost, the auctioneer, a short, rotund man who had studied law and had a fast tongue, nodded at Gorman, not ill-pleased to see a man of large property at his sale.

Etta Impleton and her daughters were serving coffee, doughnuts, and hot beef on tables under the maple trees nearest the large brown house. Sight of Thyra Mosby with her hand on a gilt cage reminded Gorman that Lee had asked him to bid in Etta Impleton's pair of love birds, if they were put up.

Well, he could not bid against Thyra. And in his old heart he would prefer Thyra to have the birds.

COOST had summoned George Impleton, a short red-tanned man with the fretful large mouth of a man who has made no particular success in life. All the Impleton men had that mouth.

George came effusively to shake hands. "Howdy, Dunsberg. Don't know, though, what we've got here to interest you."

"I've come after that black stallion," Gorman smiled, "with the fancy name."

"Which one?"

"Black Java Lily. I didn't know you had any other."

"Say, I sent him to my cousin Charley, near Detroit, two weeks ago. Never thought anybody 'round hereabouts would want him." George Impleton was regretful.

"Pshaw," complained Gorman. "I've always had a kind of crush on that animal. Always wanted to own him. And Milly's husband out in Oregon writes me about a little black mare he'd be willing to send on. Sort of thought I'd see what the two could raise in prize ribbons."

"You'll be losing all your money yet, Dunsberg," laughed the other man. "Tell you what: I'll write Charley tonight to send him back if he ain't sold. No, I'll telegraph. I didn't figure a chance of getting real money here, and Charley took him as a favor to me till a buyer came along. Sixteen hundred is the price."

"Fourteen hundred is my offer."

"Brought you a riding horse, Mis' Dunsberg," called Al, laughing

Impleton sucked a fretful lower lip. "Got me at a disadvantage, Dunsberg," he grumbled. "That's a thoroughbred animal—"

"Disadvantage nothing. My price's fair."

"All right. This is Thursday. Next week, say, ten days, and the horse'll be at your barn door. Better give me your note now."

Gorman gave this with the reasonableness of a man whose word was known to be fully as good as his bond. A less reliable man might have taken offense at the implied distrust.

He stood around twenty minutes, watching the crowd. Mostly he watched gray-eyed Thyra. Two or three young men kept at her side, laughing and talking. Pity Lee hadn't married her. Everybody had expected the match. Even Milly, a plump, laughing girl like Thyra. Milly had said, getting on the train for Oregon, "Thyra'll be a better boss than I am, Dad. And I'll bet Lee's tickled pink he won't have two housekeepers in his house."

There had never been any question of Lee's leaving home, with or without a wife. Lee had always been his father's second self, co-owner of all the parent had accumulated.

Gorman finally left the sale to go home. He was turning in at his own wide gate before he recalled that he had not seen if Thyra bid on the birds. Pshaw!

Well, no use to drive back. The cage would be bid in by somebody before now. He could get Dazy a new pair from Detroit.

At Gorman's arrival, Lee Dunsberg came from the wide barn doors, followed by a group of men.

Lee called, "Get the—"

"He wasn't put up to-day." His father purposely assumed that the horse was meant. "But I'll have him in ten days."

LEE DUNSBERG was tall like his father, with tanned light brown hair and quick brown eyes. Now the younger eyes were intent on the black chassis.

"Thyra seemed to want the birds," said Gorman briefly.

"Oh! I see."

"Dazy can have a new pair from Detroit."

"Sure, Dad."

But Lee and the hired men shared Gorman's own enthusiasm for the day's purchase. A car is a car, any man will admit. But a horse is flesh and blood. It is half-akin to humans, and capable of affection; not painted steel, or tin, run by smelly gas. Gorman and some of the older hired men had been born too far back to be able to address a small car affectionately as, "My Lizzie," and "old girl."

During the evening, Black Java Lily was discussed to satiation. His dam and sire were known to the countryside. His pedigree, cousins, sisters, brothers, aunts, and uncles were named and talked over.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Dazy had nothing to say at the family dining-table in the big, comfortable, east-facing dining-room, nor later when Lee and his father joined for a while the gossipy men in the kitchen. She was, indeed, rather a childish figure at the table's head. Her habit of silence gave her no dignity, but merely ineffectiveness.

Gorman heard Lee say something to her about the birds. Lee's voice was low and solicitous. The old man tightened his lips in displeasure at her reply: "Oh, it doesn't matter, Lee. But—"

Under all displeasure of the old runs sorrow. That little flat voice of Lee's wife! It imperiled the peace of his old mind. My goodness, he wished that Lee's odd little wife would like him and let him like her in return!

DAZY was out in the yard, drying her short red hair in the morning sun and helping Lydy set out pansy plants in Lee's mother's old bed under the west windows when, ten days later, Black Java Lily was delivered by the two Impleton boys; a muzzled, almost foot-cuffed horse that reared its large handsome head in patent temper.

The twenty-year-old Impleton twins were forward young men, with a flippant word for all women.

"Brought you a riding horse, Mis' Dunsberg," called Al, laughing.

"Oh, no!" She edged back in frank alarm toward a lilac bush.

Gorman came from the porch where he had been reading his mail. His eyes lighted with pleasure at his handsome new possession. For its flawless black satin, a movie star could have worn Black Java Lily's coat. Four heels danced with a perfect natural grace. Nostrils were fiery with breeding and strength.

But the horse's eyes were red-rimmed. An ominous defect.

"Got him pretty near trussed like a chicken," Gorman said in surprise and disapproval to the two Impletons.

"Pa guessed the trip across the state and right back again must have upset him more than'd be expected," explained Joe Impleton. "Or else he don't like to leave our family. How about it, old Java boy?" He passed a hand over a handsome black flank in careless caress.

GORMAN reflected to himself that somewhere across the state and back had been a measure of bad treatment. His own great hand caressed a flank.

Lee, followed by most of the Dunsberg men, came from the orchards. A great common grin denoted enthusiastic interest.

"Oh, boy!" whistled Lee. "Welcome to our family!"

"But I won't ride him into town tonight to a movie," chuckled old Jerry Ray. "My knees are a bit rheumatic this week."

"Guess I'll ride him to see a girl Saturday night," said Olsy, giant nephew to Jerry.

"G'wan! Ride him, Olsy!" jeered the crowd of wind-tanned fruit tenders. Olsy's loud laugh good-naturedly denied his boast.

"Pa and the rest of us s'posed he was for Mis' Dunsberg's personal use," joked Al Impleton again.

The men turned in a body to grin at Mrs.

(Cont'd on page 154)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Uncle Ambrose

He was Vox Populi, Pro Bono Publico, A Taxpayer, and Indignant Citizen all in one; he viewed the present with alarm, while pointing with pride to the past

By Don Marquis

DRAWINGS BY NORMAN PRICE

UNCLE AMBROSE APPLEGATE dwelt abstractedly in the midst of a large and noisy family, who treated him with tolerant affection, and never expected him to remember whether they numbered five daughters and four sons, or five sons and four daughters.

"Kate," he would say to one of the girls, peering at her uncertainly, "I wish you'd take this communication down to 'The Daily Banner' for me."

"I'm not Kate," she would reply, like as not; "I'm Jessie, Dad!" But she would laugh and run along with the article, designed for the Letters to the Editor Column, and signed "Veritas," "Pro Bono Publico," "Indignant Taxpayer," or something of that sort. I remember that one day one of the boys and myself, who had been entrusted with one of those communications, lost it; and upon confession, later, we had the graceless impertinence to ask whether it mattered very much.

Uncle Ambrose considered us with repressed indignation for some moments, as if in despair of ever getting across to us the magnitude of our crime. And three days later the following letter appeared in "The Banner":

To the Editor of "The Banner"—SIR: To one who has stood, as I stood but a few brief years ago, among the ruins of the Coliseum at Rome, reflecting upon the fall of that mighty empire, there must inevitably come the thought that humanity is but fleeting, and as he stands with bared brow and downcast eyes there must spontaneously arise to his lips the words of the poet:

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

Now, sir, the decay and fall of Rome were brought about by the flippant unwillingness of the younger generation to accept the wisdom and guidance of the elder statesmen, and it is with a sinking of the heart that one sees history repeating itself. Where are now the young people who formerly respected the ancient landmarks? Levity and indecorum stalk abroad; mockery is the watchword of the young. O tempora! O mores! It was not so in the consulship of Plancus!

CATO, JR.

Levity and indecorum certainly "stalked abroad" in the neighborhood of Uncle Ambrose Applegate; his children were about as placid as a zoo at feeding time. His house (inherited by Aunt Kate, his wife, from her father) was and still is situated on the outskirts of our flourishing small city, in the midst of flowering plants and fruit trees and shade trees; and year in and year out house and grounds and neighboring streets have shrieked and shaken with the racket of Applegate children, and their friends and acquaintances, and their circuses and mechanical inventions and pet animals of every possible and well-nigh impossible description, and their wars and festivities and accidents. A new and unexpected dog, pony, toy cannon, in-law (or even suspected outlaw) is apt to appear on any part of the premises at any moment. And in the midst of all this confusion Uncle Ambrose has sat in his study for decades, in his Prince Albert coat, writing letters to editors on the affairs of the town, the business of the state, the condition of the nation, the situation of the world, and the character and trend of the universe.

For Uncle Ambrose has always wished to share his thoughts; he is not selfish; he desires to benefit humanity, to stimulate it, to instruct, to guide, to warn, to uplift. While he does all this for the world, sometimes the old home place runs down a bit—what with the children and all, and the fact that Aunt Kate can't attend to everything. There is a large, thorny osage-orange hedge about one part of the grounds, separating them from the street, and it is usually neglected. One day Uncle Ambrose was taking one of his meditative walks abroad and a thorny branch from this riotous hedge sprawled out over the sidewalk, where it had no business to be caught and tore a sleeve of his Prince Albert coat.

Uncle Ambrose indignantly sought his study, and sat down and wrote the following letter to the editor of "The Banner":

To the Editor of "The Banner"—SIR: Greece fell, and was humbled to the dust, because demagogues usurped the mastership of affairs, and public business was neglected. Where now, I ask you, sir, where now, are

. . . The glory that was Greece,
And the grandeur that was Rome?

Gone, sir, gone, through the neglect of their public officials!

Now, sir, the mayor and council of this city are as derelict in their duty as any demagogue of them all! How long do they intend to permit the comfort and health of the free yeomanry of this community to be endangered by the criminal negligence of private citizens, undoubtedly partisan favorites and henchmen of the authorities, who allow thorn bushes to trench upon the public domain and endanger the eyesight and very lives of the innocent bypassers? I have myself, sir, been a

"To one who has stood, as I stood but a few brief years ago, among the ruins of the Coliseum at Rome"

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

sufferer recently from this abuse. This community must be cleaned up, sir, physically and politically.

VOX POPULI

Uncle Ambrose took this epistle down to "The Banner" office himself, entirely innocent that he had been torn by his own hedge—for he was always as vague about his own grounds as he was about his own horses and the children racketing about the place. The letter was printed the next day.

A new and unexpected dog

It must really have inspired the mayor and council to look about them and clean up a bit. A week later, looking out of his study window, Uncle Ambrose saw several workmen of the street-cleaning department actually lopping off branches from the hedge and throwing them over into the garden. He watched in indignation for half an hour this official trespassing upon his property, without remembering his former letter at all. For he was the sort of person who writes passionate appeals for the voters to come out on election day, and then forgets to vote himself. He indited another communication:

To the Editor of "The Banner"—Sir: Are the liberties of the Anglo-Saxon race, wrested from their tyrannical kings at Runnymede, sealed in the snows of Valley Forge, and steeped in the blood of Gettysburg, to be abrogated at the bidding of a coterie of petty official despots?

Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!

My property, sir, and the forest growth upon it, has been invaded without warning, and partially destroyed by vandals flaunting the uniform of the city street-cleaning department. Shrubs have been wantonly ruined under which my little ones have played their merry games.

Woodman, spare that tree . . .
In youth it sheltered me!

Now, sir, are the people of this community free men or slaves? The city government will learn, sir, in no uncertain tones, on next election day! Verbum sap!

PRO BONO PUBLICO.

And to this day the two things have never clicked together and become one incident in Uncle Ambrose's mind.

Uncle Ambrose actually saved a family from drowning, and rowed them to safety in a skiff

UNCLE AMBROSE has never liked to trust his communications to the mails. For one thing, they are too slow. When he writes something which he considers very important indeed, he at once carries it down-town personally, and has a little chat about it with the editor. On such occasions it has been his invariable custom for the past thirty years to don his silk hat and take his gold-headed walking stick and make something of a function of the visit. His Prince Albert coat he wears always, even when he is writing—indeed, there has sometimes been malicious gossip to the effect that he wears it when he goes to bed. Nobody has ever seen him without it, in any sort of weather. In the pauses and interludes of composition, or of conversation, it is his habit to thrust his hand into the breast of his coat, which makes him look very like a steel engraving of a statesman of the Webster-Clay-Calhoun period.

After his chat with the editor, Uncle Ambrose says, as he rises to take his departure:

"Well, sir, this exchange of views has been very pleasant. Very pleasant indeed, sir, and I hope mutually profitable and informative. But now I must get back to my real work, sir, my literary work." Often he adds, with the air of a not unwilling slave to duty and to the public service: "My study, sir, awaits me!"

The editor always says something polite, for Uncle Ambrose is by way of being a prominent citizen. He sits on platforms at public meetings. He reads the Declaration of Independence at Fourth of July celebrations. And he has had various vague, brief, indeterminate connections with politics.

Once, for part of a term, many years ago, he was a member of the state legislature, and he still is referred to as "Honorable Ambrose Applegate" by many of his old friends. But he was not reëlected to office. He could never understand why. Neither could his wife. Aunt Kate worships him. She has always thought him, quite sincerely, one of the greatest men of his times. She has never ceased to be astonished that enthusiastic multitudes have not forced him into the White House. Aunt Kate has always been a great help to him, he acknowledges, in his literary work. It is she who assists him in keeping the scrapbooks in which are pasted thousands of his contributions to the papers. When one of them is printed he always buys from fifty to a hundred copies, marks them, and mails them to his friends, and Aunt Kate helps in this clerical work, also.

"KITTIE," says Uncle Ambrose, "has been a helpmate to me, and a literary inspiration." Aunt Kate is rather tall, and she is broad and stout, a great figure of a woman with handsome head and face, a generous person generously proportioned; but certainly not the type that should be called "Kittie." Uncle Ambrose is very much shorter and more slender than Aunt Kate. If it were not that his great dignity seems sometimes to enlarge his stature you would think of him definitely as a little man; the top of his silk hat comes just as high as Aunt Kate's spectacles. Aunt Kate inherited enough money from her father, the late Captain Barton Wilkinson, so that neither she nor Uncle Ambrose has ever had to worry about making a living. He started out as a lawyer, but shortly after his father-in-law's death he closed his law office and retired to his study, to devote more time to his literary career.

The late Captain Wilkinson, from what I can learn of him, must have been a go-getter in his day. He was mixed up in a dozen different kinds of business, and he was by way of being a political boss, hard-boiled and capable, and yet with a fair share of genuine public spirit. Uncle Ambrose (Continued on page 140)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Drake Is One Of The Great Unknowns Of The Middle-West

He owns eight corporations, but his name does not appear in any of them, or on any stationery; he has made many inventions, but he has never taken out a patent; he has built 30,000 bridges, but he lives in a working-man's house in an unpretentious part of Omaha — all because he detests display of wealth

By William S. Dutton

IN AN unpretentious section of the city of Omaha is an old-fashioned frame house somewhat in need of paint.

Ask a passer-by who it is that resides in this house. If he knows, and not more than one man in five will, he may inform you that it is the home of "Bob" Drake.

"He builds bridges," your informer might add, should he happen to be of that neighborhood. "Folks say that he's made some money; not much though, I'd guess from the looks of his house."

Were you to tell this man that "Bob" Drake is not only one of the greatest bridge builders in this country but also one of Nebraska's richest men, the chances are that he would put you down as "touched in the head." Robert Z. Drake is one of the Great Unknowns of the Middle-West.

I am using the word "great" deliberately. It is said that you cannot drive for an hour over a road in the Mid-West without crossing a bridge which Drake has built either in part or in its entirety. More than thirty thousand of his bridges are scattered throughout that vast area, from the Dakotas southward to Arkansas, from the Mississippi River to the Rockies, and on up into the wooded expanses of the Pacific Northwest. Recently, for six consecutive months, Drake's string of eight bridge and iron and lumber companies completed a bridge for every working hour of the working day—a total of 1,800 bridges. During the past dozen years he has built an average of 1,500 bridges annually.

When you consider what roads have meant in the development of that trans-Mississippi country, and that no road is longer than the distance between its bridges, you begin to grasp some conception of the size of the tremendous job that Robert Z. Drake has done for his native Middle-West. Moreover, he has done more than merely construct: he originated many of the ideas which have made this mighty work of his a practical possibility.

Drake introduced the standardized bridge in the West, and thus brought the costs of bridge-building within the means of young and struggling settlements. He designed the first transverse joist bridge and invented the steel pile bridge, types of construction said to be employed in ninety-five per cent of the bridge structures being built in that country to-day.

There is no record in the patent offices that Drake originated these ideas, for he purposely has left them as free as the winds for all the world to use, asking no royalties and getting none. The man has the idealist's belief that he was put into this world to help, to do good, and to foster happiness within the limit of his means. The unpatented inventions, representing a discarded fortune, and the old house in which he lives, both are a part and parcel of his plan—the plan of a man with courage enough to live out his beliefs.

During a morning in Omaha, not long ago, I got my picture of this builder of bridges before I had even seen him. There was the house in which he has lived for twenty-five years, the home of a working-man, little more; surely not the home of a millionaire, to be pointed out and envied. There was his office, as plain as the house, with its work desk, its threadbare floor coverings and antiquated filing cabinets; the folks there were Jack and Bill and Grace, and they had been there for years. It was a shirt-sleeve office.

GRACE V. GREEN, who is Mr. Drake's secretary, told me with a touch of pride that she has been in her position for twenty-five years. She could put her finger on any record in the place in a moment. "Mr. Drake pays us well," she volunteered; "but he also expects us to work. He himself works fourteen and sixteen hours a day." Yet in that office there was none of the tedious atmosphere of work.

Mr. Drake was away that morning, somewhere in the state on bridge work. I had been unable to tell him in advance definitely the time of my visit, but he had promised to see me on the day I arrived. Miss Green (Continued on page 82)

A Half-Hour Spent in Reading This Story Will Be Time Well Invested

ROBERT Z. DRAKE is one of the most remarkable and interesting men you ever read about! They say you can't ride more than an hour in the Middle-West without crossing a bridge he has built. Yet relatively few people know him. He prefers obscurity. Money, to him, is something to be used in work, not to be spent on luxurious living. Bridge-building is one of the most intensely practical occupations in the world; but Drake, one of the greatest of bridge builders, is essentially an idealist. He has the soul of a dreamer, of a poet. Here is what he says:

"I've yet to build a bridge that has completely satisfied me. Every one I put up was the best bridge I could build at the time; but I know that not one of them is the best bridge that can be built. I am always seeking to find that 'best bridge'—and I guess I will go to my grave still seeking it. Then another will step into my shoes to continue the hunt; but the 'best bridge' will always be just a step ahead. The best of everything on this earth will always be undiscovered. The most we mortals can do is to find better than we have."

You need not fear you will be wasting time when you read the story of a man who talks like that!

THE EDITOR.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

ROBERT Z. DRAKE (in oval) has built an average of fifteen hundred bridges annually for the past twelve years. From the Dakotas to Arkansas; from the Mississippi to the Rockies, and on up the wooded expanses of the Pacific Northwest, his bridges are everywhere. A great builder of bridges, a wealthy man, an inventor—and yet you probably never before heard of him! The explanation is that Mr. Drake, as this article will tell you, prefers obscurity. He was born in Jackson County, Kansas, in 1870, and now lives in Omaha.

Photograph by Dewell, Omaha

Photograph by Dewell, Omaha

TWO of Mr. Drake's bridges. The one above shows a black gum floor laid runwise, instead of crosswise, as most bridges formerly were built. Below is Drake's bridge over the La Platte River. This, with its twenty-eight spans of fifty feet each, is one of the largest he has built, and is an example of his standardized bridge, which reduces construction costs.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Courtesy, Virginia State Chamber of Commerce

Photograph by Dementi Studio, Richmond, Va.

In the oval, from left to right, are Commander Richard E. Byrd, Mrs. Eleanor Bolling Byrd, Tom Byrd, and Harry Flood Byrd.

Mrs. Richard Evelyn Byrd and her sons

THE mother of "Tom, Dick and Harry" in her Richmond, Virginia home. Unusual home influences played a large part in the careers of her distinguished sons. Tom is a lawyer, war veteran, and extensive Virginia farmer; Dick flew over the North Pole and across the Atlantic Ocean, and has been cited for heroism or extraordinary valor no less than twenty-one times; Harry is Governor of the State of Virginia.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Mother Of Tom, Dick, and Harry

By Fitzhugh Green

LESS than two years ago—on the afternoon of Mother's Day, 1926, to be exact—there walked down the shady side of a broad Richmond street a slight feminine figure in black. Beside the lady strode Governor Harry Flood Byrd of Virginia, her son.

The pair passed a group of idlers, who ceased all talk to turn and eye them curiously.

"That's her," said one.

"Sure it's her," from another.

The mother and her distinguished son went on, unmindful of the pantomime behind them. They did not talk. Indeed, the Governor wore an air of almost grim restraint. This air was in distinct contrast to the erect carriage and brisk pace of the white-haired lady at his elbow.

A little farther, on, Mother and son met a lady and gentleman, who bowed and paused for a word of greeting.

"And how is everything?" inquired the gentleman with a cheerfulness that was obviously assumed for the occasion.

"Fine," answered Mrs. Byrd promptly. And if her smile was forced nobody would have guessed it.

Meanwhile the gentleman's companion had by a slight maneuver drawn the Governor out of earshot. "What news?" she asked in a whisper.

Glancing at his mother to see if she had heard, Harry Byrd shook his head. "Nothing—yet."

"But isn't she frightened to death?"

Again the son nodded, this time very slowly.

At this moment, the gentleman bowed to Mrs. Byrd and, taking his companion's arm, passed on. As if obeying an irresistible impulse, the two stole a backward glance at the Governor and his mother. "How on earth does she stand the suspense?" burst out the lady.

"Heaven only knows!" replied her escort. "I could scarcely talk to her for thinking of the danger, the uncertainty—"

Meanwhile, turning in at an old Colonial mansion, the Governor and his mother called on friends. There was bright conversation, and tea from blue china, as there might have been at any friendly afternoon call. But when the call came to an end and the visitors had departed, a strange thing happened: The hostess and her remaining guests hurried to the window and peeped through the curtain at the two disappearing down the sidewalk.

"How can she be herself at such a time?" exclaimed one.

"Does she know?"

"Of course! It was in all the papers."

"And he might be dead by now!"

"Or worse!"

Commander Richard Byrd, U. S. N., second son of Eleanor Bolling Byrd, had that morning hopped off from Spitzbergen for the North Pole on one of the most hazardous flights ever attempted by man. At this very moment, he was winging his way over the trackless ice fields of the Polar Sea. A faulty motor, a fog bank, a slight miscalculation, and he with Bennett would have perished, never leaving a trace.

Did the mother know what it meant?

"Of course I knew!" she declared with some pride when I asked her later. "How could I appreciate what my boys are doing if I didn't understand."

It was true too. I found out that she was nearly as familiar as Dick with stories of the old explorers: how they starved and froze and died in the white wilderness of the Far North. She was brought up on tales of the Greeley tragedy, that had occurred when she was a girl: nineteen men starving by inches amid ice and snow and darkness.

AT HOME a little later, the Governor sneaked away to the telephone for a word with his friend Stewart Bryan of the local press. Presently he burst into the room, his round ruddy face wreathed with smiles.

"Dick's back at the ship, Mother!" he cried. "But they don't know whether he succeeded or not."

"I know," said Mrs. Byrd with finality.

They dined that night with old friends. As dusk fell and lightning-bugs flickered through the trees, the little party sat down to a meal that none of those present will ever forget. Because it was a sultry evening, the long windows were open upon the shadowy lawn. Soft perfume of Southern flowers drifted in. Little was said. There was little to say.

Then suddenly through the heavy silence came a distant clamor, a queer medley of cries that swelled and took staccato form as they came nearer.

"Extry!"

At recognition of the word, everyone looked up sharply, and involuntarily swung their gaze to the brave smiling mother in their midst.

"Extry! Extry!"

A telephone bell rang in the passage outside the dining-room. It seemed but an instant before the message came, literally shouted into the dining-room:

"He got there! Dick reached the Pole."

The strain was broken. Everyone was excitedly on his feet, going out for papers, talking, laughing, congratulating the mother of the hero.

A few weeks later, I went down New York Bay in the mayor's yacht to meet the home-coming hero. There were roaring planes overhead and all about us spraying fireboats, sirens, and whistles; all the wondrous window dressing that only the greatest seaport in the world can provide. The yacht was packed with journalists, and "committees," and impressive "leading citizens" in high silk hats.

I wanted to congratulate the hero's mother. I found her aft, crammed in between a perspiring senator and a leading New Yorker. She looked cool and cheerful and altogether composed.

One of the journalists wormed his way through the crowd and thrust his face down close to hers. "Mrs. Byrd, I want to ask you a few questions." He had his pencil and pad all ready for the replies.

With a blithe gesture, she pushed the pad and pencil from her. "Don't be silly," she laughed. "Wait till Dick comes. He's the one you want to interview."

The reporter persisted. Others pushed in with their pads and pencils. The senator and the leading New Yorker began to be annoyed. One journalist stepped on another journalist's toes. A lady journalist threw a soprano query over the shoulders of her stronger rivals. It was all very confused and increasingly uncomfortable.

Suddenly Eleanor Bolling Byrd sat up. And when a real Virginia lady sits up, it's not unlike a colonel calling his troops to attention. Something happens.

"Now, just leave me alone, all of you!" she commanded severely. "I'm Dick's mother, and that's all. Leave me alone and talk to him when he comes aboard!"

As abruptly as it had come, the sternness left her face and a smile belied the frown that still hovered above her youthful brown eyes. "Anyway, it's too hot to talk, don't you think?" she added, with an irresistible appeal in her tone.

It was the way she said it, the way she looked, the little half-gesture that she put on at the end that smoothed the moment over; the personality of a woman that has been known for a quarter of a century as a "leading Virginia belle."

"AN EDITOR friend of mine thinks his readers would be interested in knowing something about you and your boys," I said to Mrs. Byrd one day.

With the quick directness for which she is famous, she turned on me with: "You just tell your editor friend that if he mentions my boys he ought in fairness to mention some of the people who made them what they are."

"Meaning their parents?"

"Not at all!" she flashed. "Away back beyond them."

Whereupon, in precise order she enumerated some (Continued on page 143)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"In this country," said Matt, "there's nothing makes an official popular so quick as to prosecute someone, especially someone high up"

Big Matt

By Brand Whitlock

Matt sat there, calmly denying everything, presenting that innocent face with its baffling, almost Oriental, inscrutability

Synopsis of the Two Preceding Instalments

"THERE'S nothin' in it for me, y' understand. But listen, Guv'nor, you can't afford to have the boys, the regular fellows, think you'd throw down a friend."

It was these words of Barney McGuire, ward boss, which brought home to John Blake, newly elected Governor, the seriousness of the choice he must make.

He was a "machine politician;" but the new responsibility of his office had made a tremendous impression upon him, had made him want to show the people that he could give them as good government as anybody. And then, almost immediately, the problem of Matt Holt. Matt Holt, the Big Boss, had made him everything that he was. Matt Holt would try one day to make him President. And Matt Holt wanted to be appointed Commissioner of Public Utilities.

Attorney General Fenshard, Senator Pedley, all the reform element, fought the appointment bitterly. And in his heart the Governor knew that they were right. Matt wasn't fit to be Commissioner of Public Utilities—any more than he, John Blake, was fit to be Governor!

Grace, his wife, and Joyce, his lovely daughter, disliked Matt—and Joyce was engaged to young Laurence Price, one of the reform senators.

But upon the heels of Blake's decision to tell Matt he could not appoint him came Barney McGuire's words—and Matt Holt was made Commissioner of Public Utilities. Blake told him what he expected, and Matt listened with respect. Blake's fears were quieted, everything was calm, his popularity was growing—and then, upon the very day of Joyce's wedding, the scandal broke. The Good Government League had instituted a probe into Matt's activities, accusing him of graft and of being "fixed" by Hugh Garrett, of the traction company.

Blake was desperate. He sent for Matt—and when he got through talking he knew just as little as before what to think. And the probe went on. Blake refused statements to the newspapers, which only made their write-ups worse. His wife was furious because he had made the scandal possible by appointing Matt. Joyce was away on her wedding trip. There was no one to whom he could turn. And then Matt came to him at night in his library.

"John," he said, "do you want my resignation? If you do you can have it—here and now!"

BLAKE waited a moment longer; the hope that suddenly had dawned as suddenly faded; he couldn't say it, and, turning toward Matt, he remarked, instead: "I haven't said anything about your resigning, have I, Matt?"

Their eyes met. They looked at each other for a long moment.

Then, "When're Joyce and her husband coming back?" asked Matt.

"I don't know," the Governor replied. "Why?"

"Oh, nothing; just thinking that, if the worst comes to the worst, we might want Price's vote. I was thinking, making a little calculation in my mind, see? If we don't kill it in committee, 'course it's a close thing in the Senate. We've only got a majority of three on a party showdown; Pedley can't make any inroads on our side by himself. It depends on what this fellow Fenshard does. If he decides he can make anything for himself out of it, 'course he'll jump in."

"What has he to gain?" asked Blake.

"Why, he knows that in this country there's nothing makes an official popular so quick as to prosecute someone, especially someone high up."

At the word "prosecute" Blake winced; his heart came up into his mouth. Matt did have the most reckless way of tossing ugly and suggestive words about; they seemed to have no meaning whatever for him; he was like a man who carelessly handles a gun.

"We're a great people, John, the greatest in the world. I see in a magazine the other night where the English have fox hunts. But we have man hunts. If Fenshard thought he could ride into power that way, he wouldn't hesitate to try, party or no party; you know he never was any too regular. If I could only get something on him. I guess I'll have Hugh Garrett look him up."

The name of Hugh Garrett in this conjuncture was almost as disagreeable as those other words that Matt so recklessly used.

"I'd be careful of having much to do with Garrett just now," Blake suggested.

"OH, THUNDER!" exclaimed Matt, in disgust. "There's no danger. Besides, he's got some votes in the Senate. I don't give Pedley more'n four votes at the outside. And we can easily make those up. Barney McGuire's got three in the Senate, you know. And then I can make old Morris come on from Washington and give us a boost, if necessary. It may be a tie, and, in that case, old Lewis has the casting vote. He'll play the game. Oh," Matt concluded, in a burst of hopefulness, "I got a card or two in my hand that I can play!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

ILLUSTRATED
BY
T. D. SKIDMORE

Chamber, the crowded galleries, the press gallery crammed with alert reporters, state officials and employees thronging the floor of the Senate, the sergeant-at-arms giving over the effort to exclude them, and, far back, near the cloak-room, against the somber paneling of the wall, the burly figure of Matt Holt, his large face, inscrutable and calm, looking out over the scene that meant so much to him.

Matt's sanguine temperament, his confident manner, inspired Blake with hope.

"But I tell you, Matt," he said, "just let me get out of this scrape and I'm done with politics for ever. I'm sick of it. I want to get out of it."

"Can't do that, John," Matt replied ruthlessly. "You've got to go on. You'll have to take another term."

"Do you think, Matt, that I could be elected again, after this?"

"Elected again!" exclaimed Matt. "You got to be elected again! You got to be vindicated."

Blake shook his head.

"I couldn't be, Matt, after this."

"Oh, thunder!" And Matt laughed. "Why, John, this'll all be forgotten long before that!"

MATT, however, did not succeed in killing the resolution in committee, and a few days later, with ominous promptness, it was voted out with a recommendation that it pass. The resolution was on the calendar, and would be reached within a week.

There was no time to lose, and by day in the cloak-room of the Senate Chamber, by night in the lobby of the Stanley, where so much of the effectual political discussion of the State was carried on, Matt was engaged in the business, so familiar to him, of canvassing for votes.

And, by the end of the week, when Matt came to see the Governor on the eve of the vote, he reported that he had sufficient promises from senators to be sure of defeating the resolution, if they all kept their word.

The scene in the Senate Chamber the following afternoon, as reconstructed later by Squire for the Governor, who waited alone in his chambers for the outcome, was one of those dramatic spectacles that Blake, from his own experience in the Legislature, could easily imagine—a full Senate

The Senate was on the order of bills on third reading, and, as though the body had tacitly decided to heighten the dramatic quality of its proceedings by leisurely delay, it proceeded slowly with its deliberations. The reading-clerk droned out, section after section, the superfluous laws they were making, or the new crimes they were creating, and senators, profiting by the presence of an unaccustomed audience, gratified themselves, if no one else, by making long speeches.

Then, at last, a sudden thrill of interest roused the chamber; the Lieutenant Governor smote his sounding-board with his gavel briskly; and in a new, more spirited manner announced:

"Reports from Special Committees."

THE moment had come. A painful, throbbing stillness fell in the chamber. Pedley moved the adoption of the resolution.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"The senator from Jefferson moves the adoption of the resolution, and the question is: 'Shall the resolution be adopted?' The clerk will call the roll."

The clerk began:

"Allen."

"Aye."

"Anderson."

"No."

"Armstrong."

"Aye."

"Bainbridge."

"No."

It was like that, nip and tuck, down the roll-call, and before the M's were reached it was plain that the result would be very close. Eight of the regulars had broken away under Fenshard's lead—two more than Matt had counted on—and voted for the resolution, though when their votes were recorded Matt did not wink an eye.

McGuire's three senators from the city —Cavanagh, Duffleberger and Slovinski —voted against the resolution; but Matt gave no sign of pleasure. The roll-call went on; Squire had been checking up the votes, and knew now that the result would be a tie, and, as in that event the Lieutenant Governor would have the casting vote and vote "No," the resolution would be lost.

And then suddenly there was a commotion at the back of the chamber; the crowd swayed, gave way, and in an instant Price, in his overcoat, flushed and anxious, came down the wide center aisle to his seat. And through the crowd came Joyce, in a small toque and furs, her cheeks glowing from the sharp air outside, her eyes sparkling with eager interest.

The Lieutenant Governor smote the sounding-board with his gavel, and the roll-call proceeded. The count showed a tie; but Price was standing there. He had dropped his overcoat from his shoulders, and now he held out his hand and addressed the chair.

"Mr. President," he said, "I should like to inquire how I am recorded as having voted."

The Lieutenant Governor looked at the clerk; the clerk turned and said something to the Lieutenant Governor. The Lieutenant Governor said:

"The Senator is recorded as not having voted."

"Mr. President," said Price, "I vote Aye."

BLAKE was pacing to and fro in his chamber, when the door opened, and there was Squire; his white face told its bad news before he could open his mouth.

"How was the vote?" Blake demanded.

"Thirty-five to thirty-four; it was a tie, and Lewis—"

"But Lewis didn't vote for it, did he?"

"No; it was Senator Price."

"Price!" exclaimed Blake, incredulously. "Price! Why, he's—" And then, before he could question Squire further, the door burst open, and there was Joyce.

"Oh, Father," she said; "we got here just in time!"

Squire had tactfully withdrawn, leaving Blake and Joyce alone. Blake sank wearily into his chair, and Joyce, coming to his side, laid her gloved hand on his shoulder. He reached up and gave it a little caress.

"Poor old thing!" said Joyce. "You have had so much to worry you; I felt selfish, away off there and so happy myself. And so I came back to help you all I could. It's not much, I know."

He couldn't repress a slight exclamation, an ironic little "Humph!" and then, regretting that he had betrayed even that much of his feeling, for it was a joy and comfort to have her there beside him again, he drew her head down and kissed her cheek.

"Bless you!" he said. And then, a moment later, in a more matter-of-fact tone: "But, Joyce, delighted as I am to see you—don't you see?"

"What?"

"Don't you know that we have lost, that our enemies carried the day, that the resolution was adopted—and by Laurence's vote?"

Joyce wound her arm round her father's neck and, bending over, kissed him.

"Listen, dear," she said. "I didn't wait to hear the result. I wasn't interested in that. I was interested in you. Laurence didn't vote against you; he voted for you. And I made him."

Joyce left his side and sat down in the chair and leant forward to explain.

"Don't you see, dear, that it would never have done for you to oppose an exposure of something bad—in your administration? I watched all the papers, looking for some word, some statement from you that would dissociate you from this thing; I knew why you wouldn't give it; I knew why you were allowing yourself to be identified with it; it was all because of your feeling for Mr. Holt, for what you considered your loyalty to him.

"I saw that, sitting here day after day, talking to nobody but politicians, you had somehow lost the power to grasp the

Beginning next month

"Houdini—The Master Magician

His Life and Some of His Secrets"

HARRY HOUDINI was the world's greatest magician. No chains, no ropes, no handcuffs, no strait-jackets could restrain him. No locks could bar his entrance to or exit from buildings, vaults, or safes. He was buried under six feet of earth, and, unaided, escaped from that grave. He was manacled, nailed up in a heavy packing case and thrown overboard, and in less than a minute he swam free. The Russian secret police stripped him, searched him, and locked him in a cage used to transport prisoners to Siberia, and in forty-five minutes he walked out.

Seemingly, Houdini defied natural laws. Some students of psychic matters avowed that he could, and did, "dematerialize" himself at will, and then "rematerialize," after having oozed through impermeable substances! But Houdini himself stoutly averred that everything he did was done by dexterity, trickery, strength, and knowledge of magic.

Houdini the man was as interesting as Houdini the magician. You will see, from the story of his life, which begins in THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE next month, that he was a many-sided man. This biography was written by Harold Kellock, from the recollections and documents of Mrs. Houdini and from the magician's own diary.

Mr. Kellock shows you Houdini, the crusader against fake mediums and phony spirit phenomena; Houdini, the devoted son, who never recovered from the grief caused by his mother's death; Houdini, the seeker after truth, who dug deep into mystic matters; Houdini, the romantic husband, who even after thirty-three years of married life still treated his wife as though they were just betrothed; Houdini, the eccentric, who would give five hundred dollars to a stranger, and then worry over the loss of a postage stamp; Houdini, the sentimentalist, who bought the graves of old magicians and provided for their perpetual care; Houdini, the extravagant man, whose love for children and old folks led him into the squandering of money.

A strange, inexplicable, fascinating figure is the one Mr. Kellock presents to you. Don't miss it!

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

At the strange scene, with a surprised and apologetic "Oh!" Joyce shrank back into the doorway whole situation. You didn't know what people were saying. I talked to Laurence about it. He saw it, but he said that there was nothing he could do; he said that, no matter how he voted, he would be accused of voting under your dictation or my influence, at any rate, according to your wishes and in your interest.

"And I said, 'Very well, then; if your vote is to be considered as in my father's interest, then you will go straight back and vote for the investigation; then they can't say that my father fears it, or is controlled by Matt Holt.' You see, it was not Laurence's fault, if there was any fault; he would have stayed away, but I wouldn't let him, for your sake. So, there you are."

"Yes, here I am," said Blake, smiling in a sickly manner, "with an investigation on my hands!"

"No, my dear," Joyce insisted, "not on your hands; on Mr. Holt's hands, where it belongs. People can't say that my father feared an investigation, and Mr. Holt can't say that you haven't stood by him when he got into trouble; and if, as he says, he is innocent, he has nothing to fear, either."

Blake was silent for a moment; he sat and looked at Joyce, in her trim blue traveling suit, her gloves, her small blue toque, her gray eyes shining, her cheeks flushed; she had acquired suddenly, he thought, a new authority—and she was so pretty! Her words, her assurance, her certainty, almost convinced him; perhaps she was right, after all.

But there was Squire again, slipping into the room, carefully shutting the door behind him.

"Matt Holt."

Blake looked at Joyce.

"Shall I go?" she asked. "Had you rather—"

(Continued on page 127)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Eyes Have It

A study of business achievement and the factors back of it, based on my experiences in interviewing hundreds of famous men and women

By Mary B. Mullett

DURING the past ten years I have interviewed about four hundred persons, both men and women. Some of them have been internationally famous. Most of them have been what is commonly called successful. Every one of them has been well worth knowing.

In its never-failing human interest, this job of interviewing people has an inexhaustible fascination for me. Even to the outsider there seems to be a certain glamour about it. My friends, for example, ask innumerable questions; especially about my experiences with famous people: How do I "get to" them? How am I received? How do they act? Are they gracious or grouchy? Do they really seem different from other folks? Are they truly great —or only exceptionally lucky?

I have grown accustomed, even resigned, to being what you might call "vicariously interesting." Mere casual acquaintances, who feel no particular concern about me personally, sit up and take decided notice when they know that my job has brought me into contact with scores of people whom the average person never meets.

Among these usually inaccessible people are the great business men of the country; presidents of railroads, banks, and huge manufacturing industries. Then there are the scientists, doctors, lawyers, ministers, authors, actors, famous stars of the motion pictures.

I have written also about the poor and the unknown; "common folks" who have won neither fame nor fortune; who have not achieved material success, but who, nevertheless, have gained some real victory over life's handicaps.

People are fully as interested in these "common folks," but they are more curious about the others. So I am going to answer here some of the questions oftenest asked me about the great and the near-great persons whom I have met.

As nine out of ten of the people I have interviewed have been men, it is of men that I shall write now. But I will say this: Men and women, as the interviewer sees them, are not radically different. On the whole, women are easier to approach. Often they have less vanity than men. But when they have more, they have a great deal more! Usually, however, they take themselves less seriously than men do.

They are more interested in personal experiences than men are. A man is willing to talk about the business side of his career: he will tell you material details, like the growth of capital involved, the sequence of positions he has held.

A woman senses more quickly that these are only milestones, uninteresting in themselves; that the dramatic human story lies in what has happened along the road between these milestones.

However, in regard to men, there is one rather queer but delightful thing which I shall tell further along in this story.

I am going to answer, first, a question which I think is the wisest one that has been asked me about my work. Incidentally, here is an interesting fact: This particular question, which has come to me in varied forms, was asked by men, not by women.

Some have put it in one form, some in another. But what it amounts to is this:

Is there any outward sign of power, or of exceptional ability, which all "big men" possess in common? Are they all alike in some one respect? If so, what is this one respect?

THESE strike me as very shrewd and interesting questions. For if there is some visible sign of a man's will to achieve, and of his power to gain his purpose, then that sign is a trademark of ability.

I admit that before I set to work on this article I had not seriously attempted to answer these questions, even to myself. When I really faced them, this is what I did:

I wrote out a list of one hundred men whom I have interviewed. Most of them are nationally known. Every one of them has achieved a high position in his calling. They are one hundred men who would be accepted as "top notchers" anywhere.

To tell the truth, I doubted whether I should find any outward sign common to all these widely different men. Yet I did find one! I am surprised that I hadn't spotted it long ago.

Don't misunderstand the word "successful" if I use it in connection with these men. It doesn't refer to their wealth or position. It means that they have "succeeded" in doing their work so well that they are recog-

---

Mary B. Mullett Shares With You Her Adventures as an Interviewer

EVERY reader of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE knows that Mary B. Mullett is one of the most skillful interviewers in the world. But what every reader does not know is that Miss Mullett has written a great many more interviews than have appeared under her name. She has a pen name for interviews with business men, another pen name for scientific articles. "Men do not like to be interviewed by women," she explains, "and I reassure them by saying that the article will appear under a masculine nom de plume. This has helped me to get many a good story!"

In the accompanying article Miss Mullett takes you into her confidence, gives you an intimate look at the manner in which she works. More than that, she tells you something about big men that will be of tremendous value to you, if you care to apply it in your own life. What are they like? She tells you. How do they approach a problem? She answers that question too. Is there any outward sign of power, or of exceptional ability which all "big men" possess in common? She gives you the answer, and that answer is the most significant thing in this fascinating article of hers.

THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE is delighted to print this article by Miss Mullett. She has made scores of others well known, but has been content to remain merely a name to you. The Editor had to urge her to step out of this rôle, and let you know something about her own experiences, as she so often has delighted you with the experiences of others. And when Miss Mullett interviewed herself, she turned the spotlight on one of the most interesting lives she has ever written about!

THE EDITOR.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

nized as leaders in their own spheres.

Outwardly they seem as different from one another as any hundred men chosen at random from all classes. They range from tall to short, from lean to fat. They may be dark or fair; have blue eyes or brown. Their hair may be thick or thin, or they may have almost no hair at all.

They may even be physically deformed. Steinmetz was one of the greatest electricians in the world. I interviewed him three times. And although his head, sunk between his tragically deformed shoulders, forced him to look up at me as we talked, there was no mistaking in him that outward sign of power which is common to all great men.

I have known other men as handicapped physically as the beggar on the streets, who are successful—even as the world counts success. Michael Dowling became the president of a Minnesota bank. Yet he had, in his boyhood, lost both feet, one hand, and most of the other.

Within a few weeks, last year, I had two interviews. One was with Elbert H. Gary, head of the United States Steel Corporation. The other was with Sarnoff, general manager of the Radio Corporation of America. These two men differed in age, in appearance, in origin, and even in race. Gary was born in Illinois, of old New England stock. David Sarnoff is a Jew, born in Russia. He came to this country from Russia as an immigrant boy.

Yet, unlike as they are in many respects, both Gary and Sarnoff have the same outward sign which, I claim, all men of achievement possess.

IF YOU want to find this outward sign, look at a person's eyes! Not for the shape, or the color, or the way they are set; but to read there—if it is there—the evidence of one trait.

This trait is concentration. When you look for it—and find it—it will be as plain to you as the man's nose on his face.

The hundred men whose names I put down on my list are different not only in appearance, but in temperament, tastes, education, experience. But they have this one thing in common: a look in their eyes which shows intense concentration of mind.

I believe that is the great secret of their power. Other men have energy, ability, integrity, personality, and yet fail to reach the heights these men have gained.

Put half a dozen lights in a row and you get a pleasant effect.

But take a powerful lens that will focus these rays at one point and you get a dazzling light with heat enough to burn its way through an obstacle.

The chief difference between successful and unsuccessful men is this difference between concentration of mind and the lack of it. Some men seem to hammer at random. Others concentrate on one spot, and every blow counts.

The men I have interviewed, who had real achievement to their credit, had also this look which showed mental concentration. It isn't simply directness, for all honest men look you straight in the eye. And it isn't mere intensity, for a man who knows he is on the verge of failure has a look that is piercingly intense.

It is the look of a man who knows what he wants to do and who has focused his mind on that one thing.

Some of the successful men I have met looked tired. A few looked terribly tired. But they had not lost this power of mental concentration.

I know men who have lost it. Sometimes through overwork; sometimes through "letting themselves go" in one way or another—drink, for example, or speculation, or sport, or perhaps worry.

They still have the very same equipment of talent and ability with which they began their careers. But they are incapable of mental concentration; and unless they can recover this power of concentration they have reached their finish.

I have been asked dozens of times whether it is hard to get famous people to "open up" and talk about themselves. That depends somewhat on the individual; but it depends less on who he is than on what he is.

Almost invariably, actors or motion picture stars welcome the interviewer. They need and want publicity. Personally, they may not care about it. Professionally, it is to them as manna from heaven.

Most of them are eager to tell their story. Yet to interview a stage star, for THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, is not so easy as it sounds.

You see, this magazine wants only the truth. But the average actor unconsciously tries to dramatize himself. Let him alone, and he certainly will tell you a wonderful story, mostly about his triumphs! Unfortunately, it may not be his true story, merely the story he wishes were true.

YOU must keep a sharp eye out for these shining bubbles of fiction. You must puncture them and try to dig up the solid, but perhaps less alluring, facts. Even then, some of these involuntary self-dramatists will get the best of you.

But the best of them will not do this. It is a joy, for example, to interview an actor like George Arliss, or an actress like Katherine Cornell. They are typical of the finest men and women in their profession.

They are clear-eyed and honest about themselves. They give you the truth. Not because you demand it, but because they must satisfy their own integrity.

They have another trait which is uncommon: They can stand aside and look at their lives from an outside point of view. They can perceive what is genuinely dramatic in their own experience.

You would be surprised to find how few people can do this. All kinds and classes of persons have said to me: "There's nothing interesting in my life! Nobody will want to read about me!"

If I tried to count on my fingers the business men who have said this I should need as many hands as a centipede has feet. One of the hardest things in the world is to convince a business man that he is "interesting" and to make him see how he is interesting.

The average actor wants to put into his personal story a good deal of drama which doesn't (Continued on page 70)

The names of the men whose eyes are shown here are at the end of this article

Digitized by Google UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Jump!

By Neil M. Clark

OFFICIAL PHOTOGRAPHS, U. S. ARMY AIR CORPS

(Above) Photograph taken immediately after a parachute jumper has left the plane, showing how the "pilot" 'chute opens first, dragging the main 'chute out straight, so that it will fill with air. (In circle) A few minutes later and some hundreds of feet nearer the earth

SERGEANT ARCH ATHERTON of the United States Marine Corps stood on the wing of a speeding airplane, contemplating thoughtfully the sun-bathed earth two thousand feet below. Presently by a nod he signaled the pilot to "cut the gun," and dove calmly into space. By premeditation, he fell for fourteen hundred spinning feet, with the earth rushing toward him at a terrific rate, before making a move to open his parachute.

One other sunny day Sergeant Atherton stood on a high diving platform gazing into the blue waters of the Pacific Ocean, just twenty-five feet below. He hesitated, shuddered, and drew back. "I can't dive," he said to himself; "I won't. I'm scared to!"

And he didn't. As he had done more than once before, he walked away from the diving platform.

'Tis a queer quirk in human nature that the man who bears the reputation of having made a larger number of difficult parachute jumps than any other human being, at all altitudes, from three hundred feet to a mile, and who never has been fazed by any other high place, should find it utterly impossible to nerve himself for a high dive into water. Sergeant Atherton, senior parachute mechanic of the Marine Corps, grinned at the thought.

"It is funny, isn't it?" he said. "I figure it's all mental. There's no reason why I should be afraid of high dives; but I am, and that's that. I suppose it's the same with most people about parachute jumping. If a fellow thinks he's scared, he sure enough is!"

A RARE lad is Sergeant Atherton! His given name is Arch, but naturally, to all his friends and to the host of people who know him by reputation, he is "Archie." Only twenty-three years old he is—the honors of aviation to-day are yielded to young men!—yet into his twenty-three years he has crowded thrills sufficient to satisfy a hundred ordinary men all their lives. He has made many difficult jumps from airplanes for the purpose of determining experimentally the limits of safety in parachute jumping. Sergeant Atherton has undoubtedly fallen farther by premeditation before opening his 'chute, than any other man—he has made remarkable records at spot jumping—he is the one and only man who ever made a jump into the treacherous and deadly air-currents of Yosemite Valley. These are a few of the things. He never has had an accident from which he suffered more than bruises and scratches.

Black-haired, black-eyed, black-mustached, slight of figure—he weighs only one hundred and forty—his skin deeply tanned by service in the tropics, he is a typical member of the traditionally hard-boiled service to which he belongs.

Arch Pell Atherton was born on a farm near the little town of Maquoketa, Iowa, in the year 1904. His family moved to Cedar Rapids when he was a year old, and it was in that city that he went through grammar school and on into, and through the second year of, high school. Arch was fourteen when his father invested practically all of his fortune in land located on an irrigation project in the extreme southern part of Texas, near the Rio Grande. Here the lad, seeing the activities of the Border Patrol Air Service, first found his thoughts turning seriously toward flying as a career. The Texas investment proved disastrous, and the Atherton family returned, nearly destitute, to Iowa. Arch, then eighteen, cast about for a branch of the government service in which he could take up some phase of flying, and chose the Marine Corps.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD

Navy flier photographed while making a "haul-off" parachute jump over Honolulu. The jumper pulls the "rip cord" which releases the 'chute from its pack on his back, and the 'chute instantly snaps out behind, jerking him off into space as it opens

He was sent first to Mare Island, where, according to his own tale, he proved himself such a pest by asking for flying service that he was transferred a long, long ways off: he was sent to the Island of Guam, a little spit of land thousands of miles out in the Pacific, where the United States has a coaling station. Here his duties were purely clerical; to his disgust, he had to pound a typewriter!

A few months later he was transferred again, coming back with the fleet by way of the Philippines, China, and Japan. He spent a month or so at the marine base in San Diego, then was sent by way of the Panama Canal to the principal marine concentration point, at Quantico.

From here, at last he was transferred, on his own application, to the air branch of the service, and was sent to Rantoul, Illinois, to attend the six weeks' training course through which airplane mechanics are put. By taking extra work, however, he remained at the school for about six months.

It was here that he made his first parachute jumps—three in all—and became fascinated with the work. From Rantoul he was sent back to Quantico, and from Quantico, in 1924, to San Diego, where he has been ever since, with intervals out for service in Nicaragua and elsewhere. While advancing from buck private to the rank of sergeant, he has also become the senior parachute mechanic in his entire branch of the service, and has made his remarkable record as a parachute jumper.

"PARACHUTE jumping," Sergeant Atherton began, "as well as parachute work of all kinds, is done by those of us who are in the government service simply for the purpose of finding ways to reduce the hazards of aviation. Stunt jumping for the sake of giving people a thrill occupies an unimportant place in the game.

"The parachute is to aviators, and to passengers on airplanes, just what the life belt is to the crew and passengers aboard a steamer, except that it is more necessary: for in the water many people can manage to keep themselves afloat, for a while at least; but in the air, if a person has to go overboard, he'll never stop until he hits the ground. A parachute, however, will break his fall, and, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, will save him from serious injury, provided he knows only one or two of the most elementary things about using it.

"A lot of splendid work has been done on parachutes in recent years, and they have been perfected to the point where the best of them are practically infallible as to opening, and reasonably fool-proof, when properly folded and operated. In the government service, the wearing of a 'chute is compulsory whenever a flyer goes into the air. Eventually, no doubt, the same regulation will be universal. In premeditated jumps, the army regulations require two 'chutes: a big one on the back, and a smaller emergency pack strapped to the chest, to be used in case the other fails to open. I have never been caught where I had to use the emergency 'chute because of the failure of the big one to open, but I have opened it sometimes, either for test purposes, or to help make a good landing."

EVERY jump, even for a thoroughly experienced parachute man, has its special thrill.

"I remember very well indeed the first jump I made," Sergeant Atherton said. "It was at Chanute Field, near Rantoul, while I was taking the airplane mechanics' course. Making a parachute jump is one requisite for graduation, and three of us were ready for our first jumps at the same time. The day chosen was windy and bad: the wind had a ground velocity, as I remember it, of about twenty-eight miles an hour. The instructor decided to send just one of us up first, to see how bad the wind really was, and, as I was the lightest, he chose me.

"My pilot, Lieutenant Frank Schilt, must have been feeling particularly humorous that day; at any rate, he did his best to give me a cheerful send-off. Reaching a certain point, he banked steeply, pointed over the side, and looked back at me in the rear cockpit with a wide grin on his face. I looked down and saw what he meant—a graveyard! However, I grinned right back at him. He went a little farther, and again turned to grin at me; there was another graveyard below! I answered his grin that time with a sickly smile. Still he wasn't through; a couple of minutes later he went through exactly the same performance and showed me a third graveyard! I didn't even try to smile then: just set my teeth and, I suppose, turned yellow or green, or both.

"I meant to try landing on the airplane landing field, which was the most convenient large bit of open territory in that neck of the woods. I don't know just how long Chanute Field is, but probably it is not less than five hundred yards, and maybe more. The hangars occupy one entire side. Near one of the corners, but off the field, is a dwelling house, while cater-cornered from it, and clear across at the other end, is another dwelling house. I made up my mind to jump when we got over the second house, figuring that the wind would carry me back and that I ought to land somewhere near the middle of the field—the plane always heads into the wind on a premeditated jump.

"When we were two thousand feet up, and directly over the house I had selected, I gave Lieutenant Schilt the signal. He

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

cut the gun; I climbed out of the basket, and dropped. On that jump I didn't try any monkey tricks such as I have since—if you want to call them that. I had my hand on the rip cord when I left the plane, and yanked it without loss of time when I got in the clear.

"Now, the wind had far more force than I had figured. I was carried the entire length of the field and beyond, coming down in a kitchen garden back of the first dwelling house, and wrapping a lot of potatoes and turnips around my neck. After that the instructor decided it was too windy for parachute jumping, and wouldn't let the others go up!

"As I hit the earth, something happened which never has happened to me since: I landed with my back, not my face, in the direction of travel, and before I could stop, turned completely over four or five times in big skitterhops, hitting dry land with nothing but the top of my head and the soles of my feet. It was pretty rough; but the curious part of it was that I felt absolutely no ill effects from it at the time. The next morning, however, I had the very curious and unpleasant sensation of being unable to lift my head off the pillow. I found I could move my arms and legs, and tried to kick myself up into a sitting posture; but it was no use. I finally had to yell for one of my buddies to come and lift my head, so I could get up and put on my shoes. My neck stayed stiff and sore for several days; but, luckily the trouble was purely muscular. I never made another such landing.

"AS IT happens," Sergeant Atherton went on, "I also have a very vivid recollection of my second jump, also at Chanute Field. I decided to do a little experimenting for my own satisfaction, without saying anything beforehand. Accordingly, I let myself fall for about eight hundred feet before pulling the rip cord and opening the 'chute. At that time, not much had been done, at least at Rantoul, in the way of long free-falls. I hit right in the middle of the landing field, and the instructor, who had been watching, came hopping across the field with a mob at his heels. I suppose he had been scared when the 'chute didn't open the first hundred feet or so; but the scare turned to mad as soon as he saw I was safe, and apparently had done it on purpose. When he reached me he had blood in his eye, and was fairly boiling.

"'Why, you—you little runt!' he sputtered.

"I grinned at him.

"'What do you mean,' said he, 'by pulling a stunt like that?'

"'Well, I got down all right, didn't I?'

"'Turn around!'

"I wondered why; but it was an order, so I turned around. Without ceremony, he planted a good swift kick square on the seat of my pants!

"Luckily, I had loosened the snaps and was free from my 'chute; otherwise, I'd have ended that day pretty sore. As it was, I had to leg it for the hangar to keep everybody else on the field from enjoying a free kicking bee at my expense!"

THERE are two ways of making a premeditated jump from a plane, known respectively as the haul-off (in the army, they call it a "pull-off") and the free-fall. In the haul-off, the jumper pulls the rip cord while he is still on the plane, and allows the 'chute to fill and pull him off; in the free-fall, he steps, dives, jumps, or gets off any way he pleases, and pulls the rip cord in mid-air.

"For a novice," said Sergeant Atherton, "either way is apt to be somewhat terrifying; but, as with my own dislike of a high diving board, I think the fear is wholly mental. I'm not afraid when I jump, and never have been, and that is not meant to be boastful. I know the 'chutes I am working with, and I am always extremely careful to see in advance that everything is in proper order. Every man who works with me has to make at least one jump; I don't want him unless he has confidence enough in the things he is working with to use them himself.

"I've taken a lot of these fellows up for their first jumps, and often jump with them to give them confidence, and I know pretty well how they act. There seldom is a fellow who isn't fairly nervous and teetery the first time. I had one young fellow who, I thought, sure was going to faint: he was making a haul-off jump, and his hands slipped lower and lower on the strut he had hold of, and he was just about to fall.

"I ought to explain that in the haul-off, the jumper usually stands on the lower wing with his back against one of the struts until he is ready to jump. Then he shifts around behind the strut, with the seat of his trousers over space and holding onto the strut by one hand; it takes some little muscle to do that, with the rush of wind against him. With his other hand he pulls the rip cord of the 'chute. Very quickly the 'chute fills and pulls him off the plane: unless the craft is a big one, the pilot kicks the tail around just as he leaves, to avoid a tangle.

"The strongest man in the world could not hang onto a strut after the 'chute opens. But, just the same, nearly every jumper tries it. I've seen men hug it as if it were their best friend, and as a result come to the ground with bloody forearms and their jackets in tatters from the elbows down. The minute a man pulls his rip cord, he's going to leave the plane; that's all! (Continued on page 96)

(Above) Sergeant Atherton with a Russell valve parachute in a pack on his back. This is one of the latest and fastest-opening 'chutes. The sergeant's hand is on the "rip cord" which opens the 'chute. (Left) Atherton with a Russell 'chute held open on the ground to show its construction and size. The pack is shown hanging open on his back

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

More Letters To Louise

By Robert Quillen

EDITOR'S NOTE: Some months ago, this magazine printed several "Letters to Louise," written by Robert Quillen to his thirteen-year-old daughter. Recently he has written others, giving her his opinion on various phases of life as she must meet it. Four of his latest letters are printed below.

MY DEAR LOUISE: This will be a hard letter to write, for I must choose the words and phrases that will make clear to you a tremendous idea that millions of intelligent people have failed to understand.

It is said by many people that a child's character is formed by the time it is nine years old. If that is true, your foundation is complete. You will get knowledge from the schools and wisdom from life, but in a very large sense you are now what you always will be.

At my age, time passes quickly; but from thirteen to twenty-one is a long, long journey, and I wish to give you, as equipment for the journey, this age-old idea that has been at once the despair and the guiding star of the human race.

Before I tell you about the idea, I must explain some of the processes of Nature.

The seed, you know, as a seed dies; out of its heart a great plant grows. The smaller thing loses itself to produce the greater thing. That is the plan of the universe. That is Nature's way, and you cannot combat Nature's way without getting into trouble.

The word "nature" doesn't mean the trees and the grass and the wild creatures —and these only. It includes you and me —our appetites and the way our minds function; and the laws of Nature govern our bodies and our minds just as much as they govern the grass seed.

And the law of Nature—the plan of Nature for man's welfare—is that he shall be lost and incorporated into something bigger.

I know that isn't clear yet, but wait. I'll go back to the big idea I just told you about, and tell you something about the great teachers who gave it to the world.

About five hundred years before the beginning of our Christian era there lived in China a man named Confucius, a man who had no desire for wealth or power, but desired only to serve his fellows.

He served by teaching, and the idea he taught was this: The way to happiness is to forget self. He taught many other things that men needed to know, and need to know still, but the golden thread that wound through all his teachings was a plea for unselfishness.

At almost the same time there lived in India a man whose name was Gautama. He hungered for wisdom and understanding, and these came to him, and brought him peace.

He taught also, and his teaching was that man should overcome self, should overcome the selfish desire for things to gratify the senses, the desire for wealth and power, even the desire for immortality, and thus, by overcoming self, and thinking only of others, he would find peace and happiness.

Five hundred years later appeared Jesus of Nazareth, whom you know, and He taught unselfishness. As a warning against selfishness, He said: "Whosoever would save his life shall lose it."

These three now have millions of followers. The unselfishness taught by them in the beginning is preached to-day much more than it is practiced, but the great truth remains true, no matter how much men may neglect it, and that truth is this: The way to happiness is to lose yourself in something greater than yourself.

THE man who loses himself in his work is happy, and the man whose mind dwells on the hard necessity that requires him to work is miserable.

The man who devotes his life to any good work finds happiness, and those whose only concern is to amuse themselves are for the most part bored.

No life is free of anxieties and troubles. To think of these is to court unhappiness. But to forget yourself—to "lose" yourself, to keep your mind off yourself and to think always of your work, of those who depend on you, of those you can serve—is to find the truest happiness you ever can know.

If you would save your life, my dear, you must lose it. Happiness isn't to be found by searching for it, for to search is a form of selfishness. Happiness comes only to those who take no thought of happiness.

If you run after birds, they fly away from you, but if you sit quietly in the woods they draw near and become your friends.

I want you to be happy, dear; and I can promise you, on the word of many great teachers, that you will be happy throughout the whole of your journey, if you will keep your mind off Louise and think about something of more importance.

As a general thing, unhappiness is just a case of selfishness feeling sorry for itself. And there's a yellow streak somewhere in the vicinity. Love,

OLD DAD.

Letter Number 2

MY DEAR LOUISE: As you grow older, a fence appears to keep us apart; and the fence is not of my building, nor of yours. It is one of Nature's little tricks. She must wean children from their parents, else all the people of the earth would huddle in one community, and there starve to death.

You don't notice the fence, of course. You live for the most part in a world of your own, and your mind is occupied with your studies and your friends.

I seem very old to you; but I am not too old to remember my own boyhood, and I remember that I was very busy from morning until night, and seldom had time to think about my parents. The world of grown-ups did not interest me, and parents were people to be obeyed, or circumvented. They did not understand the value of a piece of string, nor could they understand why the lumberyard afforded more romance and adventure than one's own back yard.

The fence that keeps us apart becomes more and more apparent, and I dread and hate it.

A few years ago, before I began to understand these things, I thought I could hold you forever by giving and giving and giving. But hearts are not to be won or held that way.

One day—I confess it humbly and ask forgiveness of the gods—I wanted you to be with me, and you wished to leave and play with your little friends. I was jealous of them, and because I was impotent I reproved you and charged you with ingratitude.

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth is an ungrateful child!" True enough; but why expect a child to be grateful? One cannot be grateful unless one is conscious of having received a favor; and children take the bounty of parents for granted, as they take for granted the air they breathe and the sunshine that makes their days happy.

I am wiser now, and ashamed because I mentioned gratitude. I don't want your affection as the payment of a debt. I want it as a gift. And I want it more than I want anything else in this world.

You have no idea how many parents are heart-hungry. They do all they can for their children, and depend on their children for happiness. And when the children find their own happiness among strangers, and come to regard home as no more than a place to eat and sleep, their parents literally hunger for a return of the love they give in such boundless measure.

WHEN I was sixteen years old, I knew how to make a living as a printer, and I thought I knew everything else. There didn't seem to be room in one small newspaper office for both Dad and myself, for he had old-fashioned ideas whose only virtue was their reasonableness, and I had bright new ideas that were blissfully idiotic.

I left home and tramped weary miles until my feet bled, and I learned how uncomfortable a stomach can feel when it has been empty for two days. I suffered for my sins; but Dad and Mother suffered more, and I never would have forgiven myself if kind fortune had not given me the privilege of caring for them in their old age.

Children aren't heartless. They just don't understand.

This morning Frank Welborn called Nona, who is your (Continued on page 176)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Scattergood Causes A Snake To Bite

A story

BY CLARENCE BUDINGTON KELLAND

Illustrated by Paul Meylan

SCATTERGOOD BAINES stopped and regarded the young man who approached him. "Martin," he said, "I been kind of eying' you for three-four days."

"Have you, Mr. Baines?"

"Uh-huh. You got a look about you, Martin, seems as though. Kind of doleful-like. I dunno when I see a young feller carryin' around sich a downcast face. And you goin' to git married and all!"

"Hain't goin' to git married," said Martin Roth.

"Lucy hain't give you the mitten? She hain't picked her another feller?"

"Tain't Lucy."

"You hain't been and busted it off yourself?"

"It's Pa," said Martin.

"Oh, it's Pa, eh? And what's Pa been a-doin'. Eh? What's your pa been up to?"

"I can't seem to make out," said Martin. "But I calc'late he's had him some bad luck or other. Pa, he don't say much."

"No. Your pa, he's got a close mouth. Dunno's I ever see a closter. But what's his bad luck got to do with your marryin' a wife?"

"I allus worked for Pa," said Martin.

"Seems as though," said Scattergood.

"And Pa, he allus promised me a farm. When I got to be twenty-five, or got married; and he was goin' to give me a farm of land. Eighty acre."

"Calc'late I heard that before."

"And now," said Martin, "he can't make out to do it. He hain't got no money to buy no farms."

"And you hain't got no money to support no wife."

"No, sir."

"Um. . . . Now what you think of that! Your pa short of money! Got any idee what his bad luck was? I hain't heard no word of it."

"He's been all-fired touchy fer quite a spell over suthin'," said Martin, "but he hain't said what."

"Calc'late I'll have to have me a talk with him," said Scattergood. "When was you calc'latin' on marryin'?"

"The day was all set jest a month off."

"Kind of disapp'intin'," said Scattergood. "Young folks is mostly disapp'inted when their weddin's is postponed, and married folks sometimes is disapp'inted because they wa'n't postponed longer. . . . G'-by, Martin. G'-by."

"G'-by, Mr. Baines."

Scattergood proceeded at his leisurely amble until he reached the door of the bank. Here he turned in and walked around behind the cashier's cage, where Ovid Nixon was deep in financial matters.

"Mornin', Ovid," said Scattergood.

"Mornin', Mr. Baines."

"Jest see Martin Roth. Seen much of his pa lately?"

"Off and on."

"Puttin' in or takin' out?"

"Takin' out."

"Um. . . . Much?"

"Consid'able. I call to mind a thousand dollars a couple of times."

"Cash?"

"Yes, sir."

"Any report he's been speculatin'?"

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He paused before the door, hesitating even at the last minute, ready to draw back at the least warning of danger

"No, sir."

"Say what he wanted of this here money?"

"Didn't say nothin' a-tall."

"Ovid, I want you should go to the ledger and give me a report of Roth's deposits and drawin's for a year back."

"Yes, sir," said Ovid. And presently he returned with a slip of paper in his hand which showed that Charles Roth's balance a year before had been something over twelve thousand dollars, but to-day was less than twelve hundred dollars. It had been withdrawn at fairly regular intervals of about a month, in sums of a thousand.

"Allus in cash," said Ovid.

"Don't sound like Roth," said Scattergood. "I've knowed him twenty years and better, and he wasn't a man to be usin' up money careless. Now, I declare if I don't wonder what he done with it?"

"That lawyer over to Higgins Bridge might know," said Ovid. "I call to mind he was in here with Roth twice."

"Um. . . . That tall, ganglin' feller with the straggly whiskers?"

"Him," said Ovid.

Scattergood puffed out his cheeks and shut one eye thoughtfully. "Ovid," he said, with the air of one making a tremendous decision, "I calc'late I'll be gittin' along! G'-by."

"G'-by, Mr. Baines."

SCATTERGOOD stood on the corner for a moment, peering up and down the street; then he turned to the right and walked half way up the hill, mopping his forehead from time to time with the huge blue handkerchief with white polka dots which he kept in his hip pocket. He stopped before the gate of a white picket fence and peered inside. A spare elderly man was working in the garden.

"How be ye, Charlie?" asked Scattergood.

"Mis'able," Mr. Roth admitted.

"Don't interfere with your workin' none, seems as though."

"Meal times keep a-comin' around."

"A man as well fixed as you be ought to commence takin' a rest."

"I calc'late the only rest I'll ever git'll be in the grave!"

Scattergood cleared his throat and thrust his thumbs inside his suspenders. "'Tain't often a body meets up with anybody as cheerful as you be," he said. "I jest come up from the bank."

"Prosperin', hain't it?"

"Middlin'. . . . Um. . . . Charlie, I jest kind of happened to take a look at your account."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Did ye?" asked Mr. Roth noncommittally.

"I done so. That's how I come to climb this here hill on a hot day."

"Bank got anythin' to complain of?"

"Nary thing."

"You got anythin' to complain of?"

"Not so fur. I'm jest curious, Charlie. You never see sich a feller as I be for wantin' to find out."

"Allus do it?" Mr. Roth asked dryly.

"Gen'ally."

"But the's times when you don't."

"Some. . . . I'm hopin' this here hain't one of them times. Charlie, for a year you been drawin' out. Along about once a month you been gittin' a thousand dollars in cash—till the' hain't much left."

"Hain't no use denyin' it."

"Been investin', Charlie? Buyin' stocks or suthin'?"

"No."

"Hain't lost it playin' cribbage, have ye?"

"I never gamble none."

"Didn't think so. And ye didn't spend it for new suits of clothes, neither, did ye?"

"No."

"Or endorse anybody's notes?"

"I hain't that big a fool."

"Didn't figger ye was. . . . Um. . . . Jest see Martin, Charles."

"My Martin?"

"Him. He wasn't lookin' happy. I asked him what was gnawin' on him, and he let on he wasn't goin' to marry like he planned."

"He hain't."

"Because," said Scattergood, "you couldn't make out to buy him no farm like you agreed. He wa'n't complainin', Charlie, and the' wa'n't no suggestion of hard feelin's to'ard you. He was jest sorry."

"Martin's a good boy, Scattergood."

"It would be a pressin' need, Charlie, that would make a man use up money so's he couldn't keep his word to his son."

"Seems as though, Scattergood."

"Um. . . . Know Lawyer Downs, over to Higgins Bridge?"

"Some."

"Admire him, Charlie? He's the sort of a feller you'd be eager and willin' to do business with?"

"He's the sort of feller I'd like to ketch sight of through the sights of a rifle," said Mr. Roth in a voice which lost for an instant its restraint.

"Um. . . . Me—I never could stummick the way his whiskers kind of straggles all over his chin. But I hain't never ketched him in no meanness—yit."

"Folks hain't apt to," said Mr. Roth.

"G'-by, Charlie," Scattergood said abruptly.

"Wa'n't the' suthin' you wanted to know, Scattergood?"

"Calc'late I lost my appetite for it. G'-by."

Scattergood returned with deliberate steps to the piazza of his hardware store, where he dropped puffing into his specially reinforced chair and fanned himself heartily with a palm-leaf fan. Presently, desiring to exercise freely his mental faculties—and to enjoy to the full what breeze blew down the valley—he might have been seen sitting shoeless, with pudgy toes wriggling in the shade.

He sat so for half an hour, motionless except for the rhythmic swaying of the fan. At the end of that time he had sorted and arranged his meager facts, chief among which was his lifelong knowledge of the characters of the persons involved, and a keen judgment of how each would act in given circumstances. These facts he set to one side in a neat row, and deduced from them certain conclusions:

First, and most important, Charles Roth would like to see Lawyer Downs through the sights of his rifle.

Second, Downs had been with Roth more than once when he had drawn money.

Third, Roth had been worried by Scattergood's questioning, and Roth was not a man to be worried easily. If he had told Scattergood to mind his own affairs, the old hardware merchant would have been easier in his mind.

These were the salient facts. The conclusions were that Downs was involved; that Roth had reason to hate Downs; that Roth had something to conceal.

And, again, from this set of conclusions Scattergood evolved a sort of apex to the pyramid, which was that Downs was practicing some sort of extortion which was approaching the point of bringing Roth to desperation. The situation was ominous, and Scattergood did not like ominous situations involving old friends in Coldriver.

He would have liked it less if, that night, he could have seen Charles Roth, in the secrecy of his bedroom, oiling and cleaning his rifle.

SCATTERGOOD, always an early riser, was in his store when most of Coldriver was still at breakfast. He piddled about the front of the store waiting for Martin Roth to pass on his way to his father's farm, for he knew that any information to be had from that family must come from the boy, and not from his father.

Presently Martin trudged along with his dinner pail, and Scattergood accosted him.

"Mornin', Martin."

"Mornin', Mr. Baines."

"Had a talk with your pa yestiddy, Martin. Had quite a talk."

"He didn't mention it."

"He wouldn't, seems as though. Your pa's worried, Martin."

"I seen that."

"Martin, I've knowed ye since ye was a baby, and near's I kin make out, you been

Mr. Downs looked uneasily at the He was in the enemy's hands—

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

a perty dependable boy. But you never can tell by the color of a frog which way he calc'lates to jump.. Been a-jumpin' anywheres you hadn't ought to of, Martin? Eh? Into any muddy water, like you might say?"

"Hain't had no time, even if I had the inclination," said Martin, and Scattergood was satisfied, for the boy's eyes were clear and his expression one of surprise. If there had been signs of guilt, Scattergood would have seen them.

"Um. . . . Dew tell! Glad to hear it, Martin. Uh-huh. Hear from your brother James lately?"

Martin frowned. "Jim, he don't write reg'lar."

"Where's he workin'?"

"Seems like he moves around consid'able. I calc'late he hain't made out to settle down yit in any one place."

window. It was black outside. and guilt was on his conscience

"Lemme see, when was it he went off?"

"Jest over a year ago."

"What was his plans then?"

"He jest went," said Martin. "He didn't tell no plans to me. It come up sudden-like. I dunno what got into Jim. He jest up and off."

"And," said Scattergood, drawing a conclusion, "you and your pa, you hain't heard nothin' a-tall from him since then?"

"No," admitted Martin.

Scattergood cleared his throat, seemed on the point of asking another question, and then dismissed the young man with characteristic abruptness. "G'-by, Martin."

"G'-by, Mr. Baines."

It was clear to Scattergood now. James Roth had been guilty of some foolishness or some wickedness—or, better still, had been tricked into some damaging conduct—and had run away.

And Charles Roth had brought himself to the brink of ruin for the sake of his son, and to keep unspotted the name of Roth.

"Um. . . ." said Scattergood. "Um."

YOUNG Ovid Nixon, cashier of the Coldriver Savings Bank, was conducting himself in an inexplicable manner. His conduct, to put upon it the most charitable interpretation, was sly. He was telephoning; but he had driven no less than five miles from town to reach an instrument over which he could talk in safety and without danger of his call being discovered. . . . And he was talking to Lawyer Downs, of Higgins Bridge.

"Mr. Downs?" he asked.

"Yes. Who's speaking?"

"Nixon, of the Coldriver Bank."

"Go ahead, Nixon."

"A man's got to protect himself, hain't he?" Ovid asked.

"Why, offhand, I'd say that was a safe course."

"Wal, that there's why I'm callin' you. I dassn't trust any Coldriver lawyers. But you hain't tied up to nobody in this town, be ye?"

"No."

"Then I want to see ye, quick. And I don't want nobody to know I seen you."

"Where are you now?"

"I'm callin' from my uncle's farm, and nobody's to home. They're all down to Bostin."

"I know the place. Stay there and I'll drive over. Be there in less than an hour."

Mr. Downs, scenting some business after his own heart, ran out his automobile and drove with pleasant thoughts to the place of rendezvous. Nixon awaited him in the dooryard and led him into the unlighted house, where, after carefully drawing the shades, he touched a match to the wick of a lamp and faced the lawyer over a table.

"If anything goes wrong in a bank," he said, "it's gen'ally always the cashier gits blamed."

Downs's small eyes gleamed. "You may state that as the rule," he said, and waited.

"W-al, the's suthin' queer to our place. I can't make out jest what it is; but I seen things from time to time, and I noticed changes into the books that I never made, and it looks to me like the' was manip'lation. I wouldn't say exactly 'thout goin' over the books and all for a month, but jest estimatin' and figgerin', I come to the conclusion mebbe the's along between fifty and a hundred thousand that needs accountin' fer."

"Suspect anybody?"

"A feller's got to save his own skin, hain't he?"

"It's his first duty."

"Dog-gone, I kind of hate to do it. He hain't never done nothin' to me, and the's things he's done fer me. But I dassn't take no chance of bein' sent to jail for what another feller done."

"I should say not!"

"And the' hain't nobody else got the opportunity he's got, neither. I know it hain't me done it, so it must be him."

"You mean?" (Continued on page 174)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Dead Broke

By Albert Payson Terhune

I WAS sitting on a bench in Gramercy Park, in New York City. It was a stiflingly hot summer morning in 1896. The day was Sunday. I was in my early twenties. I had a handkerchief-sized, semi-attic room at the top of the Gramercy Apartments. That is how I happened to be sitting in Gramercy Park.

All dwellers in the Square, in those days, had private keys to the enclosed park. This to the more or less open envy of passers-by from less favored districts. I had a grave financial problem to solve as I sat there, that Sabbath morning. In my pocket reposed fifteen cents. All my friends, at that torrid season, were out of town. There was nobody from whom I could borrow enough cash for a square meal.

My problem was to make fifteen cents last me until the following day, when the "Evening World" office, where I worked, should be open once more. I could get then the few dollars I needed to tide me over to the next pay day. I had helped out office mates in the same predicament; and I knew they would help me.

But, for the next twenty-four hours, fifteen cents was my sole earthly capital. It must serve me for Sunday and Monday breakfasts and for Sunday lunch and dinner; besides paying my car fare to the office next day.

I could eke it out to three five-cent meals, over at a horrible joint on Avenue A, where a thick hunk of bread and a pint of some liquid, wittily nicknamed coffee, could be bought for five cents. Or I could go to the creamery on the corner of Third Avenue and Twentieth Street and squander the entire sum on a filling if uninspiring "dairy lunch."

In either case, there must be from one meal to three meals skipped; and, Monday, I must walk, empty, all the way to the office.

To while away the time and to postpone my decision, I looked over my mail, which had been handed me as I left the house. The first envelope held a circular letter from an investment firm that had picked my name at random from the City Directory. It began: "Will you not give us the privilege of glancing over your list of securities that we may advise you which to sell and which to keep?"

Then, looking up from this ironic perusal, I saw a ragged old woman staring at me through the bars of the park fence. She was a loathly crone, better fitted in dress and aspect to play the hag in a Bowery melodrama than to take a part in real life. I suppose she had come thither from the river-edge slums, a few blocks to eastward.

"Kind gentleman," she whined, "I ain't ate nothin' at all since yest-day."

"Neither have I," I answered cheerfully, and I think with more truth than she had employed.

My reply infuriated the old dame. Apparently, she thought I was guying her; I, who sat at ease in the shade, there in that closed-to-the-public parklet. For she gripped the iron fence rails and shook them savagely, as she screeched at me:

"The time's comin' when you dirty millionaire swells will be just as poor as the likes of me!"

Seldom is a prophecy fulfilled so swiftly. Ten seconds later, this particular "dirty millionaire swell" was precisely fifteen cents poorer than "the likes of her." For her raging diatribe all at once made me feel so rich that my jingling fifteen cents didn't seem worth keeping. So I gave them to her. I was a "millionaire swell." Someone on earth envied me my seeming wealth. That glorious sensation was cheap at fifteen cents. It gave me a queer little glow for the remainder of the foodless hours.

Of course, at the time of this anecdote, I was not "dead broke" in the most complete sense of the word. For I had a room, such as it was, to sleep in. I had a job of sorts—even though at that time the bulk of its tiny salary went to the paying of debts. Nobody was dependent on me. If I had chosen to follow the unsportsmanlike example of the Prodigal Son, I could have gone to my parents for any reasonable help.

So I was infinitely better off than was many a man with whom my impecuniosity brought me into contact. Yet, that very impecuniosity gave me a chance to study at first hand the phase of life I call "dead-brokeness;" and to learn much, thereby, which has remained with me throughout the years.

I LEARNED strange life lessons in those long ago cashless days. They are lessons whose mighty value I should like to pass along to others.

Dead-brokeness, I think, is the supreme acid test of human character. It makes or breaks; and it reveals much which otherwise would remain forever hidden. Almost I would recommend a brief experience in it to every youth starting out in life, as part of his truest education. But I would recommend it with reservation.

Old-time fathers taught their children to swim by throwing them into deep water. Most of the youngsters emerged with a practical knowledge of swimming. But there were a few who never emerged at all.

Dead-brokeness is the deepest of deep water. Not all who are plunged therein emerge. And some crawl out with the mud and slime of the river bed sticking forever to them. Yet I think the big majority swim ashore cleaner and stronger and wiser—and certainly more comprehending—for their struggle.

When I speak of those to whom the bottom-mud adheres, I don't mean only those who cannot (Continued on page 109)

Hunger

By Arthur Guiterman

NEARER and dearer than brother to brother,
Closer and closer we cleave to each other,
We that were partnered in trouble and sorrow,
Need of the instant and dread of to-morrow,
We that were caught in our fever and yearning,
Grist for those millstones relentlessly turning—
Earth is the upper and Hell is the nether—
Friend of my soul, we were hungry together!

Grim was the world, and unflinching we dared it;
Hope was our all, but it grew as we shared it;
Cold was the winter, the city was colder;
Stoutly we challenged it, shoulder to shoulder,
Rich in our strength though our purses were meager,
Gallant adventurers, weary but eager,
Pounding the pavement and wasting shoe leather.
Friend of my youth, we were hungry together!

Love is to us no mere matter for prattle!
Comrades were we in the stress of the battle,
Comrades if Fortune were servant or master,
Comrades in victory, doubt, and disaster.
Life, from the sweet and the bitter behind us,
Wove a firm bond to unite us and bind us;
Nothing can loosen or weaken the tether.
Friend of my heart, we were hungry together!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Photograph by Jessie Tarbox Beals

Albert Payson Terhune

MR. TERHUNE has had an extraordinary chance to observe the human race, and he has made the most of it. For years he was a newspaper man in New York City; he has traveled and lived abroad; he has studied in many fields of knowledge. Out of such a rich experience he wrote the article which begins on the opposite page. Mr. Terhune is one of the most popular authors of the day, his dog stories and other works being widely read. This picture shows him with one of his famous Sunnybank collies, at his home, Pompton Plains, New Jersey.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Photograph by Versluis & Pancoast

OLE EVINRUDE designed the first widely used outboard motor, and is now one of the largest manufacturers of these devices. The idea for the portable motor came to him one hot day when he rowed several miles for some ice cream. "Why doesn't somebody invent something to propel a rowboat?" he asked himself, and after long experimentation and hard times he answered his own question by making an outboard motor. Mr. Evinrude was born in Norway, and now lives in Milwaukee. He and his wife are partners in business as well as in life. (Left) Mr. Evinrude's son racing in an outboard motor-boat.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He Invented A "Fool Novelty" That Founded A New Industry

By Sherman Gwinn

"I'M supposed to be a business man, but I'm not," said Ole Evinrude; "I'm the kind of man who needs a partner, and who found a good one." A solid mountain of a man, he sat in the office chair opposite me, a man of fifty with a boyishly round face, infinitely earnest and shy blue eyes, and big, restless hands. His brow, in a head frankly bald, was seamed under the ordeal of discussing himself.

"Alone, I don't believe I'd ever have amounted to much," he struggled on, with blunt honesty. "I've no head for business details, can't seem to set my mind to 'em. Give me a pencil and a drawing board, or shut me up with a workbench and tools, and I'm happy; but I can't sell, I can't talk. I'm no business man at all."

Across from him sat his partner—small beside his bulk, bright, eager, and alive, keenly confident. Ole Evinrude looked at his partner and his eyes lighted. The partner was a woman, and his wife.

Enthusiasm came into Ole Evinrude's voice. "Alone, I failed; but together, Bess and I, we've done things. We've built a home and raised a son there, and we've made something big out of this business. What I've lacked, and it's been a-plenty, Bess has supplied."

"And what I have lacked, Ollie has supplied," Bess Evinrude added eagerly. "I know the office, but he knows the shop. I can sell only what he makes. He has been the power back of me."

I had come to hear the story of a remarkable man; but while the rain pounded away that autumn day I stayed to hear a tale far more entrancing: the story of a perfect partnership.

If you have ever fished, or hunted where streams are the only roads, or been about the water at all, the name of Evinrude will have a familiar ring to you. For seventeen years it has been linked with the outboard motor, that little gasolene power device which, when attached to the stern of a rowboat, does away with the necessity of using oars. Ole Evinrude invented and built the first successful motor of this type. These motors have been used on thousands of rivers and lakes throughout the world, by explorers into remote fastnesses, by men of the fishing fleets, by trappers and adventurers, sportsmen and pleasure-seekers, and by rescue parties in times of danger and disaster, such as the Mississippi floods—and won for the inventor a fortune.

Presently I will tell you the romance of the conception of the outboard motor, on a sizzling-hot August day, while Ole Evinrude sweated and puffed during a five-mile row for a quart of ice cream; and of how Bess Evinrude launched the first Evinrude outboard motor venture, in her kitchen, while she cared for a baby and fought sickness and need. But big Ole's story begins before that, on a Wisconsin farm where a lumbering farm boy struggled to build a sailboat, only to have it chopped up for firewood by his father; and yet before that, by a blue lake in Norway where a child played, floating little paper boats.

Ole was born at a farm called Evinrude, not far from the city of Christiania, Norway, and from the farm comes his family name. His father was a sternly practical man, faced unendingly with the problem of finding a living for his household; his mother was of stock whose menfolks for generations had been expert machinists—a gentle, quiet-voiced woman, self-effacing and something of a dreamer. Ole was the son of his mother.

"What I remember first in my life is the lake near by," Ole Evinrude told me. "My memory begins there, playing on its shores and watching the boats. Next, I remember the boat on which we came to America, of how my mother and grandmother were constantly fishing me out of the engine-room, only to have me dash back again. I couldn't stay away from the engines."

Ole was five then, the oldest boy. There were to be eleven children in all. They located on a farm at Cambridge, Wisconsin, near to Lake Ripley. The succeeding years, like those which had gone before, were a mighty struggle to live, a gray routine of work that demanded, and got, the labor of every hand; but here again, out of the grayness, ships are what stand out in Ole Evinrude's memory. Ask him of his boyhood, and he talks of ships.

"I remember an uncle who was a sailor, and who had been to all parts of the world," he went on. "Between voyages he would visit us and tell of his adventures. At times he would whittle toy ships from blocks of wood. 'That is a frigate, Ollie,' he would say, 'This one is a brig.' So he taught me to distinguish the kinds of ships, and my thought was, 'Some day I'll build such ships, only big ones.'"

THE boy read about ships. From what books he could get he studied about them—a boy who was all arms and legs, growing too fast to be strong, and with the dreamy, impractical eyes of his mother. Summers, as he became old enough, he helped his father in the fields, blasting stumps, clearing woodland, digging drainage ditches. During the winters he worked as a sorter in the tobacco warehouses. Out of the money thus earned, he smuggled enough to subscribe for a mechanical-science magazine.

"Trash!" exploded his father. "You need shoes, not books to waste time on."

"Let him be," implored the mother; and Ole, whose thoughts were not on shoes, imparted to her a secret: Out in the woodshed he was building a sailboat; many of the parts were already made, hidden away from his father.

"The boat," he whispered, "is going to be eighteen feet long. Father wouldn't like it if he knew I had used so much lumber. Besides, I had to spend some of my money on it."

THAT boat was never finished, for one day the father discovered it. His quick eyes saw that money had been spent, time wasted—money that should have gone for clothing, time that belonged to undone work. It was Ole's way, pottering about with a dream, when he needed an overcoat. The next time the boy saw those precious parts for his boat they were crackling away in the kitchen fire. "They'll be of some use there," said his father. The mother cried.

But presently, by devious stealth, another boat was under way in the woodshed. Each part, as it took shape, Ole hid away by itself, one piece here and another there until every nook and cranny about was stuffed with them. A few of the parts were discovered, but the father thought they were overlooked parts of the first boat. And one day, after a short absence, he returned home to find a trim craft with snowy sails moored at the landing in the lake. A dozen different kinds of wood had gone into its making, but it was a handsome little craft nevertheless.

"It's mine," confessed Ollie.

Something in the boy's eyes made his father pause, and the older man did a strange thing for him. He placed a work-gnarled hand on his son's shoulder. "I'd hoped to make a farmer of you," he said, "but I guess you're cut out for something better, son. You've built a right nice boat."

That summer a new passenger boat plied back and forth on Lake Ripley, carrying folks for twenty-five cents a ride. Its captain, pilot, crew, and builder were combined in a single shy-eyed youth, who was so engrossed with his task that he sometimes forgot all about collecting his fares. The boat was popular; on Sundays and holidays it netted as much as five dollars.

"That was big money," smiled Ole Evinrude. "I felt like a millionaire."

Ole was now sixteen. That autumn, with his father's consent and his mother's blessing, he went to Madison, Wisconsin, to become an apprentice machinist in the Fuller and Johnson farm machinery shop. His pay was fifty cents a day; his board and room cost (Continued on page 148)

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Eddie did the only thing there was to do: He invited Fussbudget around behind the stables again

A story of the Big War—and of a little private war that had to be settled first

ILLUSTRATED BY TONY SARG

Fussbudget!

By DELOS W. LOVELACE

NEAT? Neat doesn't tell the half of it! Neat is only a starter. That bird was a fussbudget, that's what he was. Absolute! He wanted things neat twice over and wrapped around. You knew that after you took one look at the tight cut of the just-so mouth that went with his bony face and rangy, stiff legs.

The last bozo in the world, of course, to join the army. But what're you going to do when a war comes around, and a draft board calls out numbers? He hadn't been at Camp Dodge a month before A Company thought less of him than of a hike with full packs.

And that was too bad. Because he meant well. His trouble, though, was that he didn't know how to be human. He proved that almost the same minute he blew in with the second draft, and before the old hands, who'd been learning squads right since September, had had a chance to size him up.

He proved it on Eddie Loomis. Ed ambled into the squad-room—he was second draft, too—lugging his new uniform and his new pillow and his new sheets and his new blankets, and asking the sergeant did they think he had canal boats for feet that they passed him out a pair of shoes like that? He was as tickled as a flapper with her first lip-stick. He was dead sure he was going to have a r'arin' good time at this war they'd dragged him into. He was the kind of a guy who'd have a good time on a cake of ice, if you'd let him pick his partner.

"Hello, Buddy!" he said. "I'm Ed Loomis. What's your name?"

"My name," said Fussbudget, "is Charles Spencer."

Not Charlie, understand, but Charles. The way he said it ought to have warned Ed that here was no guy to buddy up to. And there was more warning in the way "My-name-is-Charles" was orienting himself. That bird certainly had taken pains. Brand-new puttees wrapped on neater'n a medico's bandage on a general. Suit case with the cast-off civvies under the right rear of the bunk and field shoes opposite, exactly like the diagram on the squad-room door. And blankets smoother'n a chambermaid at the Ritz could have done them.

Everything about that bird spelled p-e-r-n-i-c-k-e-t-y. Ed, though, was too chipper to take notice. "Call me Ed," he said. "And, say, Charlie! How about you and me going together to pay our official call on the captain, and let him extend the hand of fellowship to us heroes who've come to share this bloody strife with him? Or maybe," he said, "it'd be better just to go buy ourselves a chocolate bar. And, in the meantime," he said, taking a comfortable flop down on the blankets Fussbudget had just finished smoothing, "have you got a cigarette?"

FUSSBUDGET looked at that mussed-up bunk. When his ma put him into pants she certainly spoiled a swell old maid. His big nose jerked. His mouth tightened. "Yes," he said, "I have a cigarette." And to prove it he took one out. And he lit it, putting the burned match back in the box as neat as anything. "And now," he said, "get off this bunk! Do you think I made it up for you to loll on? Get off before I throw you off."

Eddie started a grin. "What!" he said. But when it came to him that this wasn't any joke, he raised his eyebrows and "Oh'ed" his mouth and whistled. And when he saw that he and Fussbudget were about the same height and reach, and that Fussbudget wasn't more than ten, fifteen pounds heavier, he said, "Suppose you try to throw me off . . . Little Friendship."

Well, nobody can say Fussbudget waited for a second invitation. They had a regular bar-room wrestle until a riot call brought two sergeants pulling for all they were worth, and a lieutenant looking stern on the side lines.

"It's as plain to me as the horn on a flivver," said Eddie, squinting out of a black eye, "that I've got to make a human being out of you!"

"It is my opinion," said Fussbudget, doing the neatest job you ever saw with a bloody nose, "that you'll never learn anything. But it won't be because I don't try to teach you!"

And another war was on.

Right there at the start A Company was inclined to give Fussbudget an even break. Of course almost everybody felt he'd been darned snooty. But, on the other hand, they admitted a man had a right to keep his own bunk under glass if he wanted to. And there were some guys, bozos who'd been burned at inspection, who even thought Ed had maybe been a little wrong to flop on it the way he did.

THOSE guys changed their tune, though, and so did everybody else, when Fussbudget really began to be himself. That bird certainly knew how to make trouble. It wasn't forty-eight hours before he'd taken charge of his corner of the squad-room. "Pick up that paper," he'd say to this guy. And, "Who dropped this match?" he'd say to that guy. And, "Act as if you didn't come from a pigpen!"

He was such a big stiff that few guys in the outfit wanted to try trimming him single-handed. But he'd probably have been ganged except for one thing: That was that, even when he had you as sore as a cut thumb, you knew he couldn't help doing what he did. It was as natural for him to be a fussbudget as it is for a general to wriggle a finger instead of snapping back a second lieutenant's salute.

Another thing that kept the outfit off his neck was that everybody felt he couldn't last long.

"Wait!" Eddie said. "Just let the officers get wise to this bird, and he'll be pushing a pencil. He doesn't belong in a machine-gun company. He was born to be a sergeant-major's clerk."

"Eddie's right," said an old-timer, one of the September draft. "We'll go out for gun drill, and the lieutenant'll say, 'On this line! Mount gun!' and Fussbudget'll take eighty-four minutes looking for the line. And then, good night!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

So everybody waited. And got the shock of their lives. Because it wasn't "Good night!" It was, "Welcome!" Absolute! Fussbudget's finickiness was money in the bank when he started drill. He was so keen to get everything exactly just-so that he practiced by himself for hours when the rest of the outfit were doing bunk fatigue, or shooting for shoes for baby. When most of the second draft were still making an "About! Face!" on the wrong heel Fussbudget was drilling like a veteran.

Also, he was getting more and more pernickety. Because he'd learned his stuff a little faster than anybody else, he thought he had a right to say just when everybody should do which. He got so snooty he razzed the non-coms. "You a corporal," he'd say, "and letting your squad's quarters go dirtier than a back alley!" And, "You a sergeant," he'd say, "and going around with your blouse unbuttoned!"

WELL, after he'd pulled a few like that, the gang quit making allowances. Three, four guys tried to tear him limb from limb and scatter his dismembered fragments up and down the camp. But it turned out that, besides being a fussbudget, he had a kick in either fist like an automatic's recoil.

The one guy in the outfit who didn't seem to mind that recoil was Eddie. And it was just about this time that they had their second set-to. The pair of them being the same size, had been put in the same squad. There came along one of the regular Saturday inspections, and Eddie got caught. His condiment can was where his mess kit should have been. Or maybe his extra underpants were folded wrong. Or maybe a tent pin was broken. Or he didn't have a tooth brush. But from the way Fussbudget hollered you'd have thought Eddie'd got the whole company confined over the week-end.

"A fine reputation you'll give us!" said Fussbudget. "If you don't care for yourself, you might have a little consideration for your squad."

"Aw, squad your eye!" said Eddie. And they tangled again. It took four corporals to tear them apart, with a lieutenant standing in the doorway snapping, "What's this? What's this?" As if anybody couldn't see!

"Listen, Fussbudget!" Eddie said; and that was where My-name-is-Charles got his label. "I'm going to make you human if it takes till the end of the war. I'll see you out behind the stables as soon as it's convenient."

"Collect the eighteen strong men you'll need to help you," said Fussbudget. "I'll be glad to teach you the value of a little orderliness."

So they went back of the stables after retreat and battled all four ways and across the middle. But Eddie didn't make Fussbudget human; and Fussbudget found one strong man, instead of nineteen, was plenty. It was an absolutely even break.

They quit just where they had started, except for the way the two of them looked.

"It's plain to me," said the captain, when he saw the results of that interview, "that I'm not being taken seriously

It was the way they looked that got them in Dutch next morning. The captain didn't like the way they looked at all. "If you think," said the captain, "that I'll stand for having raw meat served up at formations, you're due to think again. You, Loomis, and you, Spencer, take those maps into the kitchen for the next few days, and if the cook mistakes them for sirloins, he can fry, and welcome."

EDDIE went on K. P. with a grin. "I saw the look in the captain's eye," he said. "He knows who's in the right. I'll bet a dollar against the hole in any doughnut that it won't be a week before this bird, Fussbudget, is skidded into the depot brigade."

Well, nobody took the bet, which put Eddie one smacker to the good. Because Fussbudget wasn't transferred. After a week he was still shining at drill. And in the squad-room he was worse than cosmoline in a gun.

Eddie did the only thing there was to do. He invited Fussbudget around behind the stables again.

"It's plain to me," said the captain, when he saw the results of that interview, "that I'm not being taken seriously. I don't care how much you two battle, but I'll eat my hat," he said, "before I drill birds who look like you do. Loomis, that eye and that nose win you the job of spreading cinders on the path to battalion headquarters. And that ear, Spencer, and that mouth win you the honor of helping him. What's more," he said, "if you show up again with faces like these, I'll think of something really hard."

Well, spreading cinders was hard enough. Because by now it was well into winter. Eddie and Fussbudget were so darned cold before they finished that they decided they'd better try to stand each other.

And they did stand each other. For about six weeks. But it didn't do any good. Because when they went behind the stables they made up for all the while they'd waited, and a little bit more.

"I'M disappointed," said the captain next morning. "Honestly, I am. With St. Valentine's Day just around the corner I thought you two would be exchanging hearts." He shook his head. "I've explained to the major for the last time why I can't keep men in my company from brawling all over the camp," he said. "If one of you would kill the other, I'd keep the survivor and no questions asked. But I can't stand the two of you. Your days in this outfit are numbered."

He talked as if he was kidding. But he wasn't. The night before an order had come down from Division Headquarters for the company to furnish so many men for transfer.

"Put Loomis and Spencer at the top of the list," said the captain to the first sergeant. "I hate to lose them. They're good men. But they'll get to battling out in front of the general's quarters some bright afternoon, and then I'll have to explain by indorsement hereon."

So, inside of a couple of hours, Eddie and Fussbudget had to roll their packs. They were so sore they went around on their tiptoes. And of course each one put all the blame on the other.

"I'll get somebody for this," said Eddie, giving away all the junk he couldn't take along, "if it's the last thing I do. Just as soon as we're clear of this camp. If I don't sling him under the train—it'll be because I've thought up something worse. I've fooled along all I'm going to. This is in earnest."

"A fine deal!" said Fussbudget, wrapping all his extra things into a neat bundle to send home. "A man does his best, and gets thrown out because he tries to keep a slovenly buck private in order. I'll—"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Say!" said Eddie. "Who're you calling slovenly?"

"You'll find out," said Fussbudget, "before this trip is over."

But Eddie didn't. Because a sergeant from the old Regular Army was in charge of their detail. And, like all the Regular Army sergeants, he had no more use for guys of the National Army than any professional has for any amateurs.

"Listen!" he said. "I know all about you two. And I'm standing for no tricks. If either of you makes a false move I'll crack that baby over the conk with this gun. Don't give me any dirty looks. I will! You're not going to earn me a razzing from the ninety-day wonder in the next coach. I'll bust you good and plenty. And if you so much as raise a finger back I'll see you get life in Leavenworth. At least."

He meant it, too. He was hard-boiled. He kept the length of the car between Eddie and Fussbudget all the way from Camp Dodge to Camp Dix.

Naturally, the two of them were wild to get at each other then. I'll see you back of the wash-house after retreat," said Fussbudget while they were checking in at Dix.

But he didn't. Two hours before retreat, Eddie was on his way to Hoboken. The next morning he was out among the U-boats.

THERE were twelve transports in that convoy. And all the way over Eddie kept looking at the other eleven and wondering was Fussbudget aboard, or was he waiting back of the wash-house at Camp Dix? He didn't know whether it tickled him more to think of Fussbudget frothing at the mouth behind the wash-house at Dix, or taking a sock on the nose in France.

What he really wanted, of course, was to meet Fussbudget in France. That came to him, standing in a mess line at Brest, when he saw Fussbudget march past in a column just coming up from the transports. He let out a yell and started over. But a sergeant hollered, "Hey! Get back in that line!" And by the time Eddie'd explained he was just wanting to get in touch with his pal, the column was gone. He hunted all his spare time.

But Brest was some big camp, and Fussbudget was still missing two mornings later when Eddie was told to fall in with about forty other guys from his barracks who said they were machine gunners, too.

A sergeant marched them out of camp to a railroad siding, where there was a long string of those "Quarante-Hommes-Huit-Chevaux box cars. "Pile in," he said.

"What's the idea?" said Eddie, piling in. "What's up? Tell a guy, can't you?"

"You'll find out soon enough," said the sergeant. "And then you'll be glad I didn't spoil your appetite any sooner'n necessary."

Eddie squinted out. He could see non-coms marching guys down and piling them into the other cars.

All of a sudden it came to him. Absolute! What a dummy he'd been not to get the idea before! The Front! He was going up to the Front as a replacement. That was what was up.

And then it came to him that he was leaving Fussbudget behind without ever giving him that sock on the nose. That made him sore. Because of course he would get into an outfit a million miles away from Fussbudget, and they'd never meet. He got more sore.

Eddie ambled into the squad-room . . . asking the sergeant did they think he had canal boats for feet

He wanted to sock Fussbudget so much that he decided he'd slide out of the car and cut back to the camp. And he did get a leg onto the ground. But a non-com hollered, "Get back into that car, Dummy! Do you want to lose a leg?"

AND then the train started. It jiggled along all day. And all night The next morning a guy threw in some corned willie and some bread, and once there was a stop long enough for the guys to fill their canteens.

They traveled all that day. And all night. "All out!" the non-coms hollered the second morning. And the whole trainload formed in line along a block and a half of cobblestones in a little town that wasn't much of anything but cobblestones, and forty or fifty combination barn houses with mademoiselles in wooden shoes standing in front of every one.

"Ouch!" said the guy beside Eddie. "Give a look."

He pointed. Eddie looked at the mademoiselle, but it was the house the guy meant. It was busted high, wide, and handsome by a German calling card. Eddie got so he passed by shelled houses as if they'd been so many flivvers. But this was his first, and he looked long and loud. "What-d'yuhknowabout-that!" he said.

A truck rolled up. A lieutenant with an M. G. on his collar hopped off and began reading names off a list. "Edward Loomis!" He read about sixty more, and then he said, "Charles Spencer!"

"Here, sir!" And Eddie jumped. Because he knew that voice. He looked down the line. Way at the far end was Fussbudget, two paces forward, shaved and as spick and span as if he'd made that two-day trip in a Pullman.

"Fall in according to height. Snap into it!" said the lieutenant. "Count! Off! Corporals fill in the front rank number fours. Make it snappy! Count! Off!" So they counted off again, into squads. One. Two. Three. Four.

"One!" said Eddie. And then he said, "I don't believe it." It was hard to believe, at that. For there he was, back in a squad with Fussbudget.

All of a sudden he wasn't sore any more. He grinned at Fussbudget, and when the lieutenant gave, "At Rest!" he said, "Listen, Buddy! Just as soon as we get where we're going, I want to see you, out back of a barn."

"No more than half as much as I want to see you," said Fussbudget. And Eddie knew from that that Fussbudget had been as sore as he had been.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Aw, squad your eye!" said Eddie. And they tangled again

More trucks rolled up. "Pile in!" said the lieutenant. "What's the idea?" Eddie said to a sergeant.

And the sergeant was good enough guy to tell him. The truckloads were replacements for a machine-gun company. The company had been cracked up pretty badly, and needed replacements. "It's due to be cracked again, too," said the sergeant. "There's a big push on around Soissons. They ain't going to let us stay away long. We've been out six days now."

FUSSBUDGET was in Eddie's truck. "You're just lucky enough," Eddie said to him, "to have the company ordered up to where a bullet can put you in a hospital before I fix you so you'll need burying."

"And you're hoping that we will," said Fussbudget. "You know what you'll get if we aren't."

They were itching to land on each other. The big war didn't mean a thing to either until their little one had been squared away.

The trucks rambled on for about thirty kilometers. They came to a little burg that looked like the leavings of a tornado, and stopped. Some chow was ready. Before Eddie'd finished his, the sergeant he'd talked to came up and said, "Hey! Loomis!"

"A guy certainly is a sap ever to go around getting acquainted," said Eddie. But he had to answer. They went in a truck after goldfish and bacon and bread, and they didn't get back until midnight.

Eddie had more than half a notion to wake Fussbudget up and have it out right then, because he had a hunch that there wasn't going to be much more time to have it out in. But he was dog-tired, and he knew no tired guy ought to tangle with Fussbudget. So he hit the hay.

The next morning he drilled. "I'll see you right after retreat!" he said to Fussbudget. And he pretty near started action without waiting for retreat when Fussbudget said, "I'll see you don't run out on me this time!"

About four o'clock that afternoon, just as they came in from the second round of drill, a string of trucks rolled into the village, and a guy on a motorcycle handed a paper to the captain, and the captain began to swear like forty French taxi-drivers.

"The lousy bums!" said the sergeant Eddie'd talked to. "I knew they'd never give us a chance to get organized."

They hadn't, either. The paper was an order to go up. The company was on its way inside of an hour. About nine o'clock that night the trucks stopped, and the outfit piled out and hiked. About one, they finally relieved a company of French machine gunners.

"So this," said Eddie, "is the Front! Who'dathunkit?"

All the ideas he'd got from the newspapers, of rows of trenches, and rows of barbed wire, and sets of artillery, they all went phooey! He couldn't see a thing but the road under his feet, and on either side of him a stretch of ground that looked like a city dump would look at night.

The platoon Eddie and Fussbudget were in went to help some fatheaded infantry keep the Germans out of a town the infantry had taken the day before. A swell town, nit! Pieces of houses, and nothing else. Eddie wondered why they didn't put a "Welcome!" sign out, and let the Kaiser have it.

The platoon lieutenant talked a while with the infantry captain. "Here, you!" he said, and jerked a thumb at Fussbudget.

"See that field?" And he pointed out between the last two houses of the town that the platoon was taking cover behind. It was a field maybe four hundred yards across, and covering the whole front of the town, and on the far side of it were some woods. There was just enough moon and starlight to make it all about as clear as the first minute in a motion picture show.

"See that field?" said the lieutenant. "Well, take your gun and get out there. Sooner or later, the Germans'll come out of those woods. And when they do, you start shooting. Traversing fire. A nice, simple job, so I know you can do it. Pick any number two you want."

"Does the Lieutenant mean," said Fussbudget, "that I'm to take a gun out into that open field?"

"What?" said the lieutenant.

"I MEAN," said Fussbudget, "hasn't the Lieutenant made a mistake? There is no cover in that field."

"Well, I'll be——" said the lieutenant.

"The British machine-gun instructors we had back in the States," said Fussbudget, "told us never to take up such a position."

"I hope I never see my grandmother again!" said the lieutenant, "if you aren't the richest thing I've heard since Elsie Janis." He started to laugh. And he looked at the infantry captain and laughed again. "Listen!" he said. "Since you put so much store by British machine-gun instructors, maybe you'll feel better when I tell you that a British machine-gun instructor I had said that a gun in exactly such a position once stopped a whole German division. Also," he said, "there's plenty of cover. That field is full of shellholes." He quit laughing. "Now, hop out there."

"Very well, sir!" said Fussbudget. He picked a big (Continued on page 164)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You are different from all other people, so, why not

Cut Loose, And Give Your Personality A Chance?

By French Strother

ALL my life I have been interested in that mysterious human quality that is called personality. Of any two people that I knew, why should one seem so much more alive and real and memorable than the other? As a small boy, old Mr. Bunbury, whom I saw rarely, was much more vividly present in my mind than my school-teacher, whom I saw every day, and whose face or name I cannot now remember. As I grew older, other people that I knew stood out from the rest, and I began to try to figure out the reason.

My interest in the subject has grown with the years. My work as a writer has thrown me into contact with many men and women of public reputation. Some of them are as commonplace as my first school-teacher. Others are very striking characters. What makes the difference? What is personality? I have studied the people that have a great deal of it, and I have formed some pretty definite ideas on the subject. I am going to put these up to you, to see if they check up with your own experience.

First of all, I have come to the conclusion that there is no great mystery about "personality." It consists simply in being a person—and the only person you can possibly be, which is yourself. If you feel you haven't got personality, it is because you are nobody, or it is because you have not disclosed the unique and interesting person that lives in your body.

Fortunately, you are somebody. And fortunately, too, you are not exactly like anybody else in the world. You have the charm and interest that always attach to things that are different. Nobody else has had exactly the same events happen to them as you; nobody else has seen exactly the same things, or thought exactly the same thoughts. Your very differentness gives you a personality.

But have you disclosed it to others?

Madame de Staël was an outstanding personality of the Napoleonic era. She was not beautiful, but she was the most popular woman, socially, of her time. She was a sociable person, in the best sense of the word—she loved the society of other people. But she did not stop at loving their society. She let them know she loved it. She said, in her old age, that her social success rested upon two phrases: Whenever a caller entered her drawing-room, she exclaimed, "At last!" When a caller departed, she exclaimed, "So soon?" No wonder people called!

Most of us love the company of our fellows. Most of us like to have people call, and are sorry when they go. But other people will not know it unless we do or say something to show it. Madame de Staël's way of saying it was beautiful. And her way was one of the things that helped give her rich personality.

The point I am trying to make is that personality consists in bringing the inside of ourselves to the outside.

The degree to which people lack personality is largely the degree to which they imitate the clam. If they don't let out to the world around them what is inside them, the world naturally concludes that there isn't anything inside.

Of course, there always is something inside of everybody who is blessed with enough brains to be able, for example, to read a newspaper. A story, not exactly new, illustrates the idea. A woman found herself at a large formal dinner, seated next to a man she had never met. He was courteous, but so diffident that she found it hard to keep up a conversation. She tried several subjects, which soon languished and died. At last the man smiled and said, "I realize I'm not very good at general conversation, and you've been very kind to take so much trouble. But I don't know much outside of my business."

The woman had wit and tact. So she smiled back and inquired, "What is your business?"

"Leather," the man replied.

"All right!" she exclaimed. "Then tell me about leather!"

Thereupon the man launched into a discussion of the leather business that provided one of the most interesting evenings the woman had ever spent. He knew the romance of leather as well as its practical side, and his conversation took them to Australian wilds, to old Venetian craftsmen's shops, and across the Seven Seas.

EVEN a leather merchant had something interesting inside. It took a tactful woman to get it expressed—to make him realize that what seemed everyday and commonplace to him could be absorbingly interesting to others.

Our own inner spirit is like that. To us, our hopes and feelings, our joys and sorrows, seem trivial or dull, and we do not set them out before our friends, for fear we may bore them. But these things do not bore them. Quite the contrary; they interest them immensely. Of course there are things too intimate to disclose promiscuously. Good taste keeps them inside. But we have within us all the time scores of perfectly presentable ideas and human emotions that would not shame us if let out, which, nevertheless, we keep bottled up within. As long as we do so, we keep inside ourselves something which, if expressed to others by word or act, would add to their knowledge of the real "us" and so build up our "personality" in their minds.

We would not go far wrong if we thought of "personality" as an abbreviation of the phrase, "the outgivings of personality." That word "outgivings" goes to the heart of the matter. It is whatever of ourselves

"If You Like a Person—Say So"

"THE first injunction to anybody who wants to express more outward personality is very short—it is simply, 'Cut loose!'" says Mr. Strother. "Yield to your impulse to do things that you really want to do. Yield to the impulse to say things you really want to say. Be impulsive—so long as your impulses are grounded in good will. If you like a person, act as if you did. If you see an admirable thing done by someone else, and have a generous impulse to say that you think it is admirable, go ahead and say so! It will do you good, and it will do the other fellow good. And it will enrich your personality—it will enlarge the inner gift of generous feeling in yourself, and it will outwardly express that gift to others."

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

that we give out to others which makes personality. The more rich and varied we are within, and the more freely we give outward expression to our inner selves, the more personality we have in the eyes of others.

I know that most people who feel that they lack personality also feel that they lack this inward richness. They fear that they have little to give. But anybody with intelligence enough to have that fear has plenty of inner personality. His real trouble is that he doesn't let it get out.

THOUSANDS of people know Fred, the head waiter at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington. He was head waiter at the old Shoreham during the war. They remember his tall figure and iron-gray pompadour. That pompadour is part of Fred's personality—its crestlike sweep expresses something of the dash and originality inside him But the real reason so many folks never forget Fred is that Fred never forgets them. Many a time a man has come up behind him whom he had not seen for six months or a year, and, when he turned around, I have heard him instantly call the man by name. "Good morning, Mr. Smith! You haven't been with us for a long time. We've missed you!" Now, I ask you, who can resist such a flattering reception? To be remembered—instantly—and accurately, and welcomed back—what could more indelibly impress another human being's personality upon you than his ability to do this?

Why is this ability to remember names and faces so powerful an element of personality? First of all, because, in the language of the Prayer Book, it reveals a very definite "inner and spiritual grace." The power of remembering names and faces is not a gift. It is an arduous exercise. To remember them requires that you want to remember them, and this wish is evidence of a friendliness of spirit and of a desire to please. And the arduous exercise of training the mind to remember them is further evidence of a still deeper friendliness, which is willing to take so much trouble, and of a strength of character which supports the effort necessary to do it.

These things are inner attributes of personality. And they become outward evidences of personality when Fred says, "Why, good morning, Mr. Smith!" so agreeably and so unexpectedly. If Fred remembered the name but did not use it when he met you, he would still have the inner qualities, but he would lack "personality" in your eyes.

I know business men of considerable importance who have less personality than Fred. No doubt they have more ideas, and more valuable ideas, than he has. But Fred proves that even the capacities of a head waiter offer scope for the development of qualities of personality that may well be envied by people with much more important work to do in the world. Instead of being just a waiter, Fred's personality has made him a head waiter. And instead of being just an ordinary business man, personality makes men who have it much more effective and outstanding and successful business men. It distinguishes them from the commonplace run of people who do not care or do not take the trouble to show an especial interest in those with whom they do business.

The simplest things express personality, provided you let them show on the outside. President McKinley loved white carnations, and frequently wore one in his buttonhole. Most men do not care especially for white carnations, and very few of those who do wear them daily. President McKinley's habit of doing so put him in a special class in other people's eyes—gave him that touch of individuality that goes to create personality. The ability to fall off a horse—or with a horse—is part of the Prince of Wales's personality. His persistence in dangerous riding in spite of his bad luck is an outward manifestation of admirable inner qualities. Will Rogers's chewing gum is an element of personality. So is Senator Borah's black felt hat. In every case, something inside the man gets expressed outside the man.

PHOTOGRAPH BY D. JAY CULVER

French Strother, writer and editor, with his little son on the lawn of his home in Garden City, Long Island

Being different for the sake of being different is not what we are talking about. Being different by honestly letting one's own natural inner self show on the outside is the real secret of personality. "Be yourself" is the first commandment of it; and "act yourself" is the "whole law" of it. "Let 'er go!" as the Westerner says.

THE commonest impediment to the expression of personality is diffidence. The wittiest man I know—quite the most entertaining man in any group he enters—suffered for years from self-consciousness so badly that he was practically tongue-tied in the presence of more than one other person. He would make a clever remark and all eyes would be turned on him. Then he would blush to the roots of his hair—completely upset by the attention he had drawn to himself by his wit. He felt conspicuous and a fool, whereas in reality he was the brightest person in the room, and was only getting the applause that was due him. His diffidence was not only causing him agonies of self-consciousness, but was also actually holding him back from exerting the influence in his business that his ability entitled him to exercise.

Then an older friend gave him a lecture that helped him "find himself." This friend pointed out to him that a certain healthy amount of self-assertive egotism is an essential part of character. The work of the world is not done by people who are forever apologizing for doing it. People who have brains and integrity are under a moral (Continued on page 168)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

(At top of page) Mrs. Johnson, ready to fire if the rhinoceros gets too much interested in having his picture taken. (In oval) Mrs. Johnson being congratulated by Lumbwa spearmen just after she shot a charging lion

ALL PHOTOGRAPHS BY MARTIN JOHNSON

"My Wife Holds The Gun . . ."

By Martin Johnson

I USED to think it would be fun to look ahead and see what the future held. But I have changed my mind. I don't believe the average person could stand the strain. I know Osa, my wife, couldn't have, even though she is about the strongest and healthiest little woman in the world.

It certainly would have been very disturbing seventeen years ago for us to have glimpsed ahead.. We were settled down to a comfortable routine existence and saw no possibility of a change. Just imagine our peering into a crystal ball and seeing what was going to befall us from that year onward.

We should have seen waving palms and cannibals; South Sea tempests; naked savages armed with spears, and the shores of far distant lands. We should have seen lions, elephants, hyenas, and rhinos wandering about our camps in Africa; big snakes, black natives, and camels.

Life is like that. You settle down and think you are fixed for good. Then some devastating idea or event comes along and wrecks every plan.

I was born with the travel bug in me. I ran away with a circus as a lad and ended up with a trip on a cattle boat to Europe. After knocking about there for a while, I fell in with Jack London, and joined him on his famous cruise to the South

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

(At top of page) Elephant in Lake Paradise region. (In oval) Mrs. Johnson with the makings of enough fine ostrich omelets to serve twelve dozen people. They're good, too, she says

Sea Islands in the little "Snark." By the time I got back to my home in Independence, Kansas, I thought I'd satisfied my wanderlust. I settled down in earnest.

I built a playhouse there along the lines of the "Snark." Those were the days before the motion picture had come into its own. Vaudeville was still more important than the pictures.

My chief business rival ran a theatre on the other side of town. I figured his success came from having a wife who could sing. Nothing would do but I meet this competition by securing a singer.

I HEARD of a young girl in Chanute, Kansas, named Osa Leighty, who was said to have a good voice. I hopped a train and went down to see her. She was all for the adventure. But her mother was outraged at the idea of my taking away her beautiful young daughter, who was still nothing but a child.

That was Friday. For two days Osa and I talked things over pretty seriously. I got a glimpse of her character and I guess she got a taste of my stubbornness. At any rate we solved our problem. On Sunday we were married.

At that time Osa had never been over thirty miles from home. To-day I believe she is the most widely traveled woman in the world.

I soon found married life wasn't all a bed of roses. Naturally, Osa got a little homesick at first. And her mother missed her a lot. So she had to go home every now and then. These visits often stretched out into days and weeks. Like every other young husband I felt torn between my business and my wife. Also, I was dismayed to find that my wanderlust was coming back full force.

One day I put it right up to Osa: "I'm going to sell the business. We can go to the west coast and take a boat to the South Sea Islands. If we get some good film it will be worth all the trouble."

Again Osa looked hard facts in the face. She knew that my plan meant choosing between her mother and myself. She loved both of us and she was a truly domestic girl. She had never wanted to gad about or to leave the part of the country in which she was brought up. She hesitated.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"It will be a tough trip," I told her.

I remember she stood up and looked me in the eye. A regular writer would say she met the crisis like a real man. But, knowing her, I can say that a real woman acts just the same way as a real man does.

"I'll go with you, Martin," she said quietly. I don't think any man could love a woman more than I loved her at that moment. I knew how much courage her decision took.

Don't think we were well off. True, we sold the playhouse before we left; but that didn't do much more than stake us to the trip.

ON OUR way to the coast a new trait showed up in my wife. Manlike, I mixed with other business men on our way West. I heard a good deal to discourage me in my film plan. Moreover, I received tempting opportunities to break off and go into other lines of business. Several times I wavered.

One night I explained a particularly attractive offer to Osa in our hotel. "You know we might be barking up the wrong tree," I reminded her. "Perhaps it would be better to stop here and look this proposition over."

She hopped off the edge of the bed as if she had sat on a tack.

"Look here, Martin Johnson," she exclaimed; "you are the one who started us on this South Sea Islands business. I agreed to go there with you. And that's where I'm going. So don't be flirting around with these other things until we've got this first job done!"

Well, there was no use arguing when she felt like that. Many a time since then she's kept me on a straight course. I think a man's wife can be keel and rudder to him at times.

Osa's tenacious enthusiasm, as much as anything else, inspired me to do something big. I planned a five-reel feature showing life in the South Seas. That wouldn't mean much these days. But at that time no one had attempted anything of the sort longer than one reel. I chose the title "Cannibals of the South Seas." Osa confessed afterward that the very word "cannibal" made her shudder. But she never winced at the time. Nor did she wince when, a little later, she was captured by the savage man-eaters we were out to film.

We sailed to the islands in a small ship. To my joy, Osa didn't have a single hour of seasickness. And to this day she has never known what that scourge of the sea traveler is like, despite the tiny craft and terrible storms we have gone through in our many wanderings.

"She's got a strong stomach," said an older woman scornfully when I mentioned it in a spirit of pride.

But I don't believe this is the whole truth. I think Osa's profound delight in our work and the thrill with which she looks forward to our next adventure adds enormously to her bodily resistance to ills that overwhelm the diffident tourist. To my mind, she is an excellent example of mental state governing health.

We got into trouble with the cannibals through my own rashness. Our destination at the time was the island of Malekula in the New Hebrides. Government officials warned me against the natives. "They are our subjects on the map," explained one officer; "but a cannibal doesn't know a map from a kangaroo."

About all the effect this advice had on me was to swell the mental picture I had of my film's future earnings.

I won't go into details. It isn't a pleasant story. But Osa and I landed on Malekula full of confidence. It was all jungle surrounded by a coral beach. We foolishly went right in among the black savages and began to film them. We got separated and were taken prisoners. Osa was led to a village and I was headed for the pot. Luckily, the commanding officer of a British man-of-war who had heard of our projected visit to the island got worried and came after us. He effected our rescue just in time.

Naturally, I felt a little conscious-stricken for having got Osa into such a mess. "Had enough of this?" I asked her soon afterward.

(At Right) Directions to the cook from an expert. (Below) One of the Johnsons' grass-thatched huts at Lake Paradise. The pathway is an old elephant trail

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Have you got the film you came after?" she retorted.

I confessed I hadn't.

"Then let's get it," said she firmly.

How could a man fail with a wife like that?

NOW that we were both broken in and knew our coconuts, so to speak, we chartered a little yawl and went down among the Solomon Islands. On the "Snark" Jack London had shown me the most interesting spots of this group.

Osa had her troubles from the outset. I had hired a black boy to cook for us and the crew. The second day out he developed an infected hand. As a result, our single lady passenger had to work throughout the voyage in a two-by-four galley preparing meals for a dozen ravenous men.

(Above) A typical scene near the Johnson home at Lake Paradise. The ape is a gibbon. (In oval) Mr. and Mrs. Johnson in camp

In all, we cruised over six hundred miles clear down to the southernmost of the Solomons, Owa-raha Island. Osa helped me with the photographic work when she had finished with her pots and pans. We both slept on the teak deck. Our camp equipment was so limited that while ashore we bunked in native huts. Had it not been for her courageous example I am not sure I could have stood the dirty grass houses and odoriferous natives.

"I've smelt worse in civilization," she laughingly told me.

While we were in the Solomon Islands, we were fortunate enough to be invited by a government exploring party to make the trip afoot across the Island of Malaita. No white people had ever been across before, and it promised to give us priceless views for the film we were slowly building.

It was a rough trip, all right. Every moment of it we were in danger from the wild tribes that haunted the jungle through which we plodded. Our army of black boys were just as frightened as we were; more so, in fact, for they knew what it meant to be tortured by the cannibals.

Here it was that Osa first began to develop her natural talent for rifle shooting. I call it a talent, because she had never done any shooting as a girl. Yet with a few days' practice she began to bring in pigeons, deer, and fish as a result of her marksmanship.

Another trait she brought forward unexpectedly was her quick mastery of native lore. In no time she picked up a smattering of local dialects, and spent long hours over our camp fires listening to tales of hunting and superstitions. As the years have gone on she has developed this hobby until she speaks Malay and Swahili fluently, and has endeared herself to natives of many tribes by her sympathetic interest in their lives and beliefs.

Just about the time we began to feel at home among the Solomon Islands we had an experience that nearly ended our adventuring forever. We had landed on one of the smaller islands. We didn't know it at the time, but several white people had been killed there by the natives shortly before. The little vessel on which we were cruising had to go back to one of the larger islands to get more supplies and to pick up the British commissioner. Osa agreed to stay with me ashore while I went ahead with my photographic work.

AS WE disembarked in the dark, the natives didn't know we were there. Next morning, they were holding some kind of fiesta. With fine innocence we decided it was a good chance for pictures and boldly entered the crowd. The first thing we knew a perfect bedlam broke loose. Women screamed, and about two thousand wild and wholly naked men came dashing up to (Continued on page 160)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

One Misty Night

A story of love and faith

By ELISABETH SANXAY HOLDING

Illustrated by Harry Townsend

SHE knew he would be waiting for her. And all through that last half-hour, while she hurried to finish her work, she was thinking of that.

She sat at the typewriter, her eyes narrowed with fatigue, her fingers stumbling a little on the keys. Then she brought the last of the letters to the manager for his signature, stood beside his desk, her fair head bent.

"That won't do. You'll have to type that over, Miss Consadine."

She took the letter from him, with an apologetic smile; so well aware, she was, that her work was not good. Not ever good. Before she had come here—while her father was living and she had been at home with him—she had not known how stupid she could be. Or how tired; always tired; tired when she first opened her eyes in the morning, so weary that she no longer felt young. Twenty-six years in the world; that was a long time, she thought.

She boarded with her brother and his wife in their little flat up-town. They meant to be kind to her, only they were absorbed in each other, almost cruel in their happiness. They were forever borrowing from her. Of course they could not realize how things were with her. They were careless and happy; they could not know how troubled she was, or how tired.

She sat down at the typewriter again and rewrote the letter. And all the time, like a song in the distance, was the thought that he would be waiting for her.

Her work was done at last. She put on her old coat with the rusty fur collar, and her cheap little hat, and took up that umbrella that was always collapsing. It was so wonderful to know that he would not care. Let her be pale and shabby and tired, she would be only the dearer to him.

All the world was going home now; the arcade of the great office building was filled with a hurrying crowd. She went through the revolving door, and the raw, chill air blew in her face, and she shivered a little. Her shoes were thin for walking in this weather.

"But it's just as bad for him!" she thought.

A panic fear assailed her. If he should take cold! If he should be ill! Often she waked in the night and thought of that, thought of him lying ill in his room, all alone.

"Oh, no!" she cried in her heart. "It's not right! I couldn't even go to him. O God, oh, please, dear God, let him get that new job—so that we can be together."

A cold November fog lay over the city; no use putting up the capricious umbrella for that, nothing could keep it out. She hastened along the street, still in the river of home-going traffic; then she turned a corner into a side street that was dark and quiet. And there, leaning against the wall of a building, she saw him, hands in the pockets of his worn overcoat, hat pulled low on his forehead, a tall, lean figure, so alone.

He saw her, and came toward her. By the light of the street lamp she could see his face, thin and dark, with a look of nonchalant indifference. Some people thought him hard, because of that look, because they could not read what she had known at once—that he was shy and sensitive and terribly proud.

But perhaps no one else in the world had ever seen him like this, with this smile.

"Well!" she said, laughing up at him. "Good evening, Mr. Crawford."

That was the way he would have it. They must be Miss Consadine and Mr. Crawford. If that look was in his face, if his hand when he touched her arm trembled a little, if his voice was sometimes unsteady, he could not help that. He had not spoken. He had been unalterably resolved to spare her, not to trouble her poor young heart with an echo of his own anxiety and pain. And he thanked God now for that silence.

"I hope your feet aren't wet?" he asked, with a frown.

"Oh, not a bit!" she assured him. But really she did not even know. They were here together; nothing else mattered.

"My girl . . . my wonderful girl!" he was thinking. "You little tired thing. . . . No one to look after you."

She saw then that there was something amiss.

"What's the matter, Mr. Crawford?" she asked. "You look—upset."

She tried to speak lightly, and he tried to answer her so.

"Bit tired, maybe," he said. "I'm getting old, you know."

HE SMILED when he said it; but in his heart there was chill despair. It was true; thirty-five, he was, so much older than she. And not able to take care of her; not able even to speak, to tell her how dear beyond all measure she was to him. Thirty-five, and a failure; good-for-nothing, a poor derelict of a fellow with a bad knee, and not wit enough to earn a good living.

He had never cared before. He had come out of a Canadian university and drifted about the world; he had picked fruit in California; he had worked on a farm; he had gone to sea. A steady job in an office was like prison to him; why should he do it? He had wanted to see the world, to be free.

If he could have his chance again! No work in the world he wouldn't do now, doggedly and grimly, if it would bring him just enough. . . .

He had gone back to Canada and enlisted at the very beginning of the war; he had been wounded three times, and the last time had given him two years in hospital. And he had come out of that very little changed: older, and with that knee that would be stiff and awkward all his life, but with the same careless, untroubled spirit. He had drifted to New York, for no particular reason; he could always get some sort of job, enough to keep himself in tobacco and clean linen.

And then he had met his girl, when it was too late.

"If I'd never come," he thought. "Better for her, better for her if I'd got mine over in France."

But not better for him. For, no matter what happened, he would have her to remember—her dear smile, the things she had said to comfort him.

SHE would have said more, he knew that; but he had given her no opportunity. He had been sternly candid with her; had told her what a miserable little job he had, clerk in an insurance office. And that he had wasted all his chances and his youth.

"But you're still young!" she had cried. "You'll have more chances."

He had not dared to look at her, the day he had told her that; but from the tremor in her voice he had thought there were tears in her eyes.

"I'm going to try," he had said.

It had seemed to him only right and fair that he should not see her any more until he was doing better. But she would not have it so.

"I'd—I'd miss you," she had said. "We've had such nice talks; why shouldn't we meet, now and then?"

Only it hadn't been "now and then." When he left his office, he would think:

"No; I won't see her to-day. Not again to-day."

And then he would think of her, turning that corner, looking for him in vain, going on alone, in the dark; and he would set off in a sort of panic haste, for fear he should not be there, waiting, when she came.

Half an hour or so, that was all they ever had. They would walk together to the Spring Street Station, and then she would go down to her train, and he would walk home to his furnished room. At first they had walked in the soft dusk of May, then in the jaded heat of summer; sometimes they went through the rain, he holding the capricious umbrella so carefully over her beloved head.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She knew he would be waiting for her. And all through that last half-hour she was thinking of that

They did not have many "nice talks," either. There was so little he could say. Only, a month ago, he had had something to tell her.

"I think," he had said, with a very poor attempt at casualness, "that there's a chance of a raise for me in November. One of the fellows is leaving, and the manager says I'm in line for his job."

There had been a moment's silence.

"Oh, that would be nice, wouldn't it?" she had said, politely.

Because she knew that was the way he wanted her to speak. In the humility of his love, he was determined to ask nothing of her. And yet, without knowing it, he demanded of her so cruel an effort. She must be silent too. She must mask her eloquent face; she must wait; she must play the rôle he had assigned her.

In crossing a street, that night, he had touched her arm to guide her—the lightest touch; but she had glanced up as if it had startled her. Their eyes had met; the lights from the brilliant windows shone upon them, a strained and harsh light by which their faces were pale, vivid against a murky background, like some old painting. Their eyes had met: his, hungry and desperate; hers, brimming with tears, but so clear, so faithful.

"If I get it—!" he had said, very low.

But he had said nothing more, so that she had only the memory of his face, of his ardent and unhappy glance.

And sometimes, in the long days, she felt a terrible doubt; she thought that perhaps he had not really looked at her—like that.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She watched his face to-night, by every passing light, to see if there was that look upon it. But it was not there.

"He's different to-night," she thought. "He's changed. What can it be?"

The fog was cold; she felt the chill of it strike to her heart.

"You shouldn't wait for me in weather like this, Mr. Crawford," she said.

He did not answer her, not a word. They were near the station now, where she always left him; their time together was almost done.

"Mr. Crawford," she said, "I—I do hope you won't take cold!"

"Why should I?" he demanded, so vehemently that she started. "I'm healthy enough, at least. This lame knee—that's nothing much. I'm not an invalid, you know."

"You shouldn't say that," she cried. "You ought to know I didn't mean that! You ought to know—"

They went on in silence until they reached the station. Then he stopped.

"Well—" he said. "Good night, Miss Consadine!"

"Good night!" she answered. And then, suddenly, "That was—unfair!"

He had taken off his hat in bidding her good night; he stood bareheaded in the fog, not looking at her.

"Put on your hat!" she said, with a sort of anger. "I—I just want to walk—by myself—a little way. Good-by."

As she turned up-town, he kept by her side.

"But, look here!" he said. "You'll be late. Your people will worry."

"Oh, no, they won't! Nobody would worry much if I were late—if I never came home at all."

He was very much taken aback.

"Well—you're wrong," he said stiffly.

This time it was she who said nothing. She went on so quickly it seemed as if she were flying. Little damp strands of her hair blew back; one caught against the rough felt of her hat brim and clung there, glittering like gold when the light touched it. Her face, in profile, looked cold and curiously intent.

"Where are you going?" he asked, in wonder and alarm.

But she had done with answering questions from him, who never answered hers.

"Look here!"

But she would not look.

HE THOUGHT he must tell her before she hurried away from him forever. "I—it's this—" he said, and he thought the words would choke him. "I'd meant—not to see you again."

"Oh, I knew!" she cried. "I saw it in your face!"

"You couldn't."

"I did! I did! Then—why don't you go?"

"Because I can't," he said, unsteadily. "I've got to tell you now. You see, I thought that if I got that job— But I haven't. Somebody's nephew, cousin, something of the sort, got it. I just found out to-day."

"Oh, did you?" she said, in that polite, casual tone he had required of her. Only he did not want that now. This was the last time, and he wanted—just something to remember. But he must not ask for even a word. It wouldn't be fair to her.

"So—you see—" he said.

She looked at him then, and he smiled. And she thought that to the last day of her life she would never be able to forget that smile on his strained, desperate face, a smile so tender, so forlorn.

"I don't see!" she cried. "I don't see why that means—never to see you again."

He was as gentle with her as if she were an unreasonable, unhappy child.

"The thing is—" he said. "There's no chance now for getting a raise for—I don't know how long. And I get only thirty dollars a week."

"What of it?" she said.

He had not imagined that she could be so difficult. She had always understood so well, always been so kind to him. Yet, in her gentleness, never so dear to him as now in her unreasonable vehemence.

"What of it?" she repeated. "Do you think I care?"

"I care," he said.

He would not look at her; he glanced down, and he saw her poor little muddy shoes, going on so valiantly.

"I—can't stand this!" he cried. "I've only thirty dollars a week—and I'm not a boy. I've wasted, thrown away all my chances. . . . I'm so much older than you. . . . Don't you see that I've got to stop—meeting you? I've got nothing to offer you but thirty dollars a week."

"Well," she said, "certainly that's not much to offer anyone!"

He was so horribly hurt that he could not speak for a moment.

"It's all I have," he said.

"It's not enough," she said. "It's nothing."

She was right, he thought. Of course she hadn't realized before quite what a failure he was. She was disappointed,

(Cont'd on page 116)

She watched his face to-night, by every passing light. "He's different," she thought. "He's changed"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

No Man Ever Went to War In Defense Of A Boarding-House

But any man will face death to preserve his home—That's why I place home high on my list of worth-while things

By Charles A. David

THERE are so many things worth while that when I attempt to single out a few which seem to me the most important, others come tumbling over each other like sheep jumping a fence, all clamoring for recognition and begging for a place in the picture. I feel like the man who has consented to act as judge at a baby show. With twenty babies in the ring, and only one blue ribbon to be awarded, he knows that one mother will think he is the finest man in the world while the other nineteen will think he is a fool.

So it is in picking the winners from among the worth-while things. I do not presume to think my choice will be endorsed by everyone, I am only pointing out those that mean the most to me and that have left the deepest impress on my life.

To my way of thinking, those that I have selected all loom head and shoulders above the rest, and for the life of me I do not see how I could get along without a single one of them. The true value of most things can be pretty accurately gauged by the emptiness their absence would cause.

When I think of worth-while things, children push and scrouge until they stand at the very head of the list, and nothing that I can do changes the arrangement. Most people, whether they are parents or not, will, I believe, agree that children would be out of place anywhere except at the head of the list.

Ever since I quit being a child myself I have had a mighty tender spot in my heart for little folks; their innocence and outspokenness take me by storm, so I never lose a chance of making friends with them. And they seem to like me, too. We get along fine together, and can understand each other without resorting to any silly baby-talk. It is like an adventure in a brand-new world to watch the unfolding of a young mind, free from earthly taint and fresh from the hand of its Maker; and it is something that I enjoy more than the greatest play that was ever staged.

In the main, my life has been a happy one, with the usual mingling of temptation, disappointment, and sorrow. Sometimes I have thought that maybe I have had more than my share of happiness. But it was not until I had stood three times outside a closed door, with fear and apprehension, and three times had some doctor or nurse whisper through the crack, "It's a boy!" or, "It's a girl!" that I knew what perfect happiness meant. From the time our children could walk, I have tried to be one of them, and most of my leisure hours were spent in getting acquainted with them, and making them feel that I was not only a father but also a friend who would untangle and straighten out their little cares and troubles.

When they were old enough for short walks, we would explore the front yard and the big vegetable garden; and wonderful times we had hunting four-leaf clovers, making book marks of larkspurs, garlands of morning glories, shooing bumblebees out of the hollyhocks, calling doodle-bugs in the sand, feeding the little naked robins in the grape arbor, and trying to get the big green caterpillars to wear the paper hats we made for them.

As legs got longer, our walks got longer, gradually taking in the nearby woods and fields. There we learned to know, as intimately as they would let us, the ground squirrels, the gray squirrels, the rabbits, and the moles. One red-letter day we met an old 'possum face to face, shambling along a very narrow path, so, to escape what was evidently an unwelcome encounter, he lay down, shut his eyes, opened his mouth and, as far as we could see, actually quit breathing, and, to all appearances, died.

His skinny tail, wind-blown hair, black, shriveled-up ears, and jaws drawn tightly back from what seemed like a peck of teeth, all made him look as if he had been dead a month. But he was only playing dead, in the hope that we would pass him by. The children were sure he was dead, and the youngest one began to cry. To show them that he was alive and unhurt, I picked him up by the tail and dropped him in a little pool of water, where he instantly "came to life," swam out, and then curled up on the bank all dripping wet, and promptly "died" again.

Right there the children had their first object lesson in "playing 'possum," a lesson I am sure they have never forgotten.

ONE hot summer afternoon we suddenly came upon a good-sized blacksnake lunching on a toad that was twice as big around as the snake. The snake was doing its level best to swallow the toad whole, and the toad was doing its level best to keep from being swallowed. The head and shoulders had already disappeared, but the hind legs were kicking vigorously.

Embarrassed by being caught with its meal half swallowed, the snake got rattled and tried to disgorge, but its incurved teeth held so firmly it could not let go. Always willing to help those in trouble, I put one foot on the snake's tail and, grabbing the hind legs of the toad, gave a mighty jerk, and soon had them separated.

Cheated out of its meal, the snake left in such a hurry that all I saw was a farewell wave of its tail as it vanished in the weeds. The toad sat for a moment as if dazed, and then, slowly blinking one eye at a time, puffed out its body to see if it was all there, and hopped away.

I could not begin to tell of half the interesting things we saw, and all the time we were learning things that we never could have found out from books.

Among the many things we learned on those Sunday-afternoon rambles, was to tell from the looks of the soil where Indian arrowheads, pieces of pottery, and the like, were probably to be found. We learned to name the oaks from the different acorns; we also learned to tell the age of young pines by counting the whorls of branches; and that not all the leaves on a sassafras tree were the same shape, and that lichen grew thicker on the north side of trees, and that certain colors attracted certain insects, and that a bee would not sting you if you held it in the hand without squeezing.

Sometimes in the fall we walked five miles to a neighboring mountain, not for the view but for the chestnuts that grew there; and we would wind up the feast with a dessert of long, fat honey locust beans.

THOSE wonderful Sunday afternoons spent in the woods with the children were about the happiest of my life, and I know we learned a great deal about God. We felt His presence in the breeze that set the pines to singing; we saw Him in the cloud shadows on distant hills; we heard His voice in the rumble of thunder; and the changing glories of the sunset seemed to bring Him right where we were standing. And when we saw the crimson and gold of autumn woods we knew that the Great Artist had been at work all around us, and that the colors on the brush were still damp. Though His name might not have been often on our lips, the thought of Him was ever in our hearts, and we felt near enough to have touched Him.

I had rather take a walk with a wide-awake child than with the wisest man that ever lived, for the questions a child asks bring out things that an older person would never think of. These delightful rambles were kept up until the youngest boy left for college; but none of us has forgotten them. Maybe you can realize what children (Continued on page 74)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Does Your Mind Hit On All Its Cylinders?

An interview with Frederick B. Robinson, Ph. D., president of the College of the City of New York

Reported by M. K. Wisehart

AMONG the highly educated men that I know, one of the most interesting, and potentially one of the ablest, is the assistant telegraph editor of a certain metropolitan newspaper. A man of forty-five, with graying hair, he wears a green eye shade, and, in his shirt-sleeves, works under a powerful electric lamp at a desk in the city room.

Surrounded by newspapers and reference books, paste pot, shears, and heaps of those yellow sheets known as "flimsy," on which incoming press messages are typed, he is busy "pasting up." Perhaps he consults the atlas to ascertain the population of some small Mid-Western town whence a story has come; or he may go to the encyclopedia to discover the main agricultural crop in the vicinity of far-off Irkutsk in order to insert this information in a cablegram from Russia. That shapeless, almost meaningless jargon known as "cable-ese" in which foreign correspondents send messages to save telegraph tolls, he decodes and expands into the clean-cut English of the well-edited newspaper. With his heavy blue pencil he is continuously dressing up the brain product of some other man—never his own.

In all this he is excellent—quick, intelligent, accurate. He is master of his particular job in that ensemble of brains required to get out a daily newspaper. There are other ways in which he is exceedingly versatile. He is a linguist, having command of German, French, Italian, and Spanish. He is widely informed in European and domestic politics. If you want to know the reasons for the fluctuating value of the franc, the essence of the Einstein theory, or the basis of Bertrand Russell's philosophy, the assistant telegraph editor can accommodate you. He has a scholar's grasp of comparative religion; he will describe the debt of Christianity to the religions of the East in a way to fascinate you. In other fields the range of his information is astonishing. He has an encyclopædic mind.

Dr. Frederick B. Robinson, president of the College of the City of New York, has been associated with that institution for more than twenty years. A great deal of his time has been devoted to lecturing and writing on economics, business education, and vocational training—subjects to which he has given special study

SUPPOSE you were to inquire among this man's associates as to whether or not he is truly educated. Some would readily answer in the affirmative. Others might hesitate. They would speak of the wide range of his information, of his university degrees, of his charm. But all the while they would have a vague mental reservation. "After all," they would be thinking, "what has he done with all he knows?" They would have in mind the fact that he is an able writer who does not write, a philosopher who contributes nothing to philosophy. He is lashed to a job that doesn't call forth a quarter of his capacity for service.

The question I raise in connection with this man is: If he isn't truly educated, wherein does he lack? In what sense is he educated? In what sense is he not?

A graduate of an American university, a Rhodes scholar and a graduate of Oxford, he went into newspaper work years ago with the ambition to become a "publicist." Owing to the scope of his information he was very soon found available for the telegraph desk. From there he planned to launch out into what is sometimes called the higher journalism. He wrote some literary criticism, some political essays, an article or two, and translated a book from the French.

But no particular recognition came of this, and he was easily discouraged. He had in mind two American historical characters whose biographies he was going to write; but one day a publisher told him that biography was just then a drug on the market. This dampened his enthusiasm. He began to talk as though there were something about the practical requirements of the higher journalism that "cramped his style." Gradually, his efforts ceased. He relaxed into a job that was a kind of easy street for him, and the years have slipped by.

That is his story. He is no nearer being a publicist than on the day he took up newspaper work. He still has that capacious mind; he is as witty as ever, as penetrating in his repartee. But he has the uncomfortable, dissatisfied feelings of a man who senses the fact that his job is too small for him.

He says that his career has been "short-circuited," and he seems to think that it is due to circumstances beyond his control. But I don't agree with him in this.

Somewhere, during his early education, whether in the home, or in the school, he was not trained to persist in objectives near the top of his capacity. He learned quickly and retained easily; but he was not forced to apply himself to original problems just within his full power to achieve. He was not sufficiently required

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

to complete difficult jobs; his victories were too easy and his dreams were his joy.

In his case the fault lay not in the world or its works. There was no conspiracy against assistant telegraph editors. The fault was in his own character. He lacked will, perseverance, courage.

His case is sad, but not nearly so sad as that of a man of low mental capacity who has not developed the power to live up to the small potential that he has. Such men are our tramps and loafers. Properly trained, they could discharge simple duties and lead relatively useful and happy lives. It is no crime to self or society to be a man of small capacity, but it is a grave fault to slacken and fall far below that capacity, no matter what it may be.

NOW, the truly educated man is never a quitter; he performs consistently, and he never stops improving his capacity to perform.

Here on my desk is a memorandum pad five by three inches in size. On it are the names of six Americans: Benjamin Franklin, Abraham Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, Andrew Carnegie, Thomas Edison, Michael Pupin. In my opinion, they are representatives of the truly educated men of all ages. Franklin is perhaps the ideal type. The first three that I mention were statesmen, the next a captain of industry, the fifth an inventor, and the last a scientist who became a great inventor, and who is now broadening out in the field of philosophy. Differing in their pursuits and achievements and in the time in which they lived, in what respects do they resemble one another? What characteristics have they in common?

It seems to me that I can detect at least three ways in which these men resemble one another. I think that the three traits they all had are so fundamental that any man to be classed as truly educated should possess them up to the limit of his own capacity.

1. It is characteristic of the truly educated man that he persists in training his practical abilities and technical skill, until they are on a level with the requirements of the vocation to which he aspires.

2. He has a thorough knowledge of a considerable number of inter-related subjects and a certain point of view that is characteristic of broad cultivation.

3. He is actively interested in performing to the best of his ability each task he undertakes, and of making his own best contribution to the good of mankind.

It is in the light of the first and third characteristics that I regard the assistant telegraph editor as an inadequately educated man. The essential thing about him is that he quit before he had really begun to acquire the abilities necessary for successful performance in the vocation that would have satisfied his ambitions.

At this moment you may be thinking, "But perhaps he didn't have the capacity for the higher calling. Franklin, Lincoln, Edison—they were men of extraordinary capacity!"

My answer to that is: All of the six men I have mentioned were born with high capacities. But they worked, and kept on working as though they had great handicaps to overcome. No one can say how commonplace their achievements might have been had they not persisted in training themselves for what they wanted to do.

In regard to our education in a practical sense, each of us must try to decide for himself what his capacity really is. To reach our greatest heights, we must seek the right books, tasks and men to teach us to perform at our best, and we must not quit. It is my observation that few men fail in their true aims for want of natural abilities; but many fail for want of persistence in developing them. Some quit when they find themselves in easy berths, and others when the going gets rough. In either case, the result is the same: The quitter never wins, because he has already lost.

Presently I shall have something to say about the methods that are most likely to be of use to anyone seeking to complete his education. But first I want to speak of what I have named as the second great characteristic of the truly educated man. This has to do with what he knows, but more particularly with his point of view, which is the result of the breadth of his knowledge. In this second respect our newspaper man should be marked high.

It is true that the very nature of newspaper work is broadening. In the daily routine the whole gamut of human life and thought is touched. Items of history, of travel, of science, of letters, of arts and of politics, past and present, present themselves. But men in other callings often find their occupations narrowing rather than broadening.

I HAVE in mind the images of two men: one is letting himself down from a ladder on the side of a building. He is a sign painter and he has just completed a picture of an attractive young woman looking through an automobile tire. He walks across the street to look at the "ad" from a proper distance. The job is reasonably good and he is satisfied.

On questioning him I learn that he is supplied with a card on which appears a small picture of the great display. It is laid out in squares by someone in the big office, and he is required to reproduce the picture on a larger scale, using the proper colors as indicated on the model. He knows very little about the colors or why they were selected. He uses what is issued to him and, having (Continued on page 67)

If You Ask Me:

A straight line is still the shortest distance between two points

I HAVE never shot birds on the wing. But many of my friends have. And some of them are marksmen of no mean repute. One and all, they assure me that you will never fill your game bag by firing broadside into a flock. "You must always pick out one bird and 'pickle' it," declared my dentist, a noted Nimrod, as he did things last week to a menacing molar of mine.

I thought of that remark this morning as I read these words in President Robinson's wise article that begins on the opposite page: "Do not scatter. We do not become educated by gambling in knowledge. There is no sense in reading widely on the chance that this information may be useful to you some day, or that it may possibly shape up in coherent form."

"We do not become educated by gambling in knowledge." A pithy and pointed sentence. It should be printed in gold on a silver background and nailed to the footboard of his bed by every human being who reads purposelessly, thinks purposelessly, lives purposelessly. To-day, as always, the plums of life are being picked by men who know exactly what they want and have charted the straightest and shortest way to get it. Watch them and you will see that they seldom allow the Highway Department of Life to post "detour" signs on their roads. And they leave no footprints on by-paths.

"The trouble with many folks," a famous industrial engineer once said to me, "is that they spend too much time 'packing trunks' they can't take with them—and that would contain few useful things if they did."

After all, isn't that the explanation of the triumph of concentration over diffusion?

Merle Crowell

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Life On Mars Is Almost Certain!

Conditions there are similar to those on the earth, says Professor William H. Pickering, a distinguished astronomer; vegetable life is fairly assured, and there is good evidence of intelligent animal life—Astronomers know a lot about Mars, and they have seen some mighty curious things through their telescopes

By George W. Gray

MORE than two hundred years ago, Jonathan Swift published "Gulliver's Travels." In this book he described an imaginary land where the traveler found in use telescopes of extraordinary power. So powerful were these instruments, wrote Swift, that they revealed two moons revolving around the mysterious planet Mars, one in twenty-one and a half hours and the other in only ten hours.

There were many patronizing chuckles at Swift's extravagant fiction, for Mars was known to have no satellites. Was it not called "the moonless Mars"? Moreover, it takes our moon twenty-nine days to complete its journey around the earth. For Swift to imagine a Martian moon traveling its orbit in ten hours was simply to advertise his ignorance.

This was in 1726. On the night of August 11th, 1877, an American astronomer, Professor Asaph Hall, turned the great telescope of the Naval Observatory in Washington on the red planet. He saw a small, faint object near Mars. The next few nights were cloudy, but on the sixteenth the sky was clear, and there again was the small, faint object. It was traveling along with Mars, and there could no longer be any doubt that it was a moon. The astronomer continued his search, and on the following night discovered a second moon.

Thus the science of 1877 verified the fiction of 1726.

The astronomer not only proved the existence of the two Martian moons, but he showed that their periods of revolution were not far from those imagined by the author of "Gulliver's Travels." He computed their orbits, and found that the outer satellite revolved in thirty hours and eighteen minutes, the inner one in seven hours and thirty-nine minutes—periods that are amazingly near Swift's guess.

I mention this bit of history as a caution against cocksure skepticism. Perhaps no subject in astronomy has been the focus of more guesses, theories, criticism, ridicule, and controversy among the learned, than this small red planet which the ancients named in honor of their war god, Mars.

AND why? Why should Mars attract so much attention and inspire so much discussion? It is not our nearest planetary neighbor—Venus comes closer to the earth by several million miles. It is not one of the large bodies of the solar system. On the contrary, Mars has little more than one half the diameter of the earth, and is—next to Mercury—the smallest planet. To the mighty Jupiter, or the almost as massive Saturn, Mars would be but a dependent moon.

But there is this to say for Mars—it is the only planet accommodating enough to give us a good look at itself. The others are wrapped in clouds, or they are in a molten state, or so near the sun or so far from it that their surface features are lost. Mars alone we can see in detail, and, so far as we have been able to find out, it is the planet whose conditions seem most like those existing on our earth.

Does this mean—life on Mars?—people on Mars?—cities and homes and industries?—civilization? Does it mean that our earth is not unique among the stars; but that here on this neighboring globe is another living world?

Perhaps no question is asked astronomers by the public so often as the query: Is Mars inhabited by intelligent beings? Every twenty-six months, on the average, Mars approaches the earth in its circuit of the sun, and at each one of these "oppositions," newspapers and other periodicals reflect popular interest by publishing articles on the subject. The competition for news of Mars is so great, and the twists which reporters have given to the speculations of astronomers are so fantastic, that many scientific men have become inclined to shy at all questions regarding Mars.

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM YERKES OBSERVATORY

This picture combines three groups of photographs of Mars taken at intervals of a few seconds; but the vertical group in the middle was taken one hour after the group on the right, and twenty-two minutes before the group on the left. Careful examination will show the rotation of the planet during the time consumed. As the images are inverted, the south polar cap, probably of snow, is visible near the top of each image. A magnifying lens was placed in front of the photographic plate

AT THE opposition of 1926, the director of an American observatory received a request from the editor of a metropolitan newspaper asking for an article discussing the probability of Mars being inhabited. Three hundred words were permitted. The astronomer answered: "Three hundred words unnecessary. Three are enough: No one knows."

H. G. Wells, in "The War of the Worlds," his imaginative account of an invasion of our earth by inhabitants from Mars, describes a Martian as a perfected brain-man—mostly head, with sensitive hands and highly acute organs of sense. George du Maurier, in his novel, "The Martian," imag-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

(Above) A drawing of Mars showing, to the left and just above the center, the pear-shaped desert Thaumasia with its "eye" (the dark spot in the center of the desert). The planet is shown upside down, as it would appear in a telescope. Most of the dark areas, which are believed to denote vegetation, are in the southern (upper) half of the picture. The northern (lower) hemisphere is supposed to be bleak desert plateaus

(Below) Another drawing of Mars, showing Solis Lacus, the "Eye of Mars," at the center of the pear-shaped desert, Thaumasia, in the upper part of the picture. The dark oval in the lower left side of the picture is Lunæ, presumably another area of vegetation. Two hours before this picture was made there was only one canal extending upward from Lunæ. The doubling is believed to be the result of wind-blown showers

DRAWINGS BY PROFESSOR PICKERING

(Above) The curved path on the left in this drawing of Mars is the "canal" Hellespontis. Professor Pickering believes it to be the track of a great rainstorm, coursing across deserts and fertile lands for thousands of miles. The dark strip in which it ends is Sabæus, supposed to be a rich region of Martian vegetation. Drawings are used because photographs of Mars are too small to enlarge without serious loss of detail

ines inhabitants of our neighbor planet as endowed with extraordinary psychical powers, through which they are able to influence and even direct the activities of people on the earth. It is not impossible—who can say?—that some scientist a hundred years from now may do for Wells or du Maurier what Asaph Hall did for Jonathan Swift—verify his guess.

Meanwhile, Mars continues to swing along its path around the sun; it continues to show us periodically its melting polar snow caps, its revolving globe with curious markings of light and shade, and those mysterious straight lines called "canals," which suggest artificial construction, and so, by implication, the existence of intelligent Martians.

THE statement made by the observatory director is strictly true: no one knows whether Mars is inhabited or not. But the whole surface of Mars has been mapped, and every visible feature charted and named. No other planet has been the object of so much study. One large American observatory, the Lowell Observatory, in Arizona, was built with Mars as its primary interest, and richly endowed by its founder, a brother of the president of Harvard University, to keep up this study in perpetuity.

Hundreds of trained observers in all parts of the world have studied Mars since that fruitful year, 1877, when the two moons were discovered and the "canals" mapped. What have these observers learned?

"They have learned a great deal," answered Professor William H. Pickering, the American astronomer who has devoted a lifetime of study to the Martian riddle. Professor Pickering's private observatory at Mandeville, on the island of Jamaica in the Caribbean Sea, is headquarters for the Associated Observers of Mars, an international organization of professional and amateur astronomers.

At each opposition these observers make drawings and notes of what they see, and forward their reports to Professor Pickering. He compares their observations with all other available reports, tabulates the results, and carefully summarizes the data in a series of periodical reports, which are published in the astronomical journal, "Popular Astronomy."

When I visited Professor Pickering in Mandeville, he was just completing his fortieth report on Mars. The opposition in 1928 will make the ninth consecutive approach of the planet which Pickering has personally observed and reported, and with this opposition he will have studied the entire cycle of the Martian year.

"Yes, observers have gradually accumulated a great many specific facts about Mars," said Professor Pickering. "And some of the most important discoveries have come within the past four years, at the oppositions of 1924 and 1926, when sensitive instruments were used to measure the Martian temperature and to photograph the planet.

"Mars travels an orbit or path around the sun which is outside the earth's orbit. The two planets are like two celestial racehorses racing around a gigantic course, with the sun near the approximate center, Mars being the outside horse and the earth the inside one. Both travel in the same direction; but as Mars's path is longer than ours—nearly twice the distance—the earth is continually overtaking and passing Mars. The date when we pass and are exactly abreast is called the 'opposition,' because then Mars is on the opposite side of the earth from the sun, and the three bodies are approximately in a straight line. During opposition, Mars rises just as the sun sets, is visible all night, like the full moon, and sets in the west at daybreak.

"Not only is the orbit of Mars larger than that of the earth, but it is more eccentric, or oval. The result of these differences is that the times and positions of opposition vary. When an opposition occurs in February we are about 62,000,000 miles from Mars, but when it occurs in August we approach within 35,000,000 miles and sometimes nearer. The next opposition, which will be in 1928, falls in December, when the earth will be within 50,000,000 miles of Mars."

IN GENERAL, a near, or August, opposition occurs about every fifteen years. It has been computed mathematically that the nearest approach of Mars and the earth occurred 47,000 years ago, when they were only 33,883,000 miles apart, and that this will occur again in the year 278,224, A. D.

"The nearest opposition within the past hundred years was in August, 1924," said Professor Pickering, "when Mars and the earth were 34,637,000 miles apart. In October, 1926, we were not so near—the distance was 43,000,000 miles—but the position of Mars in the sky was more favorable for seeing in the northern hemisphere, where the majority of observatories are located. Perhaps more astronomers (Continued on page 78)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

It was as though the forest itself had gone suddenly mad, for, though jets of flame and puffs of smoke were visible amid the trees, no foeman showed himself

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

War Drums

A stirring romance of the early American wilderness

By HERBERT RAVENEL SASS

Illustrated by Stockton Mulford

Synopsis of the Four Preceding Instalments

To find her lover, Gilbert Barradell, the lovely Jolie Stanwicke left her mother's people in England and journeyed to her father's house in Old Charles Town. She found in this New World not her lover, who had vanished into the wilderness, but such dangers and intrigues and romance as she had not dreamed existed. Her father, Lord Stanwicke, was in the power of Captain Lance Falcon—villain, pirate, and ally of the Spaniards against the English. And Falcon demanded Jolie's hand. In her distress, Jolie turned to Almayne, a wise old hunter and fighter, for help in her search for Barradell. But it was not Almayne who helped her. Young Lachlan McDonald—Indian, Scotchman, Frenchman, Prince of the Muskogee Empire and Chief of the Family of the Wind—saw Jolie in Lord Stanwicke's garden and vowed not to go back to his father's kingdom until he had found her lover for her.

At risk of his life he uncovered Falcon's schemes, learned that Barradell was alive, prisoner in "Chief Concha's town." This news he carried to Jolie—and in the midst of telling her, was kidnapped by Falcon's men, carried off on his brig, the "Good Fortune," and shipwrecked. He and Falcon were rescued, and Lachlan returned to Charles Town, to find from Almayne that Jolie's father had carried her off, virtually a prisoner, to his country estate. They followed, found Jolie in the midst of a scene with her father, who was threatening her with violence, gagged and bound Lord Stanwicke, and took Jolie off on horseback to join a pack train headed for Lachlan's home. This train was led by Jock and Meg Pearson, and with it traveled Lachlan's old tutor, Francis O'Sullivan, and Lachlan's warriors, Striking Hawk and Little Mink.

It was a strange world to Jolie; but Meg took charge of her, dressed her in buckskin, and they pushed ahead.

And then came the signal of danger from the path behind them. Lachlan turned to Jolie:

"Mam'selle," he said, "we will go now—you and Almayne and I. It was the signal agreed upon with Striking Hawk. It means that pursuers from Charles Town are coming. Ready, Mam'selle? Then—ride!"

MR. FRANCIS O'SULLIVAN lounged upon his mule and chirped a foolish song. When his mind was serene, he loved the stately stanzas of the austere Greeks. In moments of anxiety, his tongue, without direction from his brain, warbled of lighter themes. Care bestrode him now—for he sang of love:

"Oh, a Princess walked in the hawthorne lane;
Bright was her hair as the Mogul's gold.
And he saw it shine like the sun through rain,
And he could not know that her eyes were cold.

"So he said to his sword: 'There is none so fair
From the Uttermost Snows to the Happy Isles;'
And he swore: 'By God, I will kiss her hair!'
And he prayed: 'Lord, blind me not when she smiles.'"

Jock Pearson, riding on the little man's right, scowled as though he found the tune distasteful; and Meg Pearson, riding just behind him, a long-stemmed black pipe clenched in her teeth, suddenly ripped out a most emphatic exclamation.

"What ails you, Ugly Meg?" he inquired mildly. "Do you swear at my singing? For my part, I swear by it."

"A plague on your singin'!" Meg answered harshly. "They're comin'. I hear their hoof beats."

Mr. O'Sullivan's smile lost something of its good humor.

"I'm disappointed," he said; "I had begun to hope that our fears were unfounded, after all. Well, our friends have a good start. Hast any plans, Jock?"

The big trader shook his head. "Only to help Almayne all we can without runnin' ourselves into hot water," he answered gruffly.

"H'm," said Mr. O'Sullivan thoughtfully. "And suppose you let me do the talking, Jock of the bear's voice. I've a good lying tongue in my head, and the less you say the less likely you'll get in trouble."

Jock grumbled something in the depths of his beard, but Meg said quickly, "Talk if you want to, Mr. O'Sullivan. When somethin's goin' to happen, I gets a little narvous and forgets my breedin'."

"I'm a little nervous myself, Mistress Pearson," O'Sullivan said coolly, and went back to humming his tune. Ugly Meg glanced at him sharply, threw back her head, and laughed.

"Well, what now, my lovely Bird of Paradise?" asked O'Sullivan testily.

"I was only thinkin'," she said, her corrugated sun-tanned face a little redder than usual, "what a comical sight you are, a-settin' on that-ar mule with that-ar sword a-danglin' by your side."

Mr. O'Sullivan seemed not to hear her. He appeared to be deep in thought, but in reality he was listening—listening to the hoof beats, which he too now heard. Yet he would not turn his head. He sat very erect upon his jogging mule, his uncovered white hair gleaming in the sun, his small bright-blue eyes very blue in his round, smooth, pink countenance. As always, he wore a white shirt, open at the neck, and black knee trousers with silver buckles. One hand, in which he carried a light hickory switch, lay upon the pommel of his saddle; the other rested on the hilt of his slender rapier.

Suddenly he seemed to waken from his absorption.

"My sword, eh," he muttered absently. "What's comical about my sword? Why—"

A shout interrupted him. A packhorse driver was pointing behind him with his whip.

Around a bend of the Path behind the pack train, a group of riders was approaching at a gallop. There were five men in all, a tall man on a big black horse leading them.

O'Sullivan sat on his mule, watching them keenly.

"The tall, wide one's Lance Falcon," he said quietly. "Jock, d'ye know the others?"

Pearson shook his head. "Can't tell yit," he answered. "Except the tall one, they ride like sailors."

Mr. O'Sullivan grinned.

"That's what they are," he muttered. "Falcon's brought his own men with him. Probably the Governor was too slow in moving, and he's taken matters into his own hands. Well, well, luck's with us. Come!"

He clucked to his mule and, followed by Jock and Mistress Pearson, rode to the rear of the pack train.

"We'll meet 'em here," he said. "Mind now, I do the parleying."

LANCE FALCON, booted and spurred, the long red feather in his hat matching his broad red sash, reined in before the group, his men close behind him.

"Give you good day, gentlemen," he said pleasantly. "It grieves me to see that those who were with you are no longer of your company."

Mr. O'Sullivan blinked for a moment, uncomprehendingly. Then he turned to Jock Pearson.

"This man," he said distinctly, in his bird-like treble, jerking his thumb toward Falcon, "is evidently very drunk!"

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Falcon started violently, stared at O'Sullivan, then smiled.

"Your pardon, sir," he said. "I am very sober, and I am in haste."

O'Sullivan calmly returned the stare, then spoke again to Jock.

"If he is not drunk," he chirped, "then he is a boor. He has not the courtesy to uncover before a lady."

Falcon's hand, resting on his sword hilt, tightened; but his smile was broader than before. His eyes darted quickly from one to another of the three, and with a flourish he swept off his wide hat with its red feather.

"A thousand apologies!" he cried, bowing low to Meg. "In my haste I took the lady to be a man. I pray you overlook the error."

His smile vanished suddenly.

"You are Jock Pearson?" he asked, addressing the trader.

Jock nodded.

"It will be well for you, then, to answer my questions truthfully. I come with the Governor's authority. A young lady, Mistress Jolie Stanwicke, together with Mr. Lachlan McDonald and a hunter named Almayne, joined your party one day's march from Charles Town. Where are they now?"

"May I ask," said Mr. O'Sullivan meekly, "to see the Governor's warrant?"

Falcon whirled on him fiercely.

"And may I ask you, sir," he thundered, "to hold your tongue?"

The small blue eyes in Mr. O'Sullivan's pink face blinked rapidly. He stroked the point of his chin with a chubby white hand.

"I think, sir," he said cheerfully, "that by using my tongue I may save Your Honor considerable fruitless effort. Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that up to half an hour ago Mistress Jolie Stanwicke and her two companions were riding in our company. Let us suppose that they learned of your approach and decided to give you the slip. Let us suppose, finally, that they left us forthwith, not even pausing to say good-by.

"A few miles ahead of us, I am informed, are the great swamps and canebrakes of the Santee. By now, if all I have supposed is true, Mistress Jolie Stanwicke and her companions are in the Santee canebrakes. And by now I think it has dawned upon you, my black-browed, evil-eyed fellow, that you have played the part of a most lamentable ass!"

Falcon's full-blooded, sun-tanned face had turned a purple-red; under his mustache his white teeth gleamed; there was murder in his eyes. But O'Sullivan continued, unabashed.

"Gentle and courteous sir," he said, in tones of utmost humility, "by your gracious leave, I will put the case before you: The Governor was a little slow to act, so, with your own men, you galloped out of Charles Town to run Mistress Jolie Stanwicke down.

"There was a thing or two that you forgot, I'm thinking. You and your men are seamen, and seamen are grand upon the sea. But what I don't understand, Your Honor, and what you don't understand, Your Honor, is this: How are your seamen going to track Mistress Jolie Stanwicke in the canebrakes of the Santee, and she in charge of James Almayne, the best woodsman in Carolina?"

Mr. O'Sullivan smiled a beatific smile, the smile of a pink-cheeked, snowy-haired cherub.

"Faith, most superfluous sir," he said, "we were worried a while ago, thinking that surely you had with you some man of the woods who could follow a wilderness trail, and maybe match wits with Almayne. Yes, my thick-skulled captain, you gave me a scare, for I had understood that you had a brain. But my mind's easy now, and there's a singing in my heart. Good day, sir, and may the snakes of the Santee canebrakes sharpen their fangs on your hide"

FOR some moments Captain Falcon sat his horse in silence. He sat frowning, his arms folded, his head sunk forward a little, his eyes fixed upon Mr. O'Sullivan. The veins bulged in his forehead, yet his voice was calm.

"I take it," he said, "that you are Mr. Francis O'Sullivan, the pedagogue."

Mr. O'Sullivan bowed. "The same, sir," he replied sweetly. "And you are Captain Lance Falcon, the pirate who will some day be hanged."

A slow smile replaced Falcon's frown. "Mr. O'Sullivan," said he, "you have given me much pleasure."

Again the little man on the mule inclined his head. "Sure, and 'twould be discourteous," he replied, "not to return the compliment. It has been a real joy to me to learn that mine enemy is a fool."

Falcon's smile broadened. "Most of what you have said," he remarked quietly, "is true. Most true of all is it that I proved myself foolish when I lost patience with the Governor and set out on this quest without a woodsman to guide me. I had hoped to overtake my quarry on the road, and bag the bird before it could escape into the woods. Yet I am not quite the simpleton that you have supposed me, Mr. O'Sullivan. The Governor's men are but an hour or two behind me, and when they come up, we shall try to match wits with your friend Almayne."

Mr. O'Sullivan

He got himself on the horse's back, and by some miracle no missile touched him as the pony raced away up the Path

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

leaned forward on his mule. His right hand moved with amazing swiftness, and the hickory switch that he held in it thrashed across Falcon's cheek.

"You lie, Lance Falcon!" he said distinctly, in his high, thin voice of a bird.

It was a stinging blow. It left a white welt on the dark tan of Falcon's face. Yet the man did not move an inch, did not even lift his hand.

The hickory switch that O'Sullivan held thrashed across Falcon's cheek. "You lie, Lance Falcon!" he said

"Eh, well!" he cried. He turned to his men behind him and to the pack drivers standing near by.

"You are all witnesses?" he asked. "You saw the blow?"

A dozen heads nodded. Falcon turned again to the little man on the mule.

"Of course, Mr. O'Sullivan," he said, "your design has been entirely plain from the beginning. You wished to make a quarrel. I have understood that you have some reputation with the sword; in fact, that you make a pittance by teaching not only Greek and Latin but rapier play also. Well, I am not unwilling to have a lesson from so eminent a teacher, and perhaps in my clumsy way I may be able to instruct the pedagogue. 'Twill help pass the time until the Governor's men arrive."

With a tiger's litheness, which belied his bulk, he leaped from his horse. In an instant, O'Sullivan too was on his feet.

"The ground is firm here," Falcon continued coolly, "and the trees do not hedge us in too closely. There is room for some pretty play, do you not think?"

"And the road is open behind you," replied O'Sullivan; "so that when the fear of God comes upon you, your long legs may beat a rub-a-dub-dub back to town!"

Again Falcon's white teeth gleamed under his mustache.

"Tut, tut, my little pepper-pot," he chided, "you are overdoing it now. I see that I can instruct the pedagogue in gentlemanly courtesy."

Deliberately he removed his coat, handed it to one of his men, rolled back the sleeve of his white shirt, exposing his powerful forearm, dark brown with the suns of many seas.

He drew his sword with a flourish and, lowering the point, turned to Meg Pearson.

"Permit me, Madam," he said, bowing, "to reassure the timorous heart which must needs dwell with so fair a face. I shall not kill our little pedagogue. To do so might put me to some bother in Charles Town. I shall make a hole in his right arm above the elbow, and I think that within the next quarter of an hour he will lose a part of his left ear."

"Ugly Meg," chirped Mr. O'Sullivan, "if you don't want to see this long-winded, most cursed pirate sent to hell, you can just ride up the road a little piece and smoke your pipe!"

ON THE white sleeve of Mr. O'Sullivan's shirt above the elbow there was a spot of red no bigger than the end of a man's thumb. Meg Pearson, sitting bolt upright on her horse, her pipe clenched between her teeth, watched that spot with wide, staring eyes. It grew no larger, and presently Meg knew that O'Sullivan's right arm had been pricked, but that Falcon's sword point had not yet made the hole which he had promised to make in that arm.

Her gaze shifted to another spot of red. This spot, too, was small; the tip of her finger would have covered it. It was on the front of Falcon's shirt above the right lung. Another pin prick, Meg knew; but O'Sullivan's promise, also, had come close to fulfillment.

There were times when Meg could not see the swords, so swiftly did they move. They were like the tongues of snakes, and sometimes, as they slid along each other, they gave forth a sound like the hissing of serpents.

There was no sound except the sound of the swords, which was sometimes that hissing of angry snakes, and sometimes a deadly rasping which was like no other sound in the world. Around the two swordsmen, Jock Pearson's pack-horse drivers and Lance Falcon's followers formed (Continued on page 102)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

INTERESTING PEOPLE

Mrs. Major's Stock Company Plays to "Children Only"

PHOTOGRAPH BY HAROLD STEIN, FOTO TOPICS, N. Y.

CLARE TREE MAJOR is the founder and director of the Children's Saturday Morning Theatre, the only stock company in the world which plays exclusively to juvenile audiences. For the past four years, she and her troupe of seventeen members have played to regular engagements in New York and nearby suburban towns.

"Children are at once the most responsive and the most exacting of audiences," said Mrs. Major when I talked to her in the New York studio where her productions are rehearsed and costumed. "They are responsive because they are spilling over with the spirit of play, which makes it natural for them to enter heartily into a performance.

"Adults often come to the theatre with a sort of I-dare-you-to-entertain-me attitude. Youngsters never do. In imagination at least, they are on the stage, taking part in what is going on. Sometimes they forget entirely that they are spectators, and actually take a hand in the show by calling out excited suggestions to a favorite character who is in a tight place.

"I said that children are exacting. This is because no actor who gives a half-hearted performance can get by with them. And the amusing part of it is, children are much less likely than adults to get the illusion of reality from what happens on the stage. To little folks, what takes place beyond the footlights is indeed a play—a gorgeous game in which everybody must do his share with whole-souled enthusiasm. For example, when I take the part of a witch, the children don't want to be convinced that I am really a witch. They simply want to feel that I'm playing for all I'm worth at being a witch.

"Another way in which children are an exacting audience is this: If an actress plays the part of a princess at the beginning of the season, she must act that rôle in every play in which there is a princess. The children will not stand for a substitute. I don't know why this is; but it is a fact which we have to respect.

MISHKIN STUDIO, N. Y.

"People are often surprised when they learn that our company is composed almost entirely of adults," Mrs. Major went on. "I have to remind them that nearly all fairy tales and stories for children have only adult characters—the handsome Prince, the beautiful Princess, the cruel Stepmother, the wicked Magician, and so on. When children play among themselves, nobody wants to be a little boy or a little girl. Instead, everybody wants to play at being grown up.

"Children have the finest sense of justice in the world. They demand that truth and goodness triumph. And although they are generous with pity where it is deserved, they are inexorable when it comes to meting out punishment to the wicked."

Mrs. Major was born to the theatre. She is descended from the famous Tree family, for many generations conspicuous in the annals of the English stage. One of her great-aunts was Mrs. Charles Keane, a noted star of Queen Victoria's day.

Clare Tree Major grew up in her native England. She had acted on the London stage for several years before she came to America in 1914 to put on a big municipal pageant in Houston, Texas. Her chore in Texas done, she returned to New York. While waiting for a Broadway engagement, she became interested in founding a school of the theatre. Several of Mrs. Major's students are now starring in New York.

About five years ago, she conceived the idea of starting a children's theatre. She at once set

PHOTOGRAPH BY HAROLD STEIN, FOTO TOPICS, N. Y.

Clare Tree Major (in oval) heads the Children's Saturday Morning Theatre, which is busy from November to May playing engagements in New York and nearby suburban towns. The two scenes are from "Cinderella," a general favorite with children of all ages

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

about putting her idea into practice. She struck her first snag when she discovered that acting for children requires a special technique. Her next step was to train a group of promising young actors according to certain theories which she thoroughly tested as she went along. The result was the present able company which she has been using in her productions for the past four years.

"We have never had very much money," she told me. "In fact, there have been times when all of us went without a pay envelope for several weeks on end and did most of our eating when we were invited out. I have never seen in any organization a more wonderful spirit.

"As you know, an actor is a highly specialized type of worker, but in my company, the leading man is handy with a hammer, and he can set up scenery so fast that it would make you dizzy. One of my boys, a young fellow who plays the prince, drives the truck in which we cart our costumes and special scenery from town to town. Our mistress of the wardrobe is not above mending wigs and making over costumes.

"From the first of November to the first of May, we give a performance in New York every Saturday morning. Our afternoon performances are divided among the suburban towns of New Jersey and Westchester County, New York. By December, when the season is in full swing, we are booked up for practically every afternoon except Sundays.

"Most of our plays are adapted from the classics. Anticipation does not spoil the play for children. In fact, they usually prefer to see something they are familiar with. We give six plays a season, and many of our patrons buy season tickets." MILDRED HARRINGTON

This Doctor Has Spent Half a Million Dollars for Butterflies

BUTTERFLIES have been the leading interest in the life of Dr. William Barnes, a broad-shouldered, athletic man despite his years. He has stored away in his own private museum, in Decatur, Illinois, one of the greatest collections of North American moths and butterflies in the world.

Doctor Barnes, who has also found time to become one of the leading surgeons of Central Illinois, has spent no small portion of the past fifty years of his life in gathering the specimens that fill his fireproof, stormproof museum from floor to ceiling. There is not a state in the country nor a province of Canada or Mexico that is unrepresented.

And while Doctor Barnes has gathered many of his specimens himself, he has also had numerous collectors working for him at one time and another. Nor can he place any definite figure on what his butterflies have cost him. It is somewhere between a half million and a million dollars.

Doctor Barnes formerly spent his vacations in search of butterflies in the Rockies. With a team of bronchos and guide, he spent whole weeks in the mountains, hoping for one day of wind and sun to dispel the cloud mists and reveal the rare trophies he sought. The work of a butterfly collector, according to him, is rather like that of a detective. The species is known, its markings, its habits, and the places where it is most likely to be found. With these clues, the chase takes on the character of a man-hunt.

Probably the earliest collectors who contributed to Doctor Barnes's museum were English explorers who pushed into the Northwest country and from thence into the Arctic wastes, in 1829. They were seeking a Northwest passage to India. Failing to find a short route to India's wealth, they brought back specimens of the insects, birds, and animals encountered.

The insects became a part of the collection of a French scientist, Oberthur. Doctor Barnes chanced to be in Europe at the time that the Oberthur collection was offered for sale. He hurried to the little French town in which Oberthur's heirs were auctioning off the collection and succeeded in acquiring for ten thousand dollars all the North American specimens. The Arctic specimens, a faint, iridescent green merging to pink, are among the dullest specimens in Doctor Barnes's collection.

For the past fifty years, Dr. William Barnes, a surgeon of Decatur, Illinois, has devoted his spare time to collecting butterflies and buying up the collections of others. He is shown in his fireproof butterfly museum, which contains nearly ten thousand specimens

There are other butterflies in the Barnes collection that have histories nearly as long.

There are three or four specimens—the only ones in the world—of a butterfly species that is now extinct. These specimens were caught in a swamp where now the city of San Francisco stands. When the swamp was drained in order that the city might be built, the butterflies disappeared.

But there are all kinds in the collection, nearly ten thousand different species, of which Doctor Barnes and his curators have named and identified for the first time nearly one thousand. Mounted and labeled, they are filed away in tightly sealed drawers, tier upon tier. There are even many brilliant tropical specimens, which he acquired through the purchase of whole collections.

At times Doctor Barnes has had from four to five collectors in the field working for him throughout the year. Expeditions have gone to Baffin's Bay and Labrador, up peaks two miles high, and into fever-infested swamps. Doctor Barnes has paid out to these collectors from $10,000 to $20,000 a year. They send their prizes back in cigar boxes, and in the museum the delicate process of mounting and preservation is begun. At times there have been as many as fifty collectors—specialists—contributing to the Barnes collection on a commission basis.

Once the Government became interested in the purchase of the Barnes collection for scientific purposes. A bill was introduced in Congress appropriating $310,000 for its purchase, and although it was defeated, a wealthy scientific foundation is working to the end that the collection will not be sold out of the country.

Butterflies have not been Doctor Barnes's only hobby. And in the interest that has come almost to usurp their place in his regard is seen the reason why he is willing to dispose of his collection.

This interest is the Decatur and Macon County Hospital which Doctor Barnes helped to establish. More money is needed for the hospital and he has promised the first hundred thousand dollars from the sale of his collection, to supplement his numerous other gifts.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Baseball is another of Doctor Barnes's interests. He was largely responsible for the building recently of a $50,000 stadium on Decatur's baseball field. Golf is still another hobby.

In between hobbies he has found time to practice his profession, raise a family, entertain distinguished visitors who have come to see his collection, and play an important part in the life of his city and state. Looking back, he remembers some of the leading men of his day at Harvard—Oliver Wendell Holmes and Louis Agassiz among others, the latter being the one who first fired him with a zeal to make a genuine contribution to the natural sciences.

MARQUIS W. CHILDS

Frank Hallman Runs His Whole Town After Ten O'clock at Night

GAS? And a place to eat? Why, just drive down to the garage, next block, and ask for Mike; he's the cop. He'll fix you up."

Anybody who happens to stop in the old-fashioned village of Sellersville, Pennsylvania, after ten o'clock at night will get that answer to practically any inquiry or request he may make. Mike, whose right name is Frank Hallman, is chief of police and, because he is the only one, the "police force" in Sellersville.

Something more than a year ago, Sellersville, one of those quaint little Quaker towns which lie to the north of Philadelphia, decided it needed a police force. Especially did it want one at night. True, it was a long way from the roar of the big city—forty miles to Philadelphia—but it was on the heavily traveled Bethlehem Pike, a broad sheet of concrete along which hundreds of motor cars sped daily. The pike forms the Main Street of the village.

Now the quiet descendants of the early Quakers who settled here like nothing better than nocturnal silence. They close the shutters, put out the cat, wind up the clock, turn off the radio at ten P. M. and go to bed. Wrapped in the silence of a small town, they used to fall asleep very quickly.

But, alas, all this was now changing. The constant and ever-increasing stream of motorists smote upon the peaceful hours until it grew unbearable. Not only was there the constant rush and whirr of machines, but there were those intrepid drivers who, stopping and finding garage, restaurant and hotel closed, instead of passing on, honked their automobile horns and hammered at the doors to awaken the proprietor and obtain what they wanted. Slumber time in Sellersville became anything but a Quaker quiet. The councilors met, and decided to do something about it.

"What we need," said one, "is a constable to keep these people quiet."

But the mayor went still further. "The way to keep people quiet," he said, "is to give them what they want. We need a uniformed policeman, but one who is competent to sell the passers-by what they want to buy."

Citizens of Sellersville, Pennsylvania, couldn't sleep nights because of auto tourists clamoring for service. So they appointed Frank Hallman constable, giving him keys to the buildings and the job of supplying whatever is wanted, from a room to a gallon of gasolene

The mayor's idea was made law, and Frank Hallman got the job. He was duly sworn in as "chief," although the only person he commands is himself. A motorcycle was provided, he was equipped with a snappy uniform like those of the State Troopers—a heavy revolver and holster went with it—and, most unusual of all, he got a list of duties.

Thus, Hallman became night nurse to Sellersville. He was given keys to nearly every business establishment in the village, including the undertaker's parlor.

His brother, also known as "Mike," and who looks enough like Frank to be his twin, runs the village garage. Brother Frank has the keys to the place. Therefore—

"Ten gallons and some oil? Fix you up in a minute; just drive down to that next filling pump." And the village policeman lays down his night stick, unlocks the pump, fills the tank, takes the money, waves a genial good night to his customer, and continues patrolling the street.

The same goes for the two restaurants in Sellersville, the hotel, the grocery store, hardware, and bakery.

"I like to accommodate folks, and the townspeople like the trade," says Frank. "Besides, it breaks up the monotony of the night watch. Sure, and why shouldn't I take care of things? A few things I shy off—one guy asked me to take him to the dentist's one night. I told him I'd fill his gas tank and put him to bed, but I'd be darned if I'd pull his teeth at that hour. I did show him around to the doctor, though.

"One night a man and his family drove in. First, he just wanted a bite to eat; they had intended to make Philadelphia but he was too hungry and tired to drive farther, he said. When I fixed them all up with egg sandwiches and made a cup of tea, they decided they'd just stay here for the night. So I took them over to Bill's, opened up, had them register, showed them to their rooms, and took the money. Dad Fargo didn't know until the next morning he had four extra guests in the house."

Hallman weighs two hundred pounds, is forty-five years old, married, and has one daughter. Next to policing, he likes to work in the garden back of his home. He has plenty of time for this too, for he does not go on duty until late in the afternoon and is free again at six A. M.

Possessed of abundant good humor, he always has a ready "wise crack" for the gay visitor who stops to joke with him. But woe to the speeder who attempts to wreck the staid calm of Main Street after the curfew hour strikes; Hallman has proved several times that he rides a "mean" motorcycle. He is also an excellent shot.

As a rule, Hallman's beat is in the hotel-and-garage block, and there it is that everyone locates him. Although Sellersville has more than two thousand population, all know "Mike."

"Say, they wanted to run me for mayor one spring. Can you beat that?" he asked, looking up from filling a radiator. "There are enough nuts would have voted for me too, I guess," he added. "But, shucks, I meet lots more folks on this job. I'm going to stick to it."

CY PETERMAN

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Wallick Has a Truck Farm on Top of a Hotel

ONE morning, about three years ago, early pedestrians in the down-town section of Providence were startled to hear the shrill "cock-a-doodle-do" of a rooster, many times repeated.

Investigation revealed the noise-maker as a much disgruntled, disheveled, and highly indignant white rooster of the common barnyard variety. He was perched atop the four-story municipal building. How he got there was a puzzle until L. Duane Wallick, manager of the Providence-Biltmore Hotel, hearing of the strange escapade, went over to the city hall and claimed the bird.

Thus it was that Providence first learned of a project that has developed into what is perhaps the only aërial farm in the world. It was then less than a year-old experiment. Now, two years later, it is a venture that pays its own way and bids fair to be further enlarged in scope.

Hens, nearly one thousand of them; prize ducks, rabbits, monkeys, small fruits, and truck garden vegetables, not to mention an almost endless variety of flowers, are raised sixteen floors above the center of the business section in the second largest city in New England.

The hennery and, later, the garden, started as a fad, has developed into such a business that one man is always kept busy tending to it, and sometimes, in the summer, more than one man is so employed.

It all began when Carroll E. Tebbetts, chief engineer of the Biltmore, and Mr. Wallick got into the habit of going up to the roof to throw a medicine ball around. One day Mr. Tebbetts suggested raising chickens up there. Mr. Wallick told him to go ahead. Tebbetts got six hens and a rooster and started in to be a poultryman. The poultry thrived. He kept them well sheltered during the winter and the flock still prospered. In the spring, the number of chickens was increased and modern houses were installed. It was about this time that the rooster escaped.

The only way that incident has been explained by Mr. Wallick is that probably two roosters got to fighting, and when one of them rose in the air, flapping his wings, a gust of wind caught him, and lifted him over the protecting wall. Eventually the wind carried him across the street and down, to the roof of City Hall, twelve stories below.

The only other serious drawback to the venture was discovered about a year ago, when thirty prize Muscovy ducks, the pride of the aërial farm, flew away. One of the drakes discovered that he could use his wings and, within a minute after he had set a course for the blue waters of Narragansett Bay, the whole flock took wing after him. They were not recovered; but others took their places, and now the duck runs, like the hen runways, are covered.

Fresh eggs, not an hour old? Mr. Wallick is never afraid now to guarantee them at his table. Carrots, beets, onions, lettuce, radishes in season? He never hesitates to give his word that they will come right off the aërial farm, not five minutes from the kitchens. Fresh cut flowers? He raises enough on the roof to more than supply the needs of his hotel.

"Not a chicken on the place has ever set foot on the ground," says Mr. Wallick, pointing with evident pride to his flock, which now is housed in modern coops, and provided with covered cement runways.

"It has been said that hens won't thrive on cement," observes the owner, "but ours do. We give them plenty of scratch material and they are happy. Last winter my flock averaged more than eight dozen eggs a day."

"Up to three years ago," said Mr. Wallick, "the roof space went to waste, except for a couple of chow dogs, who used it for their airing."

The poultry, he explains, provide more than eggs; broilers often have been supplied for the tables down-stairs.

"As the experiment proved a paying proposition," the owner of the aërial farm explains, "we decided to enlarge on the idea. We now plan setting out grapevines and berry bushes. We did have some grapes, but the hens got most of them. We won't put the hens and the grapes too near together this time."

L. D. Wallick, manager of the Providence-Biltmore Hotel, of Providence, Rhode Island, supplies his guests with new-laid eggs, fresh vegetables, and cut flowers from his truck and poultry farm on the roof of the sixteen-story building in which he lives and works. Started three years ago as an interesting diversion, Mr. Wallick's project is now a paying proposition

Tucked in among the chicken runways, the truck garden, and the flower beds is a little pool, with goldfish, and there is another and larger pool for the ducks. Indeed, these creatures have all the comforts of home. The goldfish, however, share their pool with the turtles. Some day there will be a special turtle soup on the menu, fresh from the roof farm; but this is not promised for some time. Mr. Wallick wants to give the turtles time to grow.

The monkeys proved the biggest problem, in some ways. It is necessary for the little fellows to be kept quite warm in winter and on cold, wet days in summer. To insure this, a glass-covered runway has been provided, so constructed that the monkeys can remain under glass or find their way into the uncovered runway, as they please, during the cold weather. They, like the goldfish, were added to the "farm" for color and adornment.

"Everybody laughed when the idea of making a roof farm pay was suggested," says Mr. Wallick. "It may seem a little

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

harder than getting a profit out of some of the stony hillsides of New England, but it isn't. All you need, really, to go at it on any flat roof, is persistence, a little ingenuity, the necessary equipment, and then follow the fundamental rules of farming and poultry raising, as they have been followed for centuries on the ground. Certainly there is no better place than a roof for sun and rain. Whatever there is, you get it.

Of course, space being limited in an area that covers only three thousand four hundred square feet, everything has to be condensed as much as possible. You have to give hens considerable space for running, and a truck garden covers quite an area if you intend to raise enough to make it pay. So every available square foot of space on the roof is utilized.

So well has the aërial farm venture paid, that it long ago passed from a purely recreational diversion to a commercial proposition. Mr. Wallick devotes a great deal of spare time to his farm, high above the downtown roof-tops, and takes a keen delight in the supervision and direction of it; but of course most of the actual labor of caring for the live stock and truck garden, as well as the flowers, has been turned over to an experienced gardener and poultryman.

Nevertheless, several times a day, except when business prevents, Mr. Wallick may be found up on the roof farm, where he also has a one-story bungalow, comfortably furnished, and suitable for both summer and winter.

Here he does some entertaining, and sleeps, on hot summer nights, surrounded by his hens and ducks and growing things. He has all the advantages of a country farm right in the middle of the city.

In spite of the efficient way his thirty-four hundred square feet of roof-top has been plotted out, Mr. Wallick is still working on the problem of how to condense the space still further, so as to be able to raise more products. He even considered the advisability of adding a couple of cows to his collection of live stock. The idea of being able to supply the hotel guests with plenty of rich milk and cream attracted him strongly. But he finally gave up the idea. "Though," he says, "with a little more room it would be perfectly feasible."

Mr. Wallick was an aviator in the World War, which perhaps accounts for his hankering for farm life in the upper air. Despite the fact that the venture pays, it is conducted chiefly as a hobby.

RALPH E. BAILEY

A Janitress Who Gave Her Church a $12,000 Organ

EARLY in December of each year, the First Baptist Church of Everett, Washington, is filled to its capacity with an audience gathered to hear a recital on the twelve-thousand-dollar organ housed in the building. The program announces that the recital is given in honor of Mrs. Mathea Severson, donor of the organ. In the audience, wearing the same fur coat and black silk hat that she has worn to church for many years, sits Mrs. Severson herself. Fifty-four years old, her face is deeply lined and seamed, and her hands are rough and hardened with the toil of many years.

Mrs. Severson is a janitress. For nearly thirty years she has cared for business offices in Everett. During this time, she has accumulated a competency of nearly one hundred thousand dollars, an amount far greater than the sum total of her earnings. She has demonstrated what thrift, coupled with the ability to save, will accomplish.

Mrs. Severson lives in a small room among the offices over the Citizens' Bank. She is a hard woman to find, for she goes to work at four in the morning, and usually does not return before midnight. I finally located her, mop in hand, in a down-town office. She explained that she was busy, but that she would talk to me during her lunch hour.

Born on a farm near Christiania, Norway, Mrs. Severson married a carpenter, and emigrated with him to the United States in 1900.

"We had just enough money to pay our passage," she told me. "My husband had heart disease and serious stomach trouble, which prevented his working at his trade. So I earned our living. When I came to Everett, I got fifteen cents an hour for my work. I earned in all from thirty to thirty-five dollars a month."

Mrs. Severson is not a big woman. She may weigh one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and thirty pounds. Yet at one time, without assistance, she cared for sixteen Everett business places. Until his death, which occurred a few years ago, her husband helped her, and since then she has usually employed one assistant.

PHOTOGRAPH BY JULEEN STUDIO, EVERETT, WASH.

For nearly thirty years, Mrs. Mathea Severson has scrubbed office floors in Everett, Washington. During that time, her savings, invested on the advice of her banker friends, have grown to $100,000. Fifteen years ago, she gave her church a $12,000 organ. Mrs. Severson, who is now fifty-four years old, plans to retire soon to her five-acre farm, on which she expects to grow holly trees

"The largest amount I ever earned in one month was one hundred and thirty-five dollars during the war period," she said. "As soon as I had saved enough to make loans, I began letting money out at interest. This helped me a great deal."

Mrs. Severson owes her present prosperity entirely to her saving propensities, plus the advice of her banker friends, who have guided her wisely in the investment of her savings. Some time ago, she bought two lots, for which she paid $33,000. The property is on the outskirts of Everett's business district. Mrs. Severson recently refused $45,000 for it, claiming steadfastly that it is worth $50,000 to-day.

Fifteen years ago, when the First Baptist Church was built, Mrs. Severson gave a twelve-thousand-dollar organ. Nor is this her only gift to the church. Her contributions have been a big factor in the development of the institution.

Mrs. Severson recently purchased a five-acre tract of land, with house and outbuildings, five miles out of Everett on the Mukilteo road. The site is well elevated, with a beautiful panoramic view over Puget Sound, suggestive, Mrs. Severson says, of the coast of Norway where her girlhood was spent. She paid five thousand dollars for the property. She plans to go into the nursery business when she retires.

"In a year or two," she explained, "I am going to give up my present work, and live on my Mukilteo place. There is money to be made in holly trees, and I have ordered a hundred that I shall plant. Gradually I will increase the number. I expect to end my days in comfort, among much the same surroundings that I knew as a child. And when my time is spent and my days are done, I will leave what I have saved to establish a home for destitute men and women in Everett.

Mrs. Severson's name is a password to every business place in Everett. Bankers, brokers, business, and professional men alike feel safe when they entrust their keys to this sturdy daughter of Norway. Her life has been one of unremitting, humble service to the community in which she lives. In her work and in her giving, she has proved again that cleanliness is often very close to godliness.

ARTHUR C. SAUNDERS

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The soup your appetite remembers!

Your sense of taste likes to remember such a lively and delightful flavor as it enjoys in Campbell's Tomato Soup. No other soup in the world is demanded so often or served so frequently. Once the appetite learns how good this soup is, the desire to "repeat" the experience is certain—and frequent.

Just the tonic juices and luscious tomato "meat" in a smooth puree, enriched with golden butter and seasoned deftly and delicately. Serve this famous soup also as Cream of Tomato. See the simple directions on the label. 12 cents a can.

"Dick-Dead-Eye" is my fame,
I never miss my aim.
To soup I owe
My health and glow
And Campbell's is its name!

A different soup for every day. See list of 21 kinds on label.

Campbell's Soups

LUNCHEON DINNER SUPPER

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Decay

at The Danger Line

—the enemy of glowing health . . . of beauty . . . and of charm

THAT fragile line where the healthy pink of gums meets the pearly white of teeth—that is The Danger Line.

It is called The Danger Line because it is the place where decay strikes its most treacherous blow. In the tiny V-shaped crevice formed around each tooth, food particles collect and ferment. Acids are formed that cause decay and often, too, Pyorrhea or dangerous gum irritations.

Not only this. But from decayed teeth poisons are generated which can cause serious illness. Women who suffer from the slow poisoning of decaying teeth or infected gums may not necessarily be ill. But they may find the charm of glowing health waning. For lack of vitality makes faces old. Pain, as well as worry, causes wrinkles.

Guard The Danger Line

Take care of your teeth. Your health often depends on them. And it is so simple to protect them. Dentists agree overwhelmingly that acids at The Danger Line are the most frequent cause of tooth decay and gum irritations. It follows, therefore, that to safeguard teeth and gums you must combat the attack of these acids.

There is one dentifrice today that gives you the necessary protection. It is Squibb's Dental Cream, made with Squibb's Milk of Magnesia. For Milk of Magnesia is recommended by dentists everywhere as a perfect means of neutralizing the acids in the mouth.

Squibb's gives lasting protection

Squibb's Dental Cream contains over 50 per cent of Squibb's Milk of Magnesia. It reaches all those tiny pits and crevices on your teeth which are inaccessible to any tooth-brush. There it remains, neutralizing destructive acids, preventing decay, fighting the peril of Pyorrhea, safeguarding the health and vigor of your entire system.

Make your teeth and gums safe at The Danger Line. Use Squibb's Dental Cream night and morning. It contains no grit. It heals the gums and soothes sensitive teeth. See your dentist twice a year. You will be safeguarded from decay and its threat of disease and attendant misery. At all druggists—only 40 cents for a large tube.

Read what the dentists say

In almost any drug store you will find dozens of dentifrices. In every publication you find many conflicting theories on mouth hygiene. Which is right? What dentifrice shall you use?

That the question might be answered by highest authorities, E. R. Squibb & Sons asked a world-famous research institution to make an investigation that would include the entire dental profession. 50,000 practicing dentists were asked certain questions relating to mouth hygiene. Here is summary of their replies:

95% of the answers agree that acids most frequently cause tooth decay and gum irritation.

95% of the answers state that the most serious trouble occurs at the place where teeth meet gums—known as The Danger Line.

85% state that the best product to prevent these acids from causing decay and irritating the gums is Milk of Magnesia.

Surely, in the face of such overwhelming evidence there can be no doubt that Squibb's Dental Cream, made with Squibb's Milk of Magnesia, will really bring protection.

E. R. Squibb & Sons, New York. Manufacturing Chemists to the Medical Profession since 1858.

Squibb's Milk of Magnesia helps to keep you fit

The strength and energy we use up every day must be renewed if we are to remain at our best. And this renewal depends on alimentation.

Squibb's Milk of Magnesia promotes proper alimentation by virtue of its two-fold action. Its antacid quality helps counteract improper digestion. Its mild laxative action helps to relieve the system from the burden of fermenting food.

At druggists, only 25c and 50c.

© 1928

SQUIBB'S DENTAL CREAM

THE "PRICELESS INGREDIENT" OF EVERY PRODUCT IS THE HONOR AND INTEGRITY OF ITS MAKER

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Does Your Mind Hit on All Its Cylinders?

(Continued from page 53)

finished the job, he goes to the next blank wall that waits for his contribution to the beauty and business mechanism of the city.

The other man is an artist in his studio, chatting with the sitter as he proceeds, step by step, to make a portrait. He explains why he selected a canvas of a certain weave and material. Not all fabrics have the same absorption qualities. He tells of the technique of canvas preparation that will insure a good picture which will last for ages. He understands textiles, and explains the advantages and disadvantages connected with different fabrics. Then he marks out his preliminary drawing, being careful to arrange his sitter so as to get what he calls a pleasing composition. As he works, he chats about the principles of composition, how to balance mass and line, how to plan color harmonies and contrasts. He opens up a whole world of knowledge handed down by artists of all ages.

As he mixes his colors on his palette he discusses the chemical sources of the pigments. He knows which will turn dark with age and which will not.

As he begins his under-painting, he discusses anatomy, pointing out the bony structure of the skull of his sitter and the way this or that muscle affects the expression of the face. Now and then, as the sitter becomes tired of the pose, he entertains him with stories of Velasquez, the master portrait-maker of the Spanish School and contrasts his methods with those of Rembrandt and Franz Hals. He knows great artists as men living in the surroundings of their day, as technicians. In the light of all this he knows his own work, its excellence and its weakness. Here we have the cultivated artist in contrast with the artisan who paints ads by rule of thumb.

But even the sign painter has an attractive, cultural vista before him if only he would look. If he would take each thread of knowledge that he possesses and trace it back, what new thoughts would come to delight him, and how soon he too would be able to weave a fabric of joy that would delight him and make him better able to discharge each task with greater sympathy and skill!

Suppose our artist should also be interested in poetry, politics, and philosophy. That would widen his range. The broader it becomes the greater he grows.

HERE, we have, I think, the basis of the educated man's point of view. He sees things in their historical perspective. The events of the day, and everything that happens to him, he interprets in the light of human experience in this age and in ages past. He reads between the lines of his newspaper. His wide range of information, his habit of independent thought, enable him to sift evidence for himself and to form his own opinions and to discharge well his own tasks.

I have been interested to observe how frequently it happens that when a young man starts out to widen his knowledge, in order to increase his efficiency in his business or profession, he continues his studies until he is so broadly educated that scholarship for its own sake makes its appeal. I have in mind a man who was once a young lawyer in the office of the corporation counsel of New York. He had passed the high-school grades but had not attended college before he entered law school. In law school he had had no instruction in constitutional law, and the lack of it he found was a handicap in his work.

To make up for this shortcoming, he arranged to attend the evening sessions at the College of the City of New York. I remember distinctly the emphasis he put on the fact that he had only time to take one course in the subject that would be of use to him. It was all, he thought, his other engagements would permit.

Months went by, and one day he came to my office to discuss the possibility of taking another course. He had found that he could not understand constitutional law thoroughly because he didn't know enough history. I smiled. This young man's education was just beginning. The symptom of much significance was that he was beginning to see the inter-relation of one subject with another. After taking courses in history, politics, and government, he decided that the thing to do was to complete the college curriculum leading to a degree. In due time he was graduated an A. B.

THIS is the education process in its truest sense. One subject leads to another until we have a complete view of many related fields of knowledge.

We begin to see causes behind effects. Things that were once complicated and mysterious, because we viewed them singly, we now recognize as the reasonable results of the outworking of a familiar principle. In short, we have acquired a point of view. It is the point of view of the intellectually free, the man who sees and understands the thoughts, deeds, and aspirations of all men in all ages in a perspective that is appropriate to the times in which he lives.

Frequently, as director of the evening sessions of the College of the City of New York, I used to be brought into contact with both young and mature students who earnestly desired to proceed with their education. "Where shall I begin? What books shall I read?" These are the questions most often asked. My response often was in the form of a series of questions, accompanied by certain additional suggestions. You will find similar questions printed in connection with this article, together with my comments.

At this point, I would like to say that any subject properly mastered is truly educational. A young man is likely to go furthest in his studies if he starts with some subject of intense interest to him, something connected with his present occupation or with the position for which he desires to fit himself. If I were he, beginning with such subjects, I would keep on the lookout for new ideas, for references to other books and other subjects related to the one occupying me at the moment.

I do not wish to imply that the carefully thought out courses of study in our elementary schools, high schools and colleges are useless or undesirable. On the contrary, I believe firmly in careful, compact, and disciplinary curricula for our formal education. But when a person has left school and taken up the practical duties of life, he can best find an entrance into the field of broad culture right in the shop in which he works, and in the pursuit of a complete understanding of those things of most immediate interest to him.

SOME earnest seekers after self-education begin their quest with much indiscriminate reading. From the point of view of direct results, this is often a waste of time. The great difference between being educated and uneducated does not always consist in the amount of reading and study accomplished, but in the amount of intelligent, well-directed reading and study that is done.

Do not scatter! We do not become educated by gambling in knowledge. There's no sense in reading as widely as you can on the chance that this information may be useful to you some day, or that it may possibly shape up in coherent form. I strongly urge you, therefore, to begin with those subjects that have a close relation to your present purpose in life, or some hobby of intense interest, and then follow the subjects that branch out from this. The fifteen questions in Groups I and II of the questionnaire accompanying this interview might well serve as the basis of a plan for a young man's self-education in both its practical and its cultural phases.

Once a young man has progressed in his reading to the point where one book leads to another and one subject suggests another, his real, self-directed education has begun. If it occurs to him that to master some special phase of his business or profession, he ought to take a course in some correspondence school, attend night school or the extension courses of a university, that in itself is an indication that he is on the right track. It is then a question of following through.

No man ever possessed himself of a thorough education without hitting rough places. It is a long, slow, deliberate process, full of surprises, rewards and happiness. In every walk of life we see men sacrificing rest, ease, sleep, and leisure to complete their education and convert it into practical terms.

To produce his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" Gibbon was twenty years educating himself on his subject. Noah Webster was thirty-six years in collecting and defining words. Stephenson educated himself for fifteen years, and his education expressed itself in the form of a perfected locomotive.

It is the education which we get when working for a purpose that is most apt to yield happiness to us and to be of value to the world.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

If you will study the lives of the six representative educated men I have mentioned, you will see that the three points of resemblance between them would provide an adequate scheme for the biography of each. It would be the complete story of their lives told from the point of view of their education.

Take Franklin, for instance, a kind of orphan, a castaway. At an early age we find him astonishing his fellow Philadelphians with his diligence in business and his genius for thriving on very little. We see him pushing through the streets of the city a wheelbarrow loaded with supplies for his printing shop. First and above all, he is at this time loyal to his tasks as a printer. But he is animated with a keen desire to be intelligent. He takes the trouble to think about the problems of the day. That he may think to better advantage, he seeks information wherever he can find it. He is pursuing a course of work and study that occupies him from five A. M. to nine P. M.

At twenty-one he has organized the famous Junto, the debating society which had as its object the intellectual improvement of its members. At twenty-three he writes and publishes a pamphlet on a complicated currency question which has an important influence on the Colonial legislatures. His business prospers, and his knowledge widens at one and the same time. He buys the "Pennsylvania Gazette," which he manages and edits and to which he is the wisest and most humorous contributor.

He aspires to be a public servant, besides being a man of substance and learning. He gets the streets of his city paved, cleaned, and lighted. He reforms the police and founds the first fire department. He establishes the academy which became the University of Pennsylvania. He improves the methods of treating the soil for agriculture. His invention, the Franklin stove, is such an improvement over the old fireplace that it becomes the marvel of the age.

At forty-two he retired from business with a comfortable fortune—to do good and to continue his education as a man of science. He is known far and wide for his honesty and truth, his tolerance and benevolence. Again and again he is called upon to serve the Colonies in one way or another. He emerges as the great Citizen, the foremost man of his time, celebrated in science, our country's first diplomat.

MEN of this kind we find in all ages. You will find that in the final analysis they are distinguished by the scope of their loyalties. They are loyal to their own immediate tasks and obligations, their vocations, their business associates, their friends, their families, and at the climax of their powers they work not only for the good of all these but for mankind. As a man of this type I have named Lincoln. Compress his career into the briefest possible compass and it might be stated thus:

1. He was ambitious to be a lawyer, and he persisted in this until he qualified himself admirably.

2. He broadened his mind by wide investigations and reading. As the need arose, he qualified himself as politician and statesman.

3. He dedicated himself to humanity in the highest sense of the term.

The same is true of Theodore Roosevelt, Carnegie, Edison, and Pupin. Early in life they mastered the tools of their trade. They tried to understand life from the point of view of the age in which they found themselves. Each was concerned to make his best possible contribution to the good of all.

In a very real sense the story of our education is the story of our lives. The important thing is not where we start but that we do start, and then keep going. In school we were judged by the ability and perseverance with which we pursued certain courses laid down for us by others. In after life, we are judged by the goal we choose for ourselves and the ability and perseverance with which we strive for it. Sooner or later each of us must determine the capacity of his own ship, set a course for it, and navigate!

Questionnaire

IN THE foregoing article Doctor Robinson discusses the three great characteristics of the truly educated man, and names six men as representative of this class. Each of us, he says, should examine the progress of his own education in the light of these three important aspects. Where do you think you stand?

Doctor Robinson has divided the following series of questions into three groups. The questions in each group bear directly upon one of the three important phases of your education: first, your vocational skill; second, your education in the broad sense, what you are doing to increase your knowledge; third, the loyalty you owe to yourself and to all with whom you come in contact.

In commenting on these questions, Doctor Robinson says:

"Answering them will not tell you exactly how you measure up in each of the three important phases of your education. The questions are compass points. Answering them will tell you a good deal about how you are steering now, and how you ought to steer. If you can answer them readily and definitely, it shows that you have already done some real thinking with reference to your education. It would indicate to my mind that you already have possession of an excellent method, that should carry your education to a high plane. Any man who cannot answer these questions specifically needs to keep them in mind and to refer to them frequently, for he is not yet master of the tools of his trade nor is he the captain of his own ship.

"However, your answers to these questions are not the important thing. The ultimate result depends upon the course of action which your answers inspire you to take."

The course of action Doctor Robinson refers to is discussed in the foregoing interview. Here are the questions:

GROUP I. (These questions have to do with your vocational skill and the vocation for which you think you are fitted by your capacity.)

1. Are you as good as the best man in your craft? (Your trade, business or profession?)

2. If not, what are the qualities of the best man, which you lack?

3. Is there any reason why you should not, by study and practice, develop these qualities further in yourself?

4. What methods should you follow to acquire these qualities? (a) What men should you consult? (b) What books should you read? (c) What practices or exercises should you follow?

5. If you are master of your craft, is there, nevertheless, some calling a step higher for which you could prepare yourself?

6. What men, books, and exercises should you take up to prepare yourself for this higher calling?

7. Is there some calling totally different from the one you have been following in which you think you would be happier and make a greater success?

8. What are the steps necessary to prepare yourself for such a change?

9. What immediate losses would you expect to suffer if you attempted to make such a change?

10. What would the gains be from such a change, in the long run?

GROUP II. (These questions have to do with your education in the broad sense—your progress in information and knowledge.)

1. How far did you go in formal schooling?

2. Did you make the most of the schooling you received? (a) If not, was it due to lack of attention? (b) Was it due to the fact that you were not prepared for some of the work? (c) Was it due to the fact that you did not realize the importance of education?

3. What have you done since to add to your general education as distinguished from your efforts to improve your skill in your calling? (a) How many books have you read in the past year? (b) How many of these books were chosen with the idea of increasing your understanding of what is going on in the world?

4. What arts, sciences, and literature are most closely connected with your vocation? (a) Are you well informed in these several fields? (b) If not, how do you account for it?

5. What wide fields of study, branching out from your regular daily work, have been suggested to you by the books you have read, by men you know, or by experience you have gained in your calling?

GROUP III. (These questions have to do with conduct in certain relationships toward which the educated man accepts moral responsibility.)

1. What are the tasks you had to perform to-day?

2. Did you slacken in any one of them? (a) Was this slacking of a kind that involved disloyalty to the firm? (b) Was it loyal to yourself as a craftsman? (c) If it becomes habitual, will it affect your standards of dependability? (d) Will you not also lose in effectiveness?

3. Did you go out of your way at all to-day to do more than was absolutely required of you? (a) If not, is this course apt to make people value you more or less? (b) Is it likely to increase your own self-respect?

4. Are you considerate and helpful to members of your own family? (a) Do you naturally incline to serve them and be kind? (b) Irritable? Selfish? Unkind? (c) What habitual relationship is better for them and for you?

5. Have you kept faith with everyone who put trust in you? (a) If you violated that faith was it justified? (b) Is such a violation ever justified?

6. Have you interested yourself in any activities that give you no material advantages but that will make the world a better place for all men. If not, why not?

✤ ✤ ✤ ✤ ✤

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

To Men "From Missouri"

Let Us Show You

That what we claim for this unique shaving cream is based on scientific fact

10 Shaves FREE
Mail the Coupon

GENTLEMEN:

We like to make a booster of men with "the world's toughest beards" by proving that Palmolive Shaving Cream is quick, luxurious, and leaves the face feeling "like a million dollars."

For it isn't the ads that sell Palmolive Shaving Cream.

It's our policy of giving the first ten shaves free, to PROVE its supremacy.

And second, the word-of-mouth advertising for it, as one man tells another—in clubs, in Pullmans, on the links.

Hundreds of thousands have made this free test

We say "Don't buy . . . yet"—first let us prove our case. For we know the majority of men who make our test, thereafter stick to Palmolive Shaving Cream.

Sixty years of soap study stand behind it. Years were spent in our laboratories trying one formula after another, discarding them one by one. Success finally came after our 129th test.

Here are the five exclusive features we claim for Palmolive Shaving Cream. See if they are not what you've always sought for shaving comfort.

The ideal shaving cream

1. Multiplies itself in lather 250 times.
2. Softens the beard in one minute.
3. Maintains its creamy fullness for ten minutes on the face.
4. Strong bubbles hold the hairs erect for cutting.
5. Fine after-effects due to palm and olive oil content.

Now mail the coupon

We take the risk—not you. We undertake to please you . . . to win you in 10 shaves. The coupon is for your convenience. Won't you use it, please?

THE PALMOLIVE-PEET COMPANY, CHICAGO, ILL.

To add the final touch to shaving luxury, we have created Palmolive After Shaving Talc—especially for men. Doesn't show. Leaves the skin smooth and fresh, and gives that well-groomed look. Try the sample we are sending free with the tube of Shaving Cream. There are new delights here for every man. Please let us prove them to you. Clip the coupon now.

3853

35c

10 SHAVES FREE
and a can of Palmolive After Shaving Talc

Simply insert your name and address and mail to Dept. B-1438, Palmolive, 3702 Iron St., Chicago, Ill.
Residents of Wisconsin should address Palmolive, Milwaukee, Wis.

.....

.....

(Please print your name and address)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Eyes Have It

(Continued from page 25)

belong there. But the average business man doesn't see his own real drama until you make him see it.

You remember that I mentioned "a queer but delightful thing" in regard to interviewing men. Well, this is the place for me to tell it.

I will take one man as an illustration. He is about fifty years old, and is the president of an important bank in Boston. Our interview took place in his office.

In this connection there is a personal question, which people often ask me. I'll answer it here, because I think the answer is rather interesting.

The question is: "Do men, especially business men, object to being interviewed by a woman?"

And the answer is: "Yes, they do!"

UNFLATTERING as it is to my own sex, I think men expect that a woman interviewer is going to be more or less a silly fool. For this reason, I always dread the first five minutes of such an interview. I know I shall have to overcome a certain antagonism.

I use three weapons—if you want to call them that—to overcome this barrier. Two of them are quite simple. First, I tell the man that when the interview is written I shall show him the manuscript. The article will not be printed without his approval.

When I see the relief with which he hears this announcement, I know I have won part of the battle. My promise gives him confidence. It shows him that I have confidence in myself.

Next, I tell him that the interview will be signed, not with my own name, but with another: a masculine "pen name" which I use for nearly all business interviews. It is perhaps curious, it certainly is true, that this is what we call "good psychology" on my part. He can't help his traditional prejudices. And when it comes to a printed interview, he instinctively prefers to have it appear as man-to-man talk.

He does not admit this to me. He is too courteous. I might add that I never have been treated with *dis*courtesy by any man I have interviewed. This is a tribute which I am very glad to pay. The courtesy of American men to any decently well-bred woman seems inexhaustible.

These first two attacks on the barrier between us have helped to break it down. But the third one is not so simple, for it amounts to this: I must convince the man that I have discretion, common sense, and at least a fair degree of intelligence.

Young journalists often write to me and ask what "formula" I employ in getting interviews. They want a list of the questions I use.

That's all nonsense! There is no such thing as a formula for dealing with so many different types of human beings.

But there are two things on which I think the success of any interview depends. Before going to a man: I know definitely what I want and shall try to get. I have direct questions to ask on certain specific points. And if these points are technical, or peculiar to a man's business or profession, I take care to be sufficiently informed on the subject to make my questions intelligent ones.

Judging from my own experience, the person who can ask intelligent questions must be very rare. I have received many letters of thanks from distinguished men whom I have interviewed. A surprising number of them have referred, in particular, to this one thing. They said I had asked "intelligent questions."

This is interesting because of the light it throws on the men themselves. A really "big" man does not respond to flattery. At least, not in any business or semi-business contact. It makes him impatient and suspicious.

What he does respond to is interest! If your interest is intelligent as well as sincere, it will be an unfailing passport to his attention.

That's another question people ask me: "Aren't you terribly scared when you have to interview a famous man?"

No; I long ago ceased to be afraid of famous folk. I have a deep respect for most of them, but no fear. I have found that they are not much different from the rest of us. Very few of them have any dazzling brilliance of talent. The great difference between them and these lesser men is in the concentration of mind which I have already mentioned.

To go back to my interview with the Boston man who had just been made president of a bank. We talked, as I said before, in his private office. This may seen unimportant; but I can assure you that it is not.

Many of the interviews you read in THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE are unique, for they are the stories of human lives from childhood up. It is not easy, believe me, to get such a story from a business man in his business office: In that environment, he unconsciously thinks business and wants to talk business.

The Boston man, for example, wanted to talk about the bank. I wanted him to talk about himself! Not as a banker, but as a human being. Not about the directors who had made him president, but about the directing influences which had made his character.

THE "queer but delightful thing" about men is this: In one sense, they never grow up! In every man's heart there lingers something of the boy he once was.

Give him a sympathetic interest and, half shyly, half proudly, he will tell you about this boy; what he liked and what he hated; what he hoped, what he feared, and what he dreamed.

This has been the most wonderful thing in all my experience as an interviewer. Perhaps it is one reason why I have no fear of great men. I have so often seen them as the boys they once were.

My talk with the Boston banker was a mere tangle of figures and dry facts, until I managed to open the door behind which lay the memories of his boyhood.

He brought them out one at a time. Reluctantly, at first; he really thought they were trivial and of no significance. Then, as these first chapters began to explain himself to himself, his eyes lighted with interest and the real story started.

The point is that every life is interesting, if you look at it with interest. You may think your own life has been deadly dull. But you will change your mind if you go back through the years and try to find out how and why you have become the human being you are now.

Here is another question which is often asked me: "Are famous people vain and conceited?"

My answer is: "Mighty seldom!"

They are far more likely to be ill at ease; afraid you are going to paint a too flattering portrait of them.

"Don't make out that I've done anything extraordinary!" they often say. "I'm no genius! I've worked hard and been lucky. That's all."

Of course, that isn't all. And if I am telling a man's story it is not only my right but my duty to tell the truth as I see it.

"I shall try to report accurately the things which you say," I tell him. "If I make any mistakes, you may correct them. But what I say about you is the expression of my own opinion and judgment. It is not your affair, but mine."

He admits that this is reasonable, and we proceed on that basis. This is a trait which most important men possess. They are willing to see all sides of a question.

It is the "little" man that is narrow and stubborn. He is pompous because he tries to look bigger than he really is.

A MAN who is not sure of himself often shows another interesting state of mind. He is cautious and afraid! I have found that the man in a small town, with a purely local reputation, is more timid about being interviewed than a city man who is nationally famous.

The small-town man wants the honor more than the big man wants it. But in the back of his mind he is wondering what his neighbors are going to say.

As a rule, the bigger the man the less seriously he takes the matter of personal publicity. He is so accustomed to it that he has lost his fear of it.

Occasionally, however, a really important man does balk at telling his personal story. He may give some reason for refusing; but it is pretty certain not to be the true reason.

Almost invariably, his reluctance is because there is something in his career which he wants to hide! Make searching inquiries about him and you will find out why he shrinks from the spotlight.

Often it is a case of cherchez la femme—look for the woman! But wait a minute. The woman is the man's wife; or perhaps his daughter! He has made his way up from poverty and obscurity. He himself is proud of this. But he knows, or fears, that the women of his family will not relish having the story of his humble origin made public.

Sometimes the skeleton in a man's

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Let the new Whitman's package be your Valentine!

Chocolates in an assortment trying for the high mark of perfection!

Pink of Perfection is more than a name—it is an aim and an ambition.

Many who have enjoyed it declare it to be the last word in assorted chocolates—their ideal. Whitman's makes a gift distinctive, delightful—a valentine to be enjoyed and remembered.

For variety, there are both milk chocolate and vanilla chocolate coatings on fudge, nuts, creams, caramels, marshmallows, nougat, fruits; and solid milk chocolates. Some of the milk chocolate coatings are mixed with ground almonds.

© S. F. W. & Son, Inc.

Whitman's Chocolates

PINK OF PERFECTION

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

closet is no skeleton at all, when you succeed in getting it out into the open.

A few years ago, I had an appointment with a successful and distinguished business man. I thought everything was set for the interview. But to my surprise we talked for fifteen minutes without getting anywhere.

I never had met the man before and I knew nothing about his personal history aside from his business career. He was very cordial, but there was a curious hesitation when it came to talking about himself. Finally, I decided on a direct and pretty blunt attack.

"Mr. Blank," I said to him, "this is all very pleasant and entertaining, but you are too busy a man to spend time simply in agreeable conversation with me. You are not giving me what I came here to get. What is the matter? Let's be frank. If you will trust my discretion, you will tell me the reason for your evident hesitation."

He looked a bit surprised, then smiled rather sheepishly.

"All right!" he said. "I will be frank. Here are the facts: Thirty years ago, when I was quite a young man, I began drinking. I kept it up for ten years. I went on periodical sprees. Between times, I would work hard and make good. Then I'd have another spree, and lose all the ground I had regained. Finally, I made up my mind I was going to stop! I took the Keeley cure. That helped. I fought the thing to a finish, and I won out.

"But what bothers me is this: If I don't tell that part of my story, men who know about it will say I didn't tell the truth. And if I do tell it, what about the hundreds of young men who will read it? I don't want them to know that I was once a hard drinker."

"Why not?" I asked.

He was too surprised to make any reply.

"That victory was the hardest you have ever won, wasn't it?" I went on.

"You're right, it was!" he declared.

"Well, young men to-day face the same danger, without realizing how great a peril it is," I said. "You can help them to see it and to avoid it. You can give courage to men who are in its grip and who despair of making their escape. They will believe you; because you have been there yourself and you did escape.

"From my point of view, you should be more proud of that one victory than of anything else. Let's tell the whole story. I see that you have a capacious waste basket. If you don't like the article after it is written, you can put it in that basket. But that is the place it ought to go, if we leave out one of the most vital parts of it."

He agreed to this—and the story went into the magazine, not into the waste basket. He wrote me that, as a result of its publication, he received hundreds of letters of appreciation. The ghost which had troubled him was effectually laid.

Famous people, as I said before, are seldom pompous or conceited. In manner, their commonest characteristic is directness, almost brusqueness, of speech.

IF THERE is one trait which, more than any other, irritates a man of ability and achievement, it is incompetence! He has small patience with a person who is vague and fumbling.

Men have often begun an interview with the abrupt question: "Just what is it you want?"

They have a perfect right to ask what I want. They have a right to expect that I know what I want and that I have at least a reasonable amount of skill in getting it. In other words, they expect me to know my job! A man who is being interviewed wants to be sure of three things: your discretion, your integrity, and your ability to do your job. Once convinced on these points, he is surprisingly free and open in his talk.

I have heard a great many "big men" talk with their business associates and subordinates. I believe I can tell pretty accurately, from the manner of their chief, the degree of competence which any one of these men possesses.

If a man who does not know his job comes into the office, he may be treated courteously, but there is a vibration of discouraged impatience in the quick, sharp questions which are shot at him.

When a competent worker comes in, the man behind the desk involuntarily relaxes. Even his voice is keyed to a lower pitch. His questions may be just as quick and pointed; but their purpose is very different.

From the competent man he is seeking information. But the questions he asks of the incompetent man are intended to uncover that man's lack of the knowledge he ought to have but does not possess.

PEOPLE often ask me how one manages to get an interview with an important man.

There is no one answer which applies in all cases. Sometimes the matter is arranged by correspondence, sometimes by telephone, sometimes by a personal visit to the man's offices. In practically all cases, it is arranged through his secretary.

Occasionally this is a troublesome complication. I have a great deal of respect for private secretaries, as a class. Most of them are highly capable and intelligent. Even if I were inclined—which I am not—to resent them as a medium of approach, experience would have taught me to appreciate their importance.

If you are "snippy" with a man's private secretary, it certainly won't help you to "get to" that man! I know people who show resentment when a secretary asks: "What did you want to see Mr. Blank about?"

As it is part of a secretary's job to ask that question, why should anyone resent it? Why not try to gain his coöperation instead of his antagonism?

To be sure, it means that you must "sell" yourself, and your errand, to two persons instead of to one. But I have found that this effort pays.

For example, the details of an interview are not ended when you have had your first talk with a man. There may be certain facts and figures which are to be verified and sent to you. Photographs must be forwarded to the magazine. Perhaps new ones must be taken. An appointment must be made—and kept—with the photographer. A copy of the story must be sent to the man for his approval. Someone—and the "someone" is his secretary—must see that he reads and returns it promptly.

Sometimes I have used letters of introduction in getting an interview, but not very often. At most, such letters can accomplish nothing more than a chance to see the man. This does not amount to very much. In fact, it may be a disadvantage. Letters of introduction are generally preliminaries to requests for favors! Consequently, they are likely to create a subtle antagonism in a man's attitude. It may take time and more or less diplomacy to get his ideas readjusted.

The best method is to have the interview arranged by the editor of the magazine. The man then knows that the writer is officially delegated by the powers that be.

Perhaps you do not realize how important this is. It is a fact that a few free-lance writers—and more of the would-be writers—attempt to get interviews with prominent persons by claiming that they are representing some well-known newspaper or magazine. Naturally, these prominent persons have become cautious. They want to be sure that they are dealing with an accredited person.

At the beginning of a recent interview, a man said to me: "When this article is printed—if it even is printed—"

For a moment I didn't grasp the significance of the remark. Then I realized that he must have encountered one or more of these aspiring but unauthorized writers. Of course that matter had to be cleared up immediately. Without his confidence and respect, such an interview as I wanted would have been impossible.

In the course of my work, I occasionally meet men who have been imposed on in still another way: Someone has obtained an interview with them—and later they have received a bill for the "write-up"! Naturally, this makes them gun-shy with other interviewers. They don't intend to be caught a second time, so they ask what it is going to cost them.

I have even been approached by people who wanted to be written up, as they call it, and who offered me a good round sum "to get them into THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE."

Whether a man is afraid he will have to pay, or is eager and willing to pay, he receives the same answer: "There isn't enough money in the world to buy your way into the pages of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE. And if a writer for the magazine accepted money, from an outside source, his article would not be printed and he would never write another one for us! Not if the Editor knew of the circumstances."

THERE are certain apparently trivial details in regard to "successful" men which I have come to regard as very significant. For example, they are almost always well dressed. If their work involves contact with outsiders, they invariably show this carefulness about their appearance.

The few exceptions are the men who work more or less alone; scientists, for example, whose days are spent in study and research. Apparently the man who deals with other men realizes that he must, in himself, typify the competence and orderliness with which he conducts his business or his profession. But the man who deals with ideas or with inanimate things feels no such necessity.

Another detail which I find interesting

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

27th in 1924
18th in 1925
9th in 1926
4th in 1927

Chrysler now 3rd

NATIONAL Automobile Chamber of Commerce sales records place Chrysler third for 1928.

In 42 months Chrysler, due to public endorsement, has come from 27th to 3rd place.

All but two makes, far longer established, have been outsold by Chrysler.

The order of precedence at the National Automobile Shows is determined by the dollar volume of sales in the year ended July 1st. In these 12 months, Chrysler sold 193,750 motor cars—a volume of $275,000,000 paid by the public.

No other make of car has ever recorded such phenomenally rapid progress.

In three and one-half years, production and sales have increased six-fold over the original record-breaking first year of Chrysler.

There can be no more impressive public endorsement of Chrysler performance, Chrysler long life, Chrysler quality, Chrysler value.

All Chrysler models are exhibited at the National Automobile Shows; and in the Balloon Room and entire lobby space of the Congress Hotel during the Chicago Show, Jan. 28th to Feb. 4th.

CHRYSLER

'52' '62' '72' — 40 Body Styles Priced from

Imperial '80' — $725 to $6795 F.O.B. Detroit

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

is a man's desk. As a rule, the desk of a successful business man is a Sahara of emptiness! The explanation is perfectly apparent. He keeps ahead of his work!

In the course of my experience, I have failed to put through only three out of the hundreds of interviews which I have obtained. One of these three was with a famous newspaper publisher; but that failure was a very illuminating experience.

After the story was written, I sent it to him for his approval. He promptly acknowledged its receipt, praised the article, and said that he would return it after making a few slight changes.

When several weeks had passed without bringing back the manuscript, I wrote to him about it. The reply came less promptly this time, but it was quite as pleasant as before. He had been trying, he said, to get around to the matter, but had been overwhelmed with work. He would attend to it right away.

To make a long story short, months went by. Almost two years passed. In the meantime, I wrote to him occasionally about it. So did my editor-in-chief. His replies were always of the same tenor: press of business—lack of time—going to attend to it immediately! But at the end of two years he died.

But here is something interesting: I saw this man, both at his office and in the library of his house. In each of these places he had one of the largest desks I have ever seen. And I never have beheld desks that were so crowded! Every square inch was piled with stacks of letters, sheets of memoranda, baskets of manuscripts! It was the desk of a man who had let himself become hopelessly smothered by an accumulation of things which he was "going to attend to" as soon as he could "get around to it."

Not to be unjust, it was also the desk of a man of brilliant mind and great ability. He had hundreds of ideas, too many of them for immediate use; but he couldn't bear to skim their cream and throw the rest away. And he couldn't bear to give responsibility to men less able than he was to handle it. He clung to this mass of detail work, which no one human being could manage alone.

I don't know what was given officially as the cause of his death. But I haven't a doubt that the real, if indirect, cause was prolonged and acute indigestion of details. If you find your own desk piling up, it is a symptom that you are becoming a victim of this dangerous malady.

AS I said before, I am often asked whether famous people, when one actually meets them, seem really and truly "great." I have to admit that they do not. They are very much like other people—except in two respects: they have a more intensive knowledge of some specific thing, and they use their knowledge with more confidence and power. In other words, they simply have practiced concentration of mind and of energy.

They themselves are perfectly aware of the fact that they are not supermen. Their nearest approach to vanity is a sort of boyish pride in their accomplishment, especially if the odds have been against them. I never have met a man—a successful man—who regretted having had to fight for his success. Dozens of men have told me that hard luck was the best luck they ever had.

Almost without exception, the big men whom I have met are "playing the game" for the game's sake, not for its rewards. Offhand, I can recall only one man who was different. He is one of our so-called financiers. He was not born poor; a fact of which he was careful to inform me! And this little detail was very significant—for that man really did love money! He had "concentration of mind and of energy," all right enough; but it was focused on the glitter of gold.

However, in all my experience, that man is absolutely unique. He is the only person I have met who has achieved a purely machine-made success. Whenever I think of him, I have a curious mental picture of a man sitting in a black room, crunching dried husks, and slowly starving to death. He is the only one of my "interviewees" whom I hope never to meet again.

The "Eyes" on Page 25 Belong to—

(Upper left) Charles F. Noyes, president of the Charles F. Noyes National Realty Corporation.
(Upper right) Walter S. Gifford, president American Telephone and Telegraph Company.
(Upper center) Lawrence A. Downs, president Illinois Central Railroad.
(Lower center) Roscoe Pound, dean of Law School of Harvard University.
(Lower left) Matthew Scott Sloan, president Brooklyn Edison Company.
(Lower right) David Sarnoff, general manager Radio Corporation of America.

No Man Ever Went to War in Defense of a Boarding-House

(Continued from page 51)

have meant to me, and why I have put them first among the worth-while things of life.

Another really worth-while thing to me is a home. And when I say a home, I do not mean just a place where one eats and sleeps but a place that is lived in and loved, a place full of the laughter and fun of happy children, a place of bright pictures and pleasant memories, a place of music and cheerful conversation—the kind of place that in after years the mind will turn to as a green oasis in our lives.

Now for a little preaching: If you would make your home what it should be, leave all business cares and worries on the door mat. If things have gone wrong, and you are discouraged and blue, make yourself smile when you go home; it will not only make the others happier but it will make you feel better.

I know a home where everything is orderly and in the best of taste; the parents are cultured, estimable people, and the children so well behaved that it is positively painful to be with them—an air of suppression seems to hover over the home. If the children make the least noise it is at once stopped; the slightest levity is frowned down, and a hearty laugh is looked upon as a misdemeanor.

Edgar Guest said it all in one short sentence when he wrote the line, "It takes a heap o' livin' in a house to make it home!" Yes, it must not only be lived in but it must be laughed in and cried in, until your very heartstrings somehow manage to get themselves all wrapped around and tangled up with everything in it.

I may be a bit cranky when I get on the subject of a home, and I have a right to be, as for sixty years I lived in the same one—and would probably be there now if those who made it home were there too. The place that I still think of as home was one of those rambling old buildings, with big, square rooms, wide halls, and ceilings high enough for a church.

Every room held its memories; we could see pictures on the walls that were not in frames, and faces smiled upon us from every doorway. That house had been lived in!

The furniture had been in that house so long that it had developed a personality of its own; the very door-knobs had a familiar feel that I could recognize in the dark, and if the plank at the foot of the stairs had failed to creak when I put my foot on it I would have gone out in the yard and looked to make sure I was in the right house.

Live in your house, make it such a home that when you think of moving something hurts inside of you. And then, if another war comes, you will have something tangible to fight for. I have never yet heard of a man shouldering a gun in defense of a boarding-house.

It seems to me that comedy, that heaven-sent faculty of seeing the funny side of life, must have a place, and a prominent place, too, in my list of worth-while things. I am sorry for the man who has no sense of humor, for his must be a drab sort of existence. A saving sense of humor is a divine gift; it is the salt that keeps things sweet and pure, and staves off stagnation and decay.

The man who can laugh in the face of disaster is greater than he who can take a city, and he who can smile when a frown would seem to be in order is richer than Crœsus.

I know a woman, and she is a good woman too, whose face looks as if it might have been carved out of frozen vinegar; if she ever smiles she puts her hand up to hide it, and I have never heard her give a real laugh since I have known her. Her hair is prematurely gray, her skin is a mass of wrinkles; she is drying up as fast as she can, and she is not so old, either. Her next-door neighbor is about the same age, as I happen to know, and her face is

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Why changed motoring conditions demand a new margin of safety

GARGOYLE

Mobiloil
Arctic

When quick starts beckon to wear!

A timely warning on too-light oil

A SINGLE short purr from your self-starter. Your engine has started. But—

Those easy starts, if made possible by extra-thin lubricating oil, may go hand-in-hand with greatly increased engine wear.

Too-thin oils—commonly sold as "winter oils"—have increased dangerously since added winter driving was brought in by the closed car. Closed cars now make up 72% of all automobiles built.

These too-thin oils give you a quick start on a frigid morning. But after that—what?

Instead of coating cylinder walls, piston rings, and pistons with a rich oily film, they may break down and fail to seal the piston clearances. In starting, you use the choke and flood the combustion chambers with raw gasoline. Not all of this raw fuel can turn into vapor. Some of it breaks through the too-thin piston seal. Gasoline blows by and further dilutes the oil.

In only 200 miles of driving, you may mix a full quart of gasoline with your lubricating oil!

Then comes danger. Friction has free play. Expensive surfaces are exposed direct to WEAR.

SPECIAL WINTER CHART

Mobiloil Arctic

should be used in Winter (below 32°F.) in all cars marked*.

PASSENGER CARS	1927	1926	1925	1924
Auburn all except Models 4-44 & 6-66	*	*	*	*
Buick	*	*	*	*
Cadillac	*	*	*	*
Chandler except Special Six	*	*	*	*
Chevrolet	*	*	*	*
Chrysler 4-cyl.	*	*	*
Dodge Brothers	*	*	*	*
Elcar all except Models 6-65 & 4 cyls.	*	*	*	*
Erskine	*
Essex	*	*	*	*
Flint	*	*	*	*
Hudson	*	*	*	*
Hupmobile	*	*	*	*
Jordan	*	*	*	*
La Salle	*
Locomobile	*	*	*	*
Marmon 8-cyl.	*
Moon	*	*	*	*
Nash	*	*	*	*
Oakland	*	*	*	*
Oldsmobile	*	*	*	*
Overland & Overland Whippet	*	*	*	*
Packard Six	*	*	*
" Eight	*	*	*	*
Paige	*	*	*	*
Peerless Models 60, 80 & Eight	*	*	*	*
Pontiac	*	*
Reo	*	*	*	*
Star	*	*	*	*
Studebaker	*	*	*	*
Velie	*	*	*	*
Willys-Knight	*	*	*	*

If your car is not listed above, consult the complete Mobiloil Chart at Mobiloil dealers' for your winter grade of Mobiloil.

AN ideal oil to meet winter conditions in most cars must be (1) fluid enough to permit easy starting*—but (2) rich enough in body to give adequate protection against dangerous gasoline dilution.

Gargoyle Mobiloil Arctic is such an oil.

Mobiloil Arctic is made from especially selected crudes. Its full rich body and lubricating character give you the necessary margin of safety for protection against the many dangers of oil dilution.

Freezing weather is at hand. One week of incorrect lubrication may cost you more than a year's supply of Mobiloil. So it will pay you to drain your crankcase now and refill it with the correct grade of Mobiloil—which is probably Mobiloil Arctic.

Consult the Mobiloil Chart shown at the left to make sure. This Chart is the lubricating guide which is approved by 182 automobile and motor truck manufacturers.

Warning: No oil will permit easy starting unless the battery is fully charged and the spark plugs and distributor are clean and properly adjusted.

VACUUM OIL COMPANY New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Detroit, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Minneapolis, Kansas City, Dallas

Other branches and distributing warehouses throughout the country

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

always wreathed in smiles, her laughter is like a silver bell, her skin is fresh and pink, and you would not take her to be more than half as old as she is.

It has been one of the regrets of my life that I never learned to laugh the way I would have liked to. As a joy-spreader, my laugh is a failure, and no one cares to hear it a second time. It just will not gush or ripple, and there is nothing gladsome about it. Maybe you have heard a donkey lift up its voice and broadcast its sorrow to a listening world; if so, I need say nothing more—you will understand.

But I enjoy going through the motions of laughing, and it has been a safety valve that has saved my life many times. My sense of humor has got me in many a scrape, as my risibles are set on hair triggers, and are likely to go off half-cocked, regardless of time or place. One Sunday I made a mess of a whole church service. The day was hot, the bench hard, the sermon long, and the flies would not let me go to sleep. So I was pretty miserable, and there was nothing to do but fidget around and hope for the doxology.

I was sitting by an open window that looked out on a vacant lot on which grew an ancient apple tree. On the tip of the tallest limb hung one lone apple, and a small negro boy was intent on getting it. He wore a shirt and nothing else. Finally, he got up in the tree, but the apple was out of his reach, whereupon he lay down and "cooned" the limb. But just as he made a grab for the apple, the limb broke with a report like a pistol shot. The boy beat the limb to the ground, lighting squarely on his head, where he seemed to stick up for an instant in the soft earth before toppling over.

An old sow heard the apple fall, and beat the boy to it before he got the dirt out of his eyes. I forgot I was in church and that the day was Sunday, and laughed out loud, finishing with a regular Comanche whoop. Of course my family was scandalized, the congregation shocked, and the preacher took it as a personal insult.

TO ME, Nature in her many phases is another of the worth-while things of life. In fact, it is almost life itself, as we cannot think of life without it. Imagine a world that never knew the white beauty of a moonlight night, or thrilled to the grandeur of a summer storm!

Think of a world without blue skies, laughing waters, the songs of birds, the patter of raindrops, the green of grass, the gold of ripening grain, the sheen on the breast of a dove, the blush on the petals of a rose, the dewdrop on a spider web, and thousands of other things just as enchanting.

Suppose some summer the flowers forgot to bloom, the birds lost their music, the brooks fell over the rocks without a tinkle, and rainbows failed to follow summer showers—what a flat, colorless place the outdoors would be!

The sheer waste of beauty in the world seems to me to be something tremendous; seven sunsets a week, and how few get a passing glance! Consider the dawns and dusks that come and go so silently, and all unnoticed; the flowers that bloom under our feet that we never see. If nature staged her sunsets at intervals of a year, the art galleries would be emptied for the occasion, and standing-room on the hill tops would bring the price of opera chairs.

The more I see of Nature, the more am I convinced that she does not deal in common things. A rotting log by the roadside, when etched with lichen, takes on uncommon loveliness; and a bare rock on a mountainside under the softening touch of twilight becomes a pastel of surpassing beauty. Between dusty corn rows, in briar patches, in fence corners, under stones, in the crevices of the bark, in the most unlikely places, you can find things new and wonderful, and things you are seeing for the first time.

If you would enjoy to the fullest God's big outdoors, you should learn to loiter as a lazy brook loiters, pausing now and then to flirt with the flowers on the bank, and not hesitating to come to a standstill at every obstruction that gives the least excuse for stopping.

When I embark on one of these voyages of discovery, I keep going until I get clear out of hearing of people and towns. I forget there are such things as traffic cops and "Keep off the grass" signs; and I find a place where I can swap the smell of gas and scorching rubber for the fragrance of flowers, and the grinding of brakes for the evening song of some sleepy bird.

There is something so cleansing and purifying in the wind-swept hills, in the fields and forests, that strife and greed are forgotten; petty rivalries are shoved aside, and the pomps and shams of life become as unreal as the things that dreams are made of. Even a half-day in the country gives me something different to think about. The viewpoint of yesterday shifts around, and the things that seemed so important then fade into nothingness as I drink in the beauties of a world fresh from the hand of its Maker.

There is a magnolia in the yard of my old home that I chummed with ever since I put on long trousers; in fact, we practically grew up together, as it came to live with us when it was a baby plant in a little pot; and now it is twenty-five or thirty feet high.

It is still the best tree friend I have, and I can hardly pass it without laying my hand on its smooth gray bark, just as I would on the head of a favorite dog. It is beautiful at all seasons; after a summer shower the dark green leaves reflect the sunlight like burnished steel; and the great white blooms, like giant water lilies, lift themselves candelabra-fashion from the tips of the branches. In winter, the bright red seed pods transform it into an outdoor Christmas tree, with all its candles lighted.

My affection for that tree is very real, and I would miss it dreadfully if it were not there—it was like one of the family.

OUR friends must certainly be included in the roster of things worth while. There has been a lot said and written as to the importance of selecting the right kind of friends, and it all has a very plausible sound; but, as a matter of fact, there is precious little selecting done—somehow they just come, or they stay away, and that is about all there is to it. The first thing we know, a new friendship has begun; but how it came about we cannot tell to save our lives.

But, no matter how we get our friends, one thing is certain: we could not get along without them, and that shows how worth while they are. If you would have friends, you must be one yourself, as there is no such thing as a one-sided friendship. Between friends who know and understand each other, conversation is of secondary importance, and I enjoy some of my friends most when we just sit and say nothing.

When things are bright and prosperous, when no shadow falls across our path, we enjoy our friends and like to have them with us; but it is when adversity and trouble come that they mean more to us than anything else. Volumes may be spoken by the clasp of a hand; by the tear that trembles in the eye; by the quiver of a lip at those times when words seem so futile and out of place.

Last on my list of worth-while things is some kind of outdoor recreation. That is a fine word, "recreation;" it carries its meaning so clearly; it re-creates us, makes us over anew. I believe that every normal human being should have some particular kind of outdoor sport that he can fall back on to help clear the mind of the brain ash and cobwebs that are sure to gather.

I suppose I should be ashamed to admit it, but I have never been able to work myself up to a frenzy over either football, or baseball. Somehow, I do not seem to get the hang of what they are trying to do; and I only make myself conspicuous by yelling at the wrong place.

NOW with fishing it is different. You are not expected to yell yourself hoarse every time the cork goes under, or shout until you are black in the face when you put on fresh bait. Maybe that is one reason I like it. When you go fishing, all you have to do is to find a nice, quiet, shady spot, sit on a root that fits your curves—and just sit there, and fish. Some people say fishing is the sport of those too lazy to do anything else. As a matter of fact, some of the hardest work I have ever done was digging bait, and some of the roughest walking was to find a "hole" that looked just right.

But fishing is not all there is to fishing, there is a lot more to it than just catching a fish. The sport takes you right into nature's "holy of holies," where mellow-bugs stage their dizzy dance in the still water under the bank; where dragonflies stare you out of countenance from the tip of your rod; where kingfishers rattle, where red-wings flute their u-ka-lees; where muscadines drop with a musical plunk in the water; where an occasional duck whizzes its way up-stream with the speed of a feathered bullet, and where all is peace and quiet. At such times I seem to get so near to nature that I have heard the voice of a boy frog changing from tenor to bass, and I have even heard the faint squeaking of baby muskrats in their tunnel under the bank.

There is an unexplainable something about silent, slow-moving water that "seems just suited for mortal's dreams," something to which our souls respond, and which puts us in harmony with the infinite. In plain English, we get nearer to God than we ever do in the haunts of men. There is nothing I know that leads as surely to a kind of stocktaking of ourselves as fishing.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A letter from Miss Adela T. Jones of Olympia, Washington

Dear Sirs:

Since I have been using PEBECO Tooth Paste, my teeth have become whiter than when I used other brands. I am so delighted! My teeth were not in such good condition last year. They were taking on a yellow look, which will mar any woman's appearance. The use of PEBECO has enhanced them a hundred per cent.

The constant use of PEBECO will make the dingiest looking teeth turn white, and make it possible to converse with friends without offending them.

Truly,

(signed) Adela Terry Jones

For thirty years PEBECO has gained each year new thousands of users. Constantly the mails bring letters of praise.

Thousands are grateful for its salty tang

Shining teeth a fresh sweet mouth

WHAT a joy it is to know that all day long your mouth is sweet and fresh. Your teeth white and charming.

A great medical authority, fighting unhealthy conditions of the mouth, found that the most common cause of trouble was a slowing up of the mouth fluids which keep the mouth safe from acids.

So he developed the formula of Pebeco with its special salt to keep the fluids healthily active.

At the first touch of Pebeco in the morning, a cool invigorating tang summons the mouth fluids. For hours they bathe the surfaces of the teeth, between the teeth, the whole mouth. The bedtime brushing renews their activity for the night. No wonder your breath stays fresh and sweet, your teeth and gums sound.

Made by Pebeco, Inc., a division of Lehn & Fink Products Company. Sole distributors Lehn & Fink, Inc., Bloomfield, N. J. Distributed in Canada by Lehn & Fink (Canada) Ltd.

Keeps the mouth young . . .

Free Offer:

Send coupon today for generous tube

Lehn & Fink, Inc., Dept. D-35, Bloomfield, N. J.
Please send me free your new large-size sample tube of Pebeco Tooth Paste.
PRINT PLAINLY IN PENCIL

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....

(THIS COUPON NOT GOOD AFTER FEBRUARY, 1929)

© 1928, Lehn & Fink, Inc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Life on Mars is Almost Certain!

(Continued from page 55)

were able to observe Mars favorably than ever before in history.

"As a result of this, and because of the aid of extra-sensitive instruments, remarkable advances have recently been made in our knowledge of the planet. After many years of cautious weighing of the facts that we do know, I am frank to admit that the case for the existence of intelligent beings on Mars is by no means improbable.

"Right at once, it ought to be clearly understood, however, that we cannot see any Martian beings. I have had people ask if it would be possible to see elephants or flocks of animals or moving railroad trains, assuming that such exist on Mars. The answer is, 'No.' If New York or London were cities of Mars, we could see them only as minute specks on the darker or lighter background of the surrounding surface. Buildings, streets, moving vehicles and other individual details would be indistinguishable.

"When you remember that Mars at its nearest is still more than 33,000,000 miles from the earth, and that with our best telescopes it cannot be seen much more distinctly than the moon is seen with the naked eye, you can understand that an object must be many miles in size, and of a sharply contrasting color or shade, to be clearly visible."

"WHAT evidence is there, then," I asked, "to justify any belief in the existence of Martian life?"

"There are three kinds of evidence," answered the astronomer: "first, the presence on Mars of conditions which support life. It is reasonable to suppose that where life-favoring conditions exist, life also exists.

"The second kind of evidence is the existence of changeable dark markings of vast extent on the planet's surface. These markings cannot reasonably be accounted for by any other explanation than that they are fields of vegetation. Some of the areas are vivid green in the spring, and turn darker as the year advances to winter. On our earth, the presence of plant life in profusion is always associated with the presence of animal life. If this is true of the earth, why not also of Mars?

"The third kind of evidence is the appearance of surface markings which cannot be accounted for as accidental occurrences of nature. Some are so straight and regular that we can explain them only as the result of intelligent design. Some of them appear to be permanent features of the Martian landscape, and the belief that they are caused by the flow of canals constructed to aid the distribution of water over the planet is the most reasonable explanation that we have. On the earth such constructions could be laid out only with the aid of surveying instruments, and indeed would require considerable mathematical computation.

"Other seemingly artificial features of the Martian surface are more temporary, but none the less remarkable for size and geometrical regularity. At several near approaches of Mars, observers have seen symmetrical designs on the planet's surface so striking that some persons have suggested that they may be signals."

SIGNALS from Mars? Imagine the newspaper headline!

"What were these designs?" I asked.

"At the opposition of 1879, the Italian astronomer, Schiaparelli, saw a cross centered in a dark circle The circle—which is one of the permanent features of the Martian map, and which we call by the name 'Hellas'—is nine hundred miles across. At the next opposition the cross had disappeared from Hellas, and of late years it has been replaced by an irregular curved design.

"The next very near approach of the planet occurred in 1892. I was at the observatory in Arequipa, Peru, at this time, and I saw a pentagon with central radiating canals. The five sides of the figure were remarkably uniform—and appeared all the more striking because five-sided figures are rare on Mars.

"In 1907 the two planets were again close together, and Professor A. E. Douglas was observing Mars from Mt. Lowe, California. He saw the dark outline of a five-pointed star in about the same longitude as the pentagon of 1892, but farther south. In sending me his drawing of this view, Professor Douglas wrote: 'I thought at the time it looked more like "intention" than anything I have ever seen.' The diameter of this star was about eleven hundred miles.

"Then, when Mars drew nearest in 1924, another five-pointed star was seen, as though etched across the center of the disk. This star measured about sixteen hundred miles in diameter. A remarkable circumstance is that, if seen from any other position than that occupied by the earth during the 1924 opposition, this figure would not appear at all like a star. Engineering skill could not have placed it better for our observation. It would involve considerable knowledge of trigonometry to lay out a figure of such size on a spherical surface so that it would appear to watchers in a certain position in space as a symmetrical star.

"It seems strange that these appearances should be timed to the very near oppositions, and should be missing at the far oppositions. They are of such size that they would be noticeable, though faintly, even at the farthest oppositions. Judging by the past, we should not expect another one before 1939, when Mars will again approach us within 35,000,000 miles."

"But what is the nature of these markings?" I asked.

"THEY are, seemingly, strips of vegetation. Or, to give them their Martian name," added the astronomer, "they are 'canals' arranged in symmetrical patterns.

"The use of the word 'canal' in connection with Mars has undoubtedly caused misunderstanding," went on Professor Pickering. "When we speak of a canal on the earth, we think of such works as the Panama Canal, the Suez Canal, the Erie Canal—narrow water channels artificially made. But the 'canals' on Mars are from twenty to two hundred miles wide, and some of them thousands of miles long. To suggest that such enormous ditches exist, either naturally or artificially, on a globe the size of Mars, is to suggest the very improbable—if not the impossible.

"Look at Mars through a good telescope and you will see a small globe, its surface mottled with areas of light and dark. The early observers recognized the two white spots at the poles of the planet as snow caps. They supposed the dark areas to be bodies of water, so they named them 'seas.' The remaining light areas they supposed to be continents. Some of these early observers saw dark strips joining the 'seas,' and supposed them to be straits. At the very near approach of Mars, in 1877, Schiaparelli discovered many new straits, and, adopting a name which had been used by an earlier astronomer, he called them 'canali.' This was translated into English as 'canals,' and the name has stuck.

"When the name 'canal' was given to these appearances, it was generally believed that there were extensive oceans on the surface of Mars, and it seemed reasonable to explain the dark strips as 'canals of communication.' But when astronomers saw seasonable changes in the color of the 'seas' they began to doubt whether the dark areas could be bodies of water.

"In 1892 I was observing with Professor A. E. Douglas at Arequipa, and in that clear, steady air we were able to see that in many cases the 'canal' not only extended from 'sea' to 'sea,' but continued across the 'seas' as a darker strip through these dark areas. Plainly, there must be something wrong with the theory.

"TO-DAY we are certain that there is no sea nor lake on the surface of Mars, except for the temporary body of water which skirts the melting polar cap for a few weeks in spring. Mars is a globe of land—all land. The light areas which give the reddish color to the planet are indeed land, as the earlier astronomers believed, but not continents bounded by oceans. They are vast deserts. Two thirds of the surface of Mars is desert.

"The remaining one third, which we see as the dark and shaded areas, is, we believe, fertile soil. If there are any living creatures on Mars they are absolutely dependent upon the productiveness of this limited fertile area.

"The fertile area is dependent, in turn, on water supply. Any land will become barren unless it is watered either by rains or by irrigation. That has happened in many parts of the earth, and it is well known that the deserts are gradually encroaching upon the fertile areas of our land. If rain fails, only irrigation will keep the desert back.

"And here is where canals enter into the scheme of Martian conditions. They are not the outlines of gigantic channels of water, but are strips of watered land which show darker by the contrast of their

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Nuthin' I Like!"

© 1928 M. L. I. Co.

HUNGRILY and expectantly he had gone to dinner. "Nuthin'" he liked—just things which "were good for him". String beans—he wouldn't eat them. Time had come for discipline. When told that he was to have none of a favorite dessert, he gave in. Smiling thro' his tears after the first few mouthfuls, he said, "I didn't know it, but I was liking string beans all the time."

PERHAPS in your own home there is a small child who is finicky about his food. But you insist upon his having plenty of milk, cereals, vegetables and the other foods he requires, for you know that the growth of his body and his health depend upon the "building" foods he eats.

But how about yourself? Have you dropped into the habit of ordering what you like without regard to the foods you need to build and repair your body and to keep it in the best possible condition of health? And do you know how much food you require, or how little?

After hard physical labor or vigorous exercise a man needs more food to meet his energy requirements. The man who uses his muscles but little and works with his brain needs less food, or "fuel", for his human engine.

Diet is literally a separate problem for each individual. The "overweight" is usually too fond of starchy, sugary and fatty foods and disinclined to eat vegetables and fruits, while the "underweight" often neglects the fattening foods he needs. Appetite is not always a reliable guide to correct eating, neither is the price of the food.

If you are blessed with good health and good digestion, take time to find out what constitutes a properly balanced day to day diet for a person of your age—how much meat, fish, cheese and milk you require, how many sweet foods, and most important of all—how many vegetables. Don't forget the string beans or the tomato, King of the Vitamins. Raw salads, fruit, butter, cream and nuts are important parts of the regular food supply when taken in correct amounts. And six to eight glasses of water daily, please—mainly between meals.

It is worth remembering that, through a well-balanced ration, you can keep in good condition every part of your body—muscles, bones, vital organs, nerves, eyes, teeth and even hair.

Incorrect diet is responsible for a vast number of ailments and lack of strength and vigor. It is estimated that three calls out of ten in doctors' offices are caused by faulty diet—errors that may be easily corrected. If you wish to have better health and probably longer life, apply the new knowledge of food and nutrition, gained for you through the chemical research of recent years. It is really amazingly interesting to discover what each particular food contributes to the body—to know just what to eat if you wish to reduce your weight, or increase your weight, or keep it normal—to know what your body needs when you feel that your energy is low.

For more enjoyment in eating and for better health from eating, begin today to learn what to eat.

Because our daily food needs are little understood by most persons, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has prepared a booklet, "The Family Food Supply", which tells what to buy and how, and includes diet and marketing helps for the housewife.

The best food is not always the most expensive, and the most expensive is oftentimes far from the best. The least costly foods can often be prepared in such a way as to give more nourishment and more taste-satisfaction than those which are extravagant in price.

By means of this booklet, the modern housekeeper can easily find out which foods her family requires. She will learn which foods are needed by a man who does heavy physical labor, which are necessary for the office-worker, which for herself and which for the growing child.

"The Family Food Supply" tells how to buy economically and should be used in connection with the "Metropolitan Cook Book". A copy of either, or both, will be mailed, free, upon your request.

HALEY FISKE, President.

Published by

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—NEW YORK

Biggest in the World, More Assets, More Policyholders, More Insurance in force, More new Insurance each year

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

vegetation with the surrounding country."

"But how can these strips of land be watered if there are no bodies of water on Mars?" I interrupted.

"There is the water from the melting polar caps," answered Professor Pickering, "which we estimate to be about equivalent in volume to the water of our Great Lakes. But it has been a problem to explain satisfactorily how the water is carried from the poles to the equator.

"For thirty years, I have been studying the problem at every favorable opposition, and I have carefully considered, also, the many new facts which other astronomers have discovered. My conclusion is this: The Martian 'canals' are so varied that no one explanation will account for them all. Some canals shift their positions by as much as one hundred miles. If they were watered by irrigating ditches, that would not occur.

"Most of the 'canals' are curved, and it was this that suggested a possible natural cause. How is water distributed to the agricultural fields of the earth? Mainly by wind-blown clouds which travel curved paths and deposit in the form of rain, snow, or hail. Why should Martians build extensive conduits and pumping plants if they can depend on the atmosphere to carry the moisture to their fields?

"So I began to study clouds on Mars. I saw them forming over the polar caps, originating, no doubt, in the great swamps which surround the melting poles. I studied the behavior of these clouds, and found that there was an apparent connection between them and the formation of certain curved dark streaks which were down on the map as 'canals.' Following the formation of cloud banks, I have seen a canal develop within a few hours, and in the course of a few days the canal would widen and lengthen and, in some instances, it would double. This cannot be explained by the flow of water through a ditch. It can be explained as the result of a fast-moving rainstorm.

"My belief is that the great majority of Martian canals are simply the paths of rainstorms which course from the poles toward the equator, in accordance with meteorological law. Weather on Mars seems to be simpler and more uniform than that of the earth. This is largely because of the lack of oceans on Mars, I think. The winds which blow the rain travel fairly definite courses.

"The Martians, if there be Martians, would naturally plant their crops in areas which are in the paths of the rainstorms.

"Not all of the canals can be explained as rainstorm tracks, however.

"A VERY striking example of a canal that is really a water channel is the dark strip known as Bathys, which crosses Thaumasia.

"Bathys is about 1,600 miles in extent. Mr. G. H. Hamilton and I both observed it independently, in 1924, and could see distinctly a narrow, very dark line prolonging it and threading through it. This was the nearest approach of Mars that has occurred in a century, and it was possible to see details which cannot be seen at an ordinary opposition. We are convinced that we saw the irrigation ditch of Bathys, an actual water channel about five miles wide, with vegetation growing along its sides.

"Of course we could see only the main water course. Invisible side ditches must serve for irrigation. The straightness of this canal between the bends is remarkable. If Bathys is an artificial construction throughout, it is a gigantic achievement:

"To account for the flow of water through these irrigating canals does not require us to imagine a pumping system, such as would be necessary for the entire planetary circulation. The force of gravity is sufficient to carry the water through the limited number of irrigating ditches if they are wide enough and slightly inclined.

"WE SEE still a third kind of canal on Mars," continued Professor Pickering. "These are mostly in the northern hemisphere, which is predominantly desert. These canals are long, fairly wide, faint markings, of a temporary nature. Their existence cannot be explained by the gravitational flow of water, for the deserts are elevated plateaus. They are not permanent enough for us to assume that the water is pumped up into the deserts. These faint canals do not seem to irrigate anything in particular except themselves.

"The explanation that appears most reasonable is that these markings represent desert crops, planted to catch all the moisture possible as it travels during the semi-annual rainy seasons through clouds from pole to pole."

"If these desert crops are 'planted' you assume that there are 'planters'?" I asked.

"Yes, this explanation implies intelligent Martians. My belief is that the crops are intentionally planted where they will be most accessible or otherwise useful to their owners. The only alternative is to explain the markings as shower tracks existing independently of the general planetary circulation of winds. But the straight markings are too long to be explained that way, and I see no reason why an explanation involving intelligent life should be handicapped against those that do not. That explanation which involves the least and fewest improbabilities should be accepted, regardless of all other consideration. On the earth, life exists under the most diverse conditions, and on a planet where the surface conditions are so similar to our own, the presence of intelligent life involves no improbability whatever."

"But," I asked Professor Pickering, "are the surface conditions of Mars so similar to our own? Water is scarce, deserts cover most of the surface, and I have never read a textbook which did not describe the atmosphere as so scant that no human being could live there."

"Water is scarce," answered the astronomer, "in contrast with the water supply of our earth. But there certainly is the water of the Martian polar caps. Of this we are sure, and it is reasonable to suppose that there are springs and other underground sources of water, as on the earth. Indeed, we believe that some of the dark areas of Mars are great swamps.

"It is also admitted that most of the surface of Mars is desert, but the remaining one third of the planet's surface is in vegetation. Only one fourth of the earth's surface is land, and some of this is desert, so that the proportion of productive land surface is greater on Mars than on the earth.

"As regards the Martian atmosphere—that is a field in which revolutionary discoveries have lately been made. It was long believed that Mars had a thin atmosphere. Scientists reasoned that, because of the small mass of the planet, the force of gravity would not be strong enough to retain many gases.

"Since the atmosphere was thin, it was argued that the temperature on Mars must be subject to wide and rapid variations. At day the sun would beat down and heat up everything to an unendurable degree. At night, with no such blanketing atmosphere as we have, the heat would quickly radiate into space, and so the night surface of Mars would sink to below-freezing temperatures.

"Recent discoveries overturn this idea entirely, and we have strong evidence now that the density of the Martian atmosphere exceeds that of the earth's atmosphere. Much of this evidence was obtained at the near oppositions in 1922 and 1924. The height of limb clouds over the southern polar cap was measured. When compared with the height of clouds over the earth it indicated an atmospheric density at the surface of Mars six times that at the surface of the earth.

"At the Lick Observatory, Mars was photographed through color filters. When photographed in blue, its image showed a radius one hundred and twenty miles greater than when photographed in infrared. Professor Wright, who took the pictures, considers that the atmosphere was invisible in the red light, so the image in that photograph is of the planet's surface, whereas the blue image is of the Martian atmosphere.

"A third item of evidence is that obtained by measurements of the Martian temperature with the delicate electrical thermopile. These measurements indicated an equatorial temperature for Mars which is about one hundred degrees higher than we should expect it to be, based on the equatorial temperature of the earth. So great a difference indicates that Mars retains the sun's heat better than the earth—and this means a denser atmosphere.

"IT IS these new discoveries that have put an entirely different complexion on our conclusions with regard to the neighboring planet. They lead us to look on Mars as much more similar to the earth than we had previously believed was possible. Heretofore, most planetary astronomers have felt that animal life, as well as vegetable life, was possible on Mars. Some would go further and admit that intelligent life was not impossible. Now, however, we may say more than that. I think we are justified in saying that, with the evidence so strong for conditions similar to those found on the earth, and with vegetable life fairly assured, animal life is almost certain. Furthermore, if intelligent life exists there—as the straight and narrow canals seem to imply—then it seems probable that Mars is a world much more like the earth than we have heretofore been led to surmise. I am now inclined to consider it possible that even human life, if transported to Mars, might exist and perhaps flourish there."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

18 Years LATER and her teeth in marvelous condition

Today Miss Helen Mack's teeth flash as brightly as they ever did

Shortly after this picture was taken Miss Mack began brushing her teeth with Colgate's.

All 18, she has used one dentifrice . a cleansing dentifrice.. and look at her TEETH TODAY!

WHEREVER she goes, that smile wins for her. It is so confident . . . so sparkling. No wonder she has a host of friends. No wonder men and women pay her so many attentions. Nobody can resist her smile.

And yet . . . what would that smile be like without those flashing, lustrous teeth? They are the very essence of its charm. Cloud them and the fascination of her smile is gone.

Since 1909, Miss Mack has been protecting her teeth with Colgate's. Today, like so many others who have used that dentifrice steadily, her teeth are in marvelous condition.

In this country, and in foreign countries the world over, you will find thousands and thousands of men and women who began using Colgate's ten, fifteen, even twenty years ago, and whose teeth today are exceptionally sound and beautiful.

Many of these people are grateful enough to write us. Some send their photographs also. Each day the postman brings a few more letters to add to an already bulging file. Many of these letters come from users who have brushed with Colgate's for at least a decade. We could fill the pages of this magazine with quotations from them —sincere, unsolicited reports from people proud of the soundness and attractiveness of their teeth.

There is nothing mysterious about these enviable results. They did nothing that you cannot easily do yourself.

They visited their dentist for periodic inspections. And they used Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream.

Choose your dentifrice on the basis of results. Follow the lead of those who have already kept their teeth sound for years. Simply adopt for your own use the dentifrice most popular among people with well-preserved teeth.

On the one hand you have Colgate's, the chief and only feature of which is thorough cleansing. On the other, you have the fact that countless people who have used Colgate's for years now have exceptionally fine teeth.

In such a vital matter as the care of your teeth, could there be any safer guide than the actual experiences of people like yourself?

Also wouldn't it be an immense satisfaction to know that the dentifrice you were using was the one which dentists recommend most frequently?

So for lovely teeth—for teeth that make your smile the social and business asset that it should be—ask your druggist today for Colgate's. Or, if you prefer, try the free sample offered in the coupon.

CLEAN!

Dental authorities say that the only thing a dentifrice can do is CLEAN. Colgate's is scientifically made to clean teeth superlatively well.

Colgate & Co.
Est. 1806

Colgate & Co., Dept. 201-B
595 Fifth Ave., New York

FREE

Please send me a sample of Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream, the cleansing dentifrice.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

In Canada, Colgate & Co., Ltd., 72 St. Ambroise St., Montreal

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Let us assume that a human being has made the journey through thirty-five million miles of space, and finds himself on Mars. What would be his probable impression of that world?

First of all, perhaps, he would notice a curious feeling of physical lightness. The force of gravity on Mars is two fifths that of the earth. If our man weighed one hundred and fifty pounds, he would weigh only sixty pounds on Mars. He could lift loads and jump to heights and distances far beyond his power on the earth, and a walk of many miles would seem an easy stroll.

"AS HE traveled over the planet," explained Professor Pickering, "he would notice the absence of mountains and oceans. He would find that the northern half of the globe is mainly desert—bleak, elevated, almost barren, tablelands. The more habitable part of the planet is the southern hemisphere, where most of the vegetation grows, and where, apparently, Martian life flourishes.

"Approaching the melting polar cap, our explorer would find it surrounded by marshes, which would gradually deepen as the snow melted, and finally present the appearance of a lake of water. With the approach of summer, the lake would gradually disappear, as the water evaporated or flowed off. Eventually, he would see an occurrence that never happens on our earth—the polar snow would entirely disappear.

"He would find, I believe, that the climate of Mars is more equable and comfortable, on the whole, than that of the earth. The winters are less severe, for the snow does not extend as far from the poles as it does on our earth. If New York and Chicago were cities on Mars, situated in relatively the same latitude as on the earth they would rarely, if ever, see snow."

While our visitor would not notice any difference in the duration of the day on Mars—it is only forty minutes longer than our day—he would notice a considerable difference in the length of the year. It takes Mars six hundred and sixty-eight days to make its journey around the sun—or more than twenty-two months. In consequence, the Martian spring, summer, fall, and winter are nearly twice as long as the corresponding seasons on earth.

The two moons in the Martian sky would perhaps astonish the man from the earth, and what would startle him even more would be the sight of one of the moons rising in the west, moving rapidly across the sky, eclipsing the other moon, and setting in the east.

Actually, both moons move in the same direction in which Mars turns in its daily rotation. But whereas Mars takes 24 hours and 40 minutes to perform a revolution, the inner moon, Phobos, takes only 7 hours and 39 minutes to complete its journey around the planet. The combination of these two motions makes the moon appear to rise in the west, and it rises and sets twice daily. The outer moon, Deimos, is more leisurely. It requires 30 hours and 18 minutes to make its circuit around the planet, and the combination of its motion with the rotation of Mars causes Deimos to rise every five and a half days.

These two Martian moons are no larger in surface areas than a good-sized Texas ranch. Phobos measures nearly eight miles in diameter, and Deimos a little over six miles.

JUPITER is the most brilliant object in the Martian night sky—a magnificent orb, appearing half as large again as it seems to us. Many of Jupiter's moons, which we can see only through the telescope, would be plainly visible on Mars to the naked eye.

Just after the setting of the sun below the Martian horizon, or just before its rising, our visitor would see a brilliant double star—the earth and the moon, illumined by the sun's rays, and appearing far more spectacular to the Martians than Mars at its nearest appears to us. He could see the other side of the moon.

But what creatures would our explorer see walking about on Mars? Would the animals there be counterparts of our terrestrial fauna? Would Martians be simply smaller or larger editions of earth men, or would they be entirely different?

Such questions can only be left to the imagination; but it is not out of place here to remind the reader that our familiar mold is not necessarily the only mold in which human life may be cast.

Many thinkers have believed that there is life in the universe outside our little globe. The great William Herschel said of Mars: "Its inhabitants probably enjoy a situation in some respects similar to ours."

I ASKED Professor Pickering if it would be possible for us to send a signal which would reach Mars.

"Yes," he answered. "The most feasible method, in my opinion, would be to use light rays. It would be possible to produce an intensity of electric light sufficient to flash a conspicuous signal to Mars, though it would perhaps cost several million dollars. Another method would be to use a great number of mirrors and reflect the sun's rays. This could best be done when Mars is at forty-five degrees from opposition—about 61,000,000 miles from the earth. I have figured that a series of mirrors with an area of about one half of a mile square, would reflect a beam of sunlight which would appear to Mars as of the brightness of a fourth-magnitude star. Such a signal should be dazzlingly conspicuous in a suitable Martian telescope. If Martians are intelligent, and are observers of this planet, they would be likely to interpret such a light as a signal."

So far as is known, no well-organized attempt has ever been made to signal Mars, or any of the planets. Many years ago a lady of France, a certain Madame Guzman, left a legacy of one hundred thousand francs to the French Academy of Sciences. She specified that this money was to be awarded as a prize to the first person who should succeed in establishing communication between the earth and another planet—except Mars! She excepted Mars, because she thought that would be too easy.

Drake is One of the Great Unknowns of the Middle-West

(Continued from page 16)

finally located him by telephone in a town almost a hundred miles distant. "He promised to see you when you arrived," she explained, "and he keeps his word." So, while "Bob" Drake drove for three hours in a heat that neared the one hundred mark, that he might keep his word to a stranger, I browsed about, getting side lights on the man.

His clothing is tailor-made, but he buys three pairs of trousers with a suit. He pays thirty dollars for a hat, and wears it for ten years. I was shown hundreds of pictures of bridges, but not one of the builder; pictures of employees, but not one of the "boss." He heads and owns eight corporations, and those corporations in effect are Drake; but not one of them bears his name, nor does his name appear on any of their stationery.

Somebody asked Drake once why he doesn't live as a man of his wealth could. "I live as well as any," was his reply. "No matter how much money a man has, he can eat only three meals a day, wear one suit of clothes at a time, and sleep in one bed."

Once he told a reporter—I found the quotation in a newspaper file—"I don't want to quit building bridges until the Lord tells me I must; and then I want to be like the old carpenter. I want my saw to be worn thin, the blade of my plane to be almost gone, and my hatchet worn out."

That is "Bob" Drake.

A ruggedly handsome man, browned by the sun and Western winds, in plain blue shirt and with coat over arm, he strode into the office where I waited, and charged it with energy. There was a hale "Hello" to his associates as he called them by their first names, like a man getting home and glad to be there. In less than ten minutes he had disposed of a dozen matters awaiting him, seeming to enjoy this business of making decisions.

"Now!" he said presently, and turned to me smiling. It was as if he had always known me, and I had always known him.

Drake was born on a ranch in Jackson County, Kansas, in 1870. In a few crisp lines he sketched in his father, cattleman, railroad builder and ex-soldier.

"My father taught me," said Mr. Drake, "to keep my fences mended, and not stop merely with closing the gate. One Fourth of July we were going to town for the celebration. It was a big day for me and I was on my best behavior. Some

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The AIRMAN

sets new high standards in performance and in sales

For the year of 1927—Franklin stands out as one of the few cars to enjoy a substantial sales increase over 1926.

And now the new Franklin Airman—introduced a bare three months ago—is making new sales records, setting a pace which far surpasses that of any corresponding period in recent years.

Airman performance is thrilling the world!

Just as dauntless as today's Aviators—sharing many of the airplane's engineering and travel advantages—the Airman is first to attain the new standard of speed set by Aviation—more miles per day with less fatigue, higher average speed maintained for hours at a time.

Air-cooling—pioneered by Franklin—has been a dominant factor in the recent advancement of Aviation. Now Franklin offers the highly efficient air-cooled motor in 24% increased size, with tremendously increased power and hill-climbing ability.

Like Aviation, the Airman advocates scientific light weight construction as the means to greater economy and riding comfort—to easier driving—and to maximum safety at every speed.

Even the lines of the coachwork suggest swift, smooth flight. To know the joy of speed in comfort, to know truly exhilarating performance, you must challenge the highways in an Airman. The first mile reveals the secret of the Airman's instant success. Your demonstration awaits you today.

FRANKLIN AUTOMOBILE COMPANY, SYRACUSE, NEW YORK

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You know the result

Here's the reason why

Shaving is Smoother
Small-Bubble Way

Razor-pull banished. No more sting or smart. Off come whiskers clean and smooth when beards are softened this scientific way. There's a big difference in shaving creams that you can prove by test . . . see offer in coupon below.

◆ ◆ ◆

IF you think all shaving creams are alike, there's a surprise for you in this advertisement.

It's the story of a new way . . . an easy way . . . a quick and scientific way to get your whiskers off.

Already millions have adopted it. Thousands buy it daily.

No other shaving cream is like Colgate's. No other can offer you such unique results.

It is, we believe, the ultimate attainment in the science of beard-softening. A shaving cream based on the now proven principle that water, and not soap, is the real softener of your beard.

Thus Colgate lather is designed to absorb more water . . . to scientifically drench your beard with moisture right at the base where the razor work is done. It's a "small-bubble" lather. For small bubbles hold more water. They carry it closer to the base of your beard.

Ordinary Lather

Photomicrograph of ordinary lather surrounding single hair. Note how the large bubbles hold air instead of water against the beard.

Colgate Lather

Under identical conditions note the closely knit texture of Colgate lather. The small bubbles hold water instead of air against your beard.

Good-by, Razor-Pull

The minute you lather up with Colgate's, two things happen:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up the oil film that covers each hair—floats it quickly away.

2. Then billions of tiny, moisture-laden bubbles seep down through your beard . . . crowd around each whisker . . . soak it soft with water.

Instantly your beard gets soft and pliable . . . limp and lifeless . . . scientifically softened . . . ready for your razor.

Thus your whiskers come off clean and smooth. No razor-pull. No stinging and smarting. Twice-over shaves aren't needed now. Your face feels clean, fresh, smooth, invigorated throughout the day.

You be the judge . . for 7 days

These astonishing improvements are so easy to judge, that we ask you to make a test.

We'll gladly send a 7-day trial tube of Colgate's to any fair-minded man. Compare it with the shave cream in your bathroom now.

Do this please, at our expense.

As an extra dividend we will also send you a sample box of Colgate's Talc for Men. Try it after shaving. Mail coupon below.

Colgate & Company
Dept. 501-B, 595 Fifth Ave., New York

FREE OFFER

Please send me FREE sample of Colgate's Rapid Shave Cream. Also sample of Colgate's Talc for Men.

Name_____

Address_____

cattle had broken out during the early morning and, to heighten the good impression I wished to make, I had gone to some trouble to run them back into the pasture where they belonged, through the gate. This done, I very carefully closed and barred the gate.

"On the way to town, my father stopped before we had gone a half-mile. Both he and I saw at once that the cattle had again escaped from the pasture.

"'I don't understand that,' I told Father. 'Not more than an hour ago I ran them all in and closed the gate.'

"'Was the gate open to start with?' he asked.

"'No, sir, it was closed,' I answered.

"'While we go on to town, you stay here,' Father directed. 'Sit down under yonder tree and see if you can't figure out a way to keep those cattle inside the fence.'

"I climbed down from the wagon, and, heartbroken, watched it vanish down the road toward town. There went my holiday; but obediently I sat down under the tree. Then for the first time it dawned on me that the cattle must have broken through the fence somewhere, and that barring the gate hadn't mended the break. I looked about and, of course, there was a break. The lesson was impressed on me everlastingly."

DRAKE'S mother had been a schoolteacher, a leader in the movement that gave Kansas free schools. He is an idealist to-day because she made him so, a Christian because she impressed him with the infinity of God and His creation.

"One night she showed me the stars," he said, "and had me count those of the Great Dipper. Then she told me to think of a hundred stars, of five hundred. My conception couldn't go beyond that number.

"'If you tried to count all the stars that you see, how long might it take you?' she asked.

"I guessed it might take three months.

"'You have looked through a telescope,' she reminded, 'and know there are other stars beyond those which you now see. Remember, it was only a small telescope; had it been bigger would you have seen more stars?'

"'Yes, thousands more,' I said. 'The bigger the telescope the more stars I would see.'

"'Son, if you had the greatest telescope that ever could be built,' she went on, 'you would still be unable to see all of the stars. Beyond what you saw would be others and so on illimitably through space; and if you were up on one of those stars looking down at the earth you would see the earth as merely a moon or possibly a star. The earth is but a star in creation, and you are but one boy on the earth.'

"The enormity of the thing, my own insignificance in this vast scheme of endless space, made my head swim. Then she continued:

"'You can measure a piece of wood, a stone, or your own size. Anything one can measure is finite. But no man has ever been able to measure the universe, or space, because space, as you see, is without end, beyond our understanding. You can't comprehend any end to space, and yet you know there is space. We can't comprehend God, but yet we know He is.'"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Interior Pictures

Now easy to make with the Modern Kodak

If your subject is indoors—hard to take according to your past ideas—forget these hazards entirely. The Modern Kodak is an all-day, all-weather camera

Interior pictures you never previously dared to make—are simple and easy now. Use the Modern Kodak.

How often have you wanted to make an interior photograph? Now you can with a Modern Kodak.

These beautiful pictures shown above were made by other amateurs just like yourself, with the Modern Kodak

ARE you making pictures the same way you did ten years ago?

Do you still believe that good pictures can only be made out-of-doors in direct sunlight under ideal weather conditions?

That's a false impression entirely. For important new developments in the art of photography have practically revolutionized your picture-making possibilities.

If your subject's indoors—go right ahead and make the picture. You'll be surprised and delighted with the results you get.

If the weather's dark or cloudy—it doesn't make any difference. Some of the finest amateur pictures today have been taken under conditions that would have discouraged experts a few years ago.

There's no need now to miss a single picture opportunity—no need to wait for sunny days, or Summer suns, or "right" hours.

What Happened

New developments in the manufacture of lenses have made possible these remarkable results. Today, due to Eastman enterprise and the tremendous Eastman manufacturing resources, you can get extra-rapid, extra-efficient lenses on cameras of moderate price.

For example—on the $18 1A Pocket Kodak is now supplied a lens that in 1925 was not available on any camera selling for less than $40.

To you, this not only means better pictures. But it also means that your photographic day is lengthened . . . your picture opportunities are multiplied many times. It is no longer necessary now to have your subject in direct sunlight. You can make pictures in the shade . . . indoors under favorable light conditions . . . on rainy days or in cloudy weather. Pictures you never previously thought of taking are simple snap-shots now.

Everything simple as ABC

The modern Kodak is simplicity itself. Everything possible has been made automatic. Things to adjust have been reduced to a minimum. Thus picture-making, good picture-making, has been made easier than ever before.

On many Kodaks you'll find a simple "Exposure Guide"—a wonderful feature created by Eastman Scientists, which almost does your thinking for you. It instantly shows you the correct speed and lens opening to suit any light condition. It helps avoid mistakes—eliminates guesswork—takes the difficulty out of making pictures.

And—Kodak film in the familiar yellow box is dependably uniform. It has wide latitude. Which simply means that it reduces the danger of under- and over-exposure. It gets the picture!

With the modern Kodak you start making good pictures at once. The photographs you see in this advertisement were made by other amateurs, just like yourself. Without special training or help, you too can make photographs like these. All the skill that's needed is built into the camera.

February—An Ideal Month for Photography

The month of February is an ideal time to get pictures for your album.

Why not stop in at the nearest Kodak dealer's today? See these modern Kodaks. Find out how these new developments have simplified the making of pictures. Write for booklet about these modern Kodak improvements; mail the coupon.

Any Questions? If you have in mind a picture that you don't know how to make, if for any reason you aren't satisfied with the results that you're now getting, or if you'd like advice on photographic matters, write to the Service Department, Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y. Practical picture-makers will handle your inquiries with interest and without charge.

KODAK

Only Eastman Makes the Kodak

Eastman Kodak Co., Dept. AM-2,
Rochester, N. Y.

Please send me, FREE and without obligation, the booklet telling me about the Modern Kodaks.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

TRADE YALE MARK

Must you have something stolen to make you say
YALE LOCKS EVERYWHERE?

You may have a fine home, apartment, office, store or factory.

But it is never really yours unless it can be safely locked against intruders.

Make the place you live in or work in as pleasant as you like. Everybody tries to do that nowadays.

But put a lock on it! Not just any lock. A Yale Cylinder Lock.

Yale No. 44 Deadlatch

For example, the Yale No. 44 Automatic Deadlatch, a combined springlatch and deadlock. Automatic in action—throws the bolt almost twice the usual distance—an exclusive Yale feature. Handsome brass color finish. Sells for $4.50 each.

Yale No. 10 Steel Bar Deadlock

Or this Yale No. 10 Steel Bar Deadlock. It's as secure as a bar of steel across the door. Cannot be jimmied or sawed through and its Yale Pin-Tumbler Cylinder will keep out any sneak-thief. Attractive brass color finish. Priced at $5.00 each.

Yale No. 192 Steel Rotary Bolt Deadlock

Or this Yale No. 192 Steel Rotary Bolt Deadlock—interlocking door and jamb together. Here is super-protection, concentrated strength, unusual security. Its massive ¾ inch bolt of solid hardened steel is a sturdy defense against the pressure of the jimmy. Solid brass case—a quality lock. Sells at $5.50 each.

Yale will send you

—a folder describing these and six other Yale deadlatches and deadlocks varying in resistance quality as your needs for protection vary or you can get one of these folders and see the locks themselves at a convenient hardware store.

The Yale & Towne Mfg. Co.
Stamford, Conn., U. S. A.
Canadian Branch at St. Catharines, Ont.

YALE

YALE MARKED IS YALE MADE

The boy grew up under this teacher. As he was a finite being, she taught him, his existence in the human state would come to an end. He would be judged by the good he did during his limited time, a time which was but a clock-tick in the age of the universe. "The greatest of all good you can do is to bring happiness to those about you," she instructed. "Happiness is man's most cherished possession."

And with boyish ardor and with the faith of a son who loved, young Drake began to search his world for a life work that would promote happiness.

Since birth Drake had been afflicted with asthma. He has no recollection of having slept in a bed until after he was six years old. Throughout the greater part of his boyhood he had to sleep upright in a chair. Some of his finest work has been done in the night hours when sleep was an impossibility.

IN THE county of Drake's boyhood was a stream that was unbridged, thus cutting the countryside in twain. The settlers on each side of the stream spoke hostilely of those on the opposite side. If a cow was stolen or a mean act done, each side blamed the deed on the other. Each distrusted the other, and occasionally there were fights.

Then a bridge was built over the stream. Folks began to travel back and forth over it, to intermingle in business transactions and to make friends with those who had been their enemies. Distrust and suspicion passed as the two sides became acquainted, and the countryside flourished anew.

"It's a good work, that bridge," young Drake pondered. "It has made scores of folks friendly, more prosperous, and happier."

He had been searching for a life work, and suddenly, in that country bridge, he found what he was seeking. He was going to be a bridge builder, to make whole communities happier and richer, to join up the stream-broken roads with bridges, and to help this new country grow! He was now fifteen, almost a man, and it was time for him to get started at his work. Wasn't a man's life but a clock-tick after all?

"You'll need capital and experience to go into business, and I can give you neither," said his father.

In the nearby town of Holton a little private bank needed a clerk. The pay was only twelve dollars and fifty cents a month, but young Drake took the job. Unable to live on his wage, he sold insurance after banking hours and did a hundred odd-chance jobs about town. He went at this banking business with the idea of mastering it as a step upward toward the Big Work, and at the end of five years he was the bank's teller, drawing a salary of fifty dollars a month. Furthermore, he had saved twenty-six hundred dollars, his earnings from insurance sales.

Then things started to happen. A friend in need induced Drake to lend him funds to meet a crisis, and in a burst of generosity Drake let him take every penny that he had. The friend reciprocated by skipping to Mexico, without letting his creditors know of his destination. Young Drake took up the pursuit alone. He traced the man to Memphis,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

P. A. suits my taste like nobody's business

WHEN I opened my first tidy red tin and got a full breath of P. A.'s fragrance, I said: "Here's my brand!" I was absolutely sure of it the instant I tasted the tobacco itself in my pipe. What a taste! Cool as a climb in the Alps. Sweet as getting down again safely.

Mellow and mild and long-burning, with the last pull as cool and dry as the first. Prince Albert is great tobacco, all right, all right. You can hit it up from early morning to midnight, with never a regret . . . except, maybe, that you have to take time out for sleep!

They tell me P. A. outsells every other brand of pipe-tobacco on the market. I don't doubt it, and I don't wonder why. When you consider P. A.'s unbroken record of leadership over a period of years, it stands to reason it must be giving smokers more for their money. Try P. A.!

And look how much you get for your money — TWO full ounces in every tin.

PRINCE ALBERT

—no other tobacco is like it!

© 1928, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Winston-Salem, N. C.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A Dozen Dousings can't budge pore-dirt

. . . yet a single Pompeian Massage rolls every gray speck free!

IT'S hard to believe that your face is not clean when you wash it regularly. But 'way down where the wash-cloth never reaches, pore-dirt lies.

Where does it come from? The air we live in is teeming with millions of invisible particles of dust and grime.

These tiny specks work into your pores — get packed down tight—and give your face a sallow, grayish tone.

Science can tell men this. But the astonishing proof comes with their first Pompeian Massage. Here's how it works out:

Send us the coupon for a FREE tube. Wash your face. Then rub Pompeian into the skin you think is clean. What happens?

Goes in pink—rolls out gray!

The upper picture, taken under a powerful microscope, shows a section of skin before using Pompeian Massage Cream.

Compare it with the lower picture taken after using Pompeian Massage Cream. That's skin that is really clean! Those gray marks are the dried pellets of cream, dark with the pore-dirt that has been rolled free.

Photomicrograph taken under the lens of powerful microscope showing section of skin before using Pompeian Massage Cream.

Photomicrograph of skin after using Pompeian. Compare the skin tone. Note the dried pellets of cream, dark with pore-dirt that has been rolled free.

Give yourself a Pompeian Massage. Free your pores of imbedded sallow-toned dirt. Show the world a face alive with the healthy glow that a clean skin boasts.

A Pompeian massage is a great start for a busy, successful day. A marvelous "sprucing-up" for a bright evening.

FREE test convinces thousands

Pompeian is 60 cents at any toilet goods counter. We'd really rather you tested it free. Fill in the coupon and drop it in the mails—right now, while you read this message.

POMPEIAN MASSAGE CREAM

The Pompeian Company, Dept. 900-B, 595 Fifth Ave., New York. Gentlemen: Please send me a free trial tube of Pompeian Massage Cream . . . enough for two cleansing, invigorating facial massages.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

then to Mobile, and finally caught up with him in Monterey, Mexico.

"What did you do—thrash him?" I asked.

"No, nothing like that," Drake replied. "I couldn't blame him very much. He really had had a tough time of it, lost everything, was a broken man. He had left because he felt that he never would be able to pay me. I settled the account by accepting from him deeds for two quarter sections of land, almost worthless at the time. But I held the land, and in 1907—eighteen years later—I sold it for forty thousand dollars. It goes to show how such things come back to you, not immediately perhaps, but some day."

On the return trip from Monterey, Drake had only two nickels in his pocket when he reached San Antonio. He bought some crackers and made the remainder of the journey curled up behind a bale of hay in a box car, the crackers being his only food for two days.

The Holton banker died, and young Drake was charged with the duty of settling up the affairs of the little bank. The work took him to Kansas City, Missouri, and into contact with one of the large banks there. This bank offered him a position, but Drake shook his head. He was through with banking; at last ready to learn something of bridges.

One of the bank's directors was connected with a big bridge-construction company, and he agreed to give Drake a trial. Before a week had passed the beginner was designing a bridge. When his illness refused him sleep, which often was night after night, he studied as he fought for breath. At the end of a year he had actually crowded two years' work into one—"Thanks to asthma."

Then came the blow. Work was slack in the bridge company's offices and men had to be discharged. Drake's position had never been more than a temporary one, and he was told he must go. He was stunned, unable to believe it. He dashed into the street after his employer, who was on his way home, followed him into the cable car and into the seat beside him, all the while begging to be allowed to stay.

"YOU say you will stay on any terms?" asked his employer at length. He had been silent while Drake pleaded.

"On any terms you name," promised Drake.

The other produced a pencil and began to write on the back of an old envelope. In a few moments he handed to Drake, what he had written and smiled queerly.

Mr. Drake told me the contract was the toughest ever presented to him in his life. Under it, he was to receive each month an advance of one hundred and fifty dollars, half of which was to cover his expenses. This money, however, was to be in the nature of a loan. At the end of the year, if he had not earned the total amount advanced, he was to refund the difference. A second clause made this further provision: That, in order to have the company pay him anything additional to the amount stipulated, Drake would have to earn one hundred per cent beyond the money advanced; whereupon, but only after all expenses and overhead of the company had been paid, he would be allowed one fifth of his earnings, provided there were any left unexpended.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I was too Weak for sport like this a few years back"

Mrs. Kenneth Powell, of Seattle, testing her new-found strength in an ascent of Nesqualí Glacier, Rainier National Park

Seattle, Wash.

"When the mountains rear their heads at your back doorstep the challenge they throw you is too good to ignore. For several years, however, I suffered too badly from constipation really to enjoy any sports.

"In almost constant pain from the gas caused by fermenting wastes in my system, I became depressed, nervous. And I thought I had already tried everything.

"Then one day my physician said, 'I am going to suggest that you try Fleischmann's Yeast.'

"I did try it. At first I thought it didn't help. Then I found that when I took it with water it helped me — wonderfully. My health has been greatly improved. My whole outlook on life has become more cheerful."

Mrs. Kenneth D. Powell

FLEISCHMANN'S Yeast is a pure food . . . As fresh as any garden vegetable.

It keeps the intestinal tract clean and active. Rouses the sluggish muscles. "Regulates."

As your constipation disappears, your blood clears, your skin freshens, your digestion becomes better than ever before!

Buy two or three days' supply at a time from your grocer and keep in any cool dry place. Write for latest booklet on Yeast in the diet—free. Health Research Dept. J-49, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington St., New York.

BELOW

"I USED TO FEEL embarrassed every morning when I went to school, because of pimples on my face. One day one of my schoolmates asked me what I was doing for them, and when I told him he said, 'Why don't you try Fleischmann's Yeast?' . . . I didn't take his advice at first, but wish I had. For today—after eating Fleischmann's Yeast for some time —my face is as clear as a baby's. And I have all sorts of strength for hockey."

LYMAN O. LEE, Minneapolis, Minn.

RIGHT

"THERE WERE FEW things I could eat without having a bad attack of indigestion. This had gone on for some time. I had tried all sorts of remedies, getting only temporary relief . . . Running across an advertisement of Fleischmann's Yeast, I decided to give it a trial—and immediately telephoned my grocer for a dozen cakes, to start. Three times a day I took a cake dissolved in a glass of hot water.

"So remarkable were the results that I can't say too much for Fleischmann's Yeast. In a month I was able to eat my favorite dishes—and laugh at indigestion. My complexion was greatly improved, too."

MRS. BERNARD CAMPBELL, Chicago, Ill.

Health you have longed for— this easy way:

Eat three cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly every day, one before each meal or between meals: plain, or dissolved in water (hot or cold) or any other way you like. For stubborn constipation drink one cake in a glass of hot water—not scalding—before meals and before going to bed.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The ocean front at Santa Barbara

You'd take the next train to Southern California

IF YOU realized half that awaits you for a vacation in Southern California you'd come right now or you'd get next summer's plans all set! Every mile, every hour leads to romance in this strange, fascinating land.

For summer, here are two things to remember:—Bring light wraps—but not your umbrella! You sleep under blankets nine nights out of ten and awaken to exhilarating days you know will be rainless [and of low humidity]. Average mean summer temperature here for 51 years is 69 degrees [U. S. Weather Bureau].

In a succession of unforgettable days you may see the highest mountains in the nation [fourteen peaks exceed 14,000 feet]; the alluring desert, Old Spanish Missions and groves of ripening oranges. The blue Pacific will bid you enjoy its thrills! Nearby mile-high peaks that you can climb—by auto, afoot or trolley, will offer vistas of amazing beauty. And think of it—65 golf courses at your command!

Get a close-up view of the movie "lots" and Beverly Hills where noted film stars reside. Take the sail to Capri-like Catalina Island.

Gay, cosmopolitan Los Angeles has more than a million and a quarter people! You'll marvel at the growth and natural resources of Los Angeles County, one of the wealthiest in the nation. Boulevards guide you through its billion dollar oil fields!

It is enjoyable to come by way of Los Angeles. Then take in Long Beach, Pasadena, San Diego, San Bernardino, Riverside, Ojai, and such fascinating coast resorts as La Jolla, Laguna, and Santa Barbara. See all of this rare, this gorgeous Southland!

Consult your nearest railroad ticket office about low rates from May 15th to October 31st. Make plans now.

Mail the coupon for a 52-page all-year vacation book telling you just what to do and see in this strange land.

Southern California

"A trip abroad in your own America!"

All Year Club of Southern California,
Dept. M-2, Chamber of Commerce Bldg.,
Los Angeles, California.

Please send me your free booklet about Southern California vacations. Also booklets telling especially of the attractions and opportunities in the counties which I have checked.

☐ Los Angeles ☐ Santa Barbara
☐ Los Angeles Sports ☐ San Diego
☐ San Bernardino ☐ Riverside
☐ Orange ☐ Ventura

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

After Drake had read the contract he drew out his own pencil and signed it underneath the signature of his employer. He was to sell bridges and to design those that he sold. The contract was to be in effect for five years.

"What's the biggest salary you've ever paid a salesman?" Drake asked.

"Oh, about thirty-six hundred a year," was the reply. "Do you think you'll equal that?"

"No; I'm going to beat it!" said Drake.

Generally, the year that followed was a poor one for the construction business. There were periods when Drake didn't have his clothes off for a week at a time, even to sleep. But the ailment from which he had suffered since birth had inured him to lack of regular rest: he could sleep in a chair, in a railroad coach, on a bench in a station, anywhere, as chance offered. Even to-day he has a couch in his office on which he can stretch out for an hour or two, in case he wishes to work through the night. His constitution is rugged, despite his affliction. He is as husky as the foreman of a wrecking crew.

He told me of one incident in that year's work. A bridge was to be built over the North Platte River at Chimney Rock, in the extreme western end of Nebraska. Drake arrived at Sidney, the county seat, in the midst of a blizzard, four hours after the contract was to have been let. The hotel keeper bluntly refused to guide him to the courthouse, about a half-mile distant, saying it would be suicide to venture out in the storm. Finally, Drake coaxed the negro porter to undertake the job for a dollar. A railroader who was present volunteered to go along, and the three set out, linked by a rope.

It took them more than an hour to walk the half-mile. A lone clerk was on duty at the county commissioners' office, trapped there by the blizzard. The bridge contract had not been let for the simple reason that nobody had submitted a bid.

"No use for you to bid on that bridge," he informed Drake. "It was advertised merely as a formality. A few of the settlers up there at Chimney Rock have got together and subscribed to a fund of fifty-six hundred dollars, half to be given in cash and half in labor and teams. The county is going to give an equal amount, and maybe they'll get a bridge and maybe they won't. There's not enough money in it for a contractor to bother."

"They must need a bridge, to subscribe for it out of their own pockets," said Drake.

"They sure do," said the clerk. "They need a bridge badly. Without one they're shut off by the river, can't get out."

NEXT morning Drake was on his way to Chimney Rock in an open buggy, driven by an ex-soldier whom he had persuaded to make the sixty-mile trip. The snow storm had let up some, but the temperature was twenty below zero. "Keep an eye on me, and I'll keep an eye on you," warned the ex-soldier. "If you see me kinda dozin' off, thump your elbow into my ribs. A feller daren't doze long in this weather."

All day they plowed their way through the snow, floundering in drifts, digging their way out at times, taking turns at driving the horses. As dusk descended

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The longest station to station call within the U.S. now costs only $10

An Advertisement for Bell Long Distance Telephone Service

THE longest telephone call you can make within the U. S. is from Eastport, Maine, to the town of Bay, California. Under the new rates, the station to station day charge for this call is now only $10.

More than ever you will now be surprised how little long distance calls cost. Business more and more is using the long distance telephone to save trips, buy and sell goods, make appointments and collections, get important things done on time.

A New York company made 14 long distance calls to department stores in 13 cities and sold $37,320 worth of specialties, "all of the transactions having been started and completed by Long Distance at a very nominal cost." A firm of Toledo brokers in one year sold $5,000,000 worth of produce by long distance calls. "Seventy-five per cent of our bean business is done over the telephone. . . . We can get in closer touch with the buyer and understand conditions at his end of the line." In eight months, a tire concern sold $3,180,000 worth of tires by telephone at a sales cost of 2%.

What far-away calls could you profitably make, now? Just ask for the long distance operator and place your call by number . . . it takes less time. . . Number, please?

AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES — BELL SYSTEM

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

When a little girl needs her mother most

To help you guide her—these new, simple plans at school and at home

IN the years between 8 and 12, a new set of influences begins to shape a child's character and habits.

What questions she asks! It is a period that calls for wise handling.

It is during this period, too, that mothers most often have cause to worry about the child's eating habits—particularly at breakfast.

So widespread are bad breakfast habits at these ages that school authorities have started a nation-wide movement to help you. In over 60,000 schoolrooms today this slogan is displayed on the walls:

"Every boy and girl needs a hot cereal breakfast"

You, of course, know from your own experience that when your child goes off to school with a good hot cereal like Cream of Wheat inside her, she is really prepared to meet the demands of her morning's work!

The reasons why, for over 30 years, both mothers and health authorities have recommended Cream of Wheat as the ideal hot cereal for children are these:

1. It supplies an abundance of energy.
2. Cream of Wheat is so quickly digested.
3. Children love its creamy richness.

This little precaution which means so much to your children's future—begin it now. The simple plan described below will help you guide them at the breakfast table. Start them off to school every morning ready for a good day's work. No doubt there is a package of Cream of Wheat in your pantry now. If not, your grocer has it. Give your children a hot bowl of Cream of Wheat for breakfast—regularly.

© 1928, C. of W. Co.

FREE—Mothers say this plan works wonders*

A plan that makes your children want to eat a hot cereal breakfast regularly. A youngster's club, with badges and a secret, with gold stars and colored wall charts. All material free—sent direct to your children together with a sample box of Cream of Wheat. Just mail coupon to Dept. P-11, Cream of Wheat Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

Name of child.....

Address.....

they still had four or five miles to go to reach the first cabin of a settler.

But when spring came the settlers got their bridge, and it was Drake who designed and built it, a wooden bridge over the North Platte that was 1,750 feet in length. Every settler who had subscribed to the bridge fund paid—in cash, in labor, or in teams—what he had pledged. It is doubtful, however, if the bridge would have been built at all if Drake hadn't made that ride through the storm.

There were other such bridges built. Into communities where other salesmen wouldn't venture, due to their inaccessibility and the fact that "there wasn't enough money in it," Drake went and built, and made money for his company. He was feeling his way toward a new type of bridge, finding ways to cut costs, to reduce hazards. And that first year, under his contract, his company paid him $4,200. Before the contract's expiration Drake was earning $10,000 a year!

THE standardized bridge, gradually developed by him during these five years, was the idea that made it possible for Drake to sell more bridges than were sold by all the other salesmen combined. The accepted way among bridge builders then was to design every bridge separately. This made the designs costly and materials much higher in price, owing to the specialized nature of their manufacture.

"This seemed to me entirely unnecessary," Mr. Drake explained. "A bridge is made up of spans; it may be one span, three spans, or a dozen or more spans, according to its length. I couldn't see why one standard span, multiplied as often as the distance required, wouldn't do for all bridges of that capacity."

Into the design of this standard bridge span Drake tried to combine the good features of the best specially designed spans in use. He wanted a durable bridge and also a beautiful one. The thing was not to be conceived in a day, and Drake put years of work on it. Once he had a standard set up, he tore his plans apart and made them over again and again. He built more than two hundred bridges of the transverse joist type before he was satisfied with his standard span to the extent of making it public. His announcement of it revolutionized bridge building.

When his five years' contract with the Kansas City company expired he signed a new contract for another five years; but this time the contract granted him forty per cent of his profits. He became the highest paid bridge salesman and designer in the Middle-West, and he wasn't yet thirty years old. Then, at the end of three years, the bridge company was sold and became a subsidiary of one of the great steel corporations. Drake resigned, and opened his own office independently. He located it in Omaha, next door to that of the big corporation. The new company he named the Standard Bridge Company.

"Oh, I had no easy time of it," he assured me. "I had saved some money; but this capital was only a drop in the bucket beside the millions of the corporation that was my chief competitor. Only my earlier bank training enabled me to finance my venture. The second factor in my favor was the standard bridge, which the corporation refused to adopt for a

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Complete Short Stories of MAUPASSANT

All in ONE Volume!

YOU can have every short story Guy de Maupassant ever wrote—more than 200 of them—in a single beautiful volume, for the sensational bargain price of only $2.98. Think of it! Less than a penny and a half for each one of these immortal masterpieces. Never before have they all been offered the American public in any form at a price so amazingly low.

No other writer, living or dead, has ever pictured life with the fearless audacity and daring devotion to truth of Guy de Maupassant. In stories that may be read in ten minutes, Maupassant, with his characteristic pagan frankness, embodies the entire gamut of human passions, the full breadth and depth of French life and love.

Now for the first time you can know and enjoy all the superb short stories of Maupassant, exactly as they were taken from the original French. Every translation absolutely complete, authentic and unabridged. And All in One Volume!

If you already know some of Maupassant, you have wanted to read more. If you have not yet enjoyed any of his work you could not have a better opportunity to start. Maupassant is the acknowledged master of the short story—he has no rival. You will read and reread these tales many times.

Now only $2.98

222 Masterpieces Including

A Useful House
Mademoiselle
Graveyard Sirens
Am I Insane?
Bed No. 29
After Death
A Passion
The Mad Woman
Forbidden Fruit
The Rendezvous
Woman's Wiles
A Poor Girl
A Mesalliance
Magnetism
Love
The Hole
Fecundity
Room No. 11
Margot's Tapers
The Bed
An Old Maid
The Artist's Wife Virtue
Countess Satan
Words of Love
In the Moonlight
The Venus of Braniza
The Sequel of Divorce
A Dead Woman's Secret
Doubtful Happiness
The Story of a Farm Girl
The Carter's Wench
A Wife's Confession
Love's Awakening
The Wedding Night
One Phase of Love
In His Sweetheart's Livery
Virtue in the Ballet
The Impolite Sex
The Farmer's Wife
The New Sensation
And 144 more vivid tales.

WALTER J. BLACK, Inc.
171 Madison Avenue
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

FREE EXAMINATION

NO MONEY IN ADVANCE—NO C. O. D.

You must see this amazing one-volume edition to appreciate it fully. Fine quality thin paper, large, readable type, beautiful maroon silk cloth, richly grained binding, stamped with gold. You pay nothing in advance—nothing to the postman. Clip and mail the coupon now, keep and read the book a week, then decide if you want to own it. You risk nothing; you alone are the judge of the book's merit. Send the coupon today.

WALTER J. BLACK, Inc. (862)
171 Madison Ave.,
New York City, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Send me, for free examination, your new one-volume edition of Guy de Maupassant's Complete Short Stories, 1000 thin paper pages printed in large, clear type; silk cloth binding, stamped in gold. I will either return the book at your expense or send you only $2.98 in full payment within one week.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Is your mind clouded by the . . . New Blade Fallacy?

Millions of men are missing better shaves than they have ever known because their minds are clouded with the idea that a blade should shave smoothly because it is NEW. Every few days they take a new blade, yet never know the joy of a really fine shave

You shouldn't expect a blade which left the factory months before it reached you to be in shaving condition without further attention. A fine violin tuned to perfection only yesterday must be tuned before you play it today. It is so with a razor.

This is interesting

Fine razors have edges of tiny invisible teeth. Temperature changes, jolts and handling get these teeth out of alignment. That's why a blade pulls. Stropping smoothes them into line and restores a keen cutting edge.

A few turns on Twinplex puts an edge on a NEW blade that is a marvel for smooth shaving. And it's so easy to strop with Twinplex. No fussing—no reversing blade. Just slip blade in and turn—strops both edges at once and reverses blade at every turn, just as a barber does. You can't fail.

30 seconds a day will keep one blade marvelously keen, for weeks of the smoothest shaves you've ever known. Shaving is also easier and quicker with Twinplex, for a keen blade is a quick safe shaver.

You can now buy a Twinplex at any dealer's for as little as $2.50. It pays for itself in a few months and saves more than its cost each year thereafter. Other attractive Twinplex models at $3.50 and $5.00.

Send for the DULL HOUSE and FREE NEW blade stropped

Clever little Dull House solves the problem of disposing of old blades safely. Send 10¢ for it and we will also send you FREE one brand NEW blade stropped on Twinplex, just to show you what real shaving is. Name your razor.

TWINPLEX SALES CO.
1780 Locust Street, Saint Louis
New York Montreal London Chicago

Twinplex Stropper

time. Though buying materials at higher prices than those paid by my competitor, yet I could underbid him, thanks to my standard.

"In 1907 came the business panic of that year. It was almost impossible to get credit, and then, if never before, I learned the value of money as a business necessity. Money is as necessary to a business as materials. Pay rolls can't be met with promises, and it is because of this fact that a business must exact a profit if it is to exist and do worth-while work. The panic might have been our end had it not been for those two quarter sections of land I had in Kansas, held since that day when my broken friend had given them to me in Mexico. As I told you, I sold them for forty thousand dollars that year; and it was that money which saved the company."

Despite Drake's difficulties during this early period of his business, he was still the idealist. Up in South Dakota a new county was in the process of organization. All it needed was some bridges to enable it to link its scattered settlements together; but the settlers had not money for bridges, and as there was no county organization as yet there was no means of levying and collecting taxes.

An acquaintance came to Drake with this problem: "Bob, if you really want to help folks, go up there and build those bridges for us," he said. "Later, when we've got our county organization, we'll try to see that you get paid."

Drake knew that the proposed county had a rough road before it financially. Nevertheless, he agreed to look over the ground. Once there he did not hesitate. The need of those bridges was so evident, he told me, that he couldn't hesitate. In person, he laid out a road system for the district and marked on the plan where bridges should be built, sixteen in all.

DRAKE himself was having no easy time of it financially; but—he smiled as he mentioned it—he was better off than the new county-to-be. He built the sixteen bridges, paid for them, and gave them to the settlers. As he had foreseen, the new county never got around to paying him.

Idealism, too, was the seed from which grew his greatest invention, that of the steel pile for bridge support. Wood pilings were being used in most bridges at that time, except in the really large bridge structures where steel tubes or bents were employed. In erecting steel bents on either bank, workmen had to dig in what were known as "mud sills," which required great holes near the water's edge. Often in the course of the work the walls of the excavations collapsed and buried the diggers; lives were not infrequently lost.

One night, unable to sleep because of an attack of asthma, Drake sat up alone in the lobby of his hotel at Norfolk Junction. He had come there to tell a mother that her son had been killed in one of these collapses. The mission he had to perform depressed him, and he pondered to find a way to eliminate the danger which had taken the life of this boy.

Two, three, four o'clock was ticked off by the lobby clock. Still Drake drew idle designs on the hotel stationery. Daylight crept through the windows, and at last the designs began to take form. The final of these, drawn while the morning porter swept up, was that for the first steel pile support, a pile that could be driven into the earth by the blows of a gravity hammer and be held there by frictional resistance.

TO-DAY, Mr. Drake heads and owns eight companies—the Standard Bridge Company, of Omaha, which is the parent concern; the Mountain Timber Company, of Portland, Oregon; the Westover Steel and Iron Works, of Lincoln, Nebraska; the Atlantic Bridge and Iron Works, of Sioux Falls, South Dakota; the Red Oak Bridge and Iron Works of Red Oak, Iowa; the Sherman Brothers Lumber Company, of Portland; the Standard Sesoning Society, of Cottage Grove, Oregon, and the Portland Bridge and Iron Company, of Portland.

The Standard Sesoning Society has introduced a new method of seasoning lumber, another invention of Drake's. Previous methods called for hot air as a means of drying out the lumber. Drake's method, which he calls "sesoning," employs cold air. The plant he calls a "sesonhous."

As soon as he had perfected his new "sesoning" process Drake sought to standardize it. At Lincoln, Nebraska, he built a plant for this purpose. But when it was completed he ordered it demolished. Not until the third plant had been built did he feel satisfied to let it stand.

"I try to start right," Mr. Drake explained. "Unless the beginning is right, everything that follows is bound to be wrong. If I make a false start, I begin over again and again, until I'm sure I have it as near right as I can get it. Cost doesn't enter into the matter, for the costliest thing a man can do is to start off on a mistake."

He added:

"I've yet to build a bridge that has completely satisfied me. It was the best bridge I could build at the time, but I know it isn't the best bridge that can be built. I am always seeking to find that 'best bridge'—and I guess I will go to my grave still seeking it. Then another will step into my shoes to continue the hunt for me; but the 'best bridge' will always be just a step ahead of him—'the next one,' as it has been with me. The best of everything on this earth will always be undiscovered. The most that we mortals can do is to find better than we have."

THIRTY-FIVE miles from the railroad station, over cow tracks and sandy ruts, William S. Dutton's rented car bumped. He was visiting a woman for The American Magazine, a woman with the spirit of a Viking. And he came back with one of the most inspiring stories that it has been our fortune to print. Next month you will meet this marvelous little Nebraska physician and surgeon, whose territory covers eight hundred miles. "No bigger than a minute," the cowboys say; but through hell and high water she fought her way, and with almost superhuman pluck and medical skill won the unbroken faith of a whole country.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

FACES that are FIT by Williams

A dozen times a day we make quick and important appraisals of men.

Bearing. Clothes. Handshake. These sway our verdict. But most of all we judge our fellows by their faces.

Turn, then, at Shaving time to Williams, if you're wise,—to Williams and 88 years of specialized study of what is best for beard and skin,—what is best to keep faces Fit!

For a quick comfortable shave choose the Williams lather,—thick, abundant, supremely mild.

And to protect your newly shaven skin, to condition your face for the day, to carry on where Williams Shaving Cream leaves off, splash on Aqua Velva.

Make this Williams formula your regular morning habit. Your face will look better, feel better. Your skin will take on new tone—will keep buoyantly, youthfully Fit!

"Just notice the fine skins of the men who use Williams!"

Williams

SHAVING CREAM - - - AQUA VELVA

You can't lose this cap!

Williams Shaving Cream — Absolutely pure. Absolutely uncolored. Super mild. It saturates and softens every hair. Thoroughly prepares the skin. Makes shaving quick and comfortable. Gently cleanses every pore.

"Oh, yes . . . sometimes they change . . . but they all come back to Williams!"

Williams Aqua Velva — Made expressly for after-shaving. Its stimulating tingle wakes the skin and livens it. Protects it from dust, germs, wind and weather. Prevents chapping. Helps to heal tiny nicks and cuts. Keeps the skin flexible by conserving its natural moisture. Helps to keep it young.

The J. B. Williams Company, Glastonbury, Conn., U. S. A.—Montreal, Canada

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Pipe Smoker Hunts Two Years For Right Tobacco

The good old maxim, "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again," evidently applies to tobacco as well as anything else.

Many a man has quit trying after a few different brands have failed to give him pipe-smoking satisfaction. Here's the story of a man who persevered until he found the kind of pipe tobacco he spent two years searching for:

Dallas, Texas,
March 22, 1927

Larus & Bro. Co.,
Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen:

The worst thing in the world to try to find is a good pipe tobacco that is well within the reach of everybody, and at the same time does not taste like it had just come out of the cabbage patch.

I have been smoking a pipe for two years and have just this month started to smoke a real smoke, Edgeworth. If at first you don't succeed, try, try again. Believe me, I tried for two years, but finally success is more than mine.

I have just been looking around, and have found to my delight that I can get Edgeworth practically anywhere. I even found it out at the lake near Dallas where I go fishing. Oh boy, what a combination—a perfect day, a can of good tobacco, and your pipe.

I always thought these ad letters were the bunk, but this time I know somebody is wrong and that is me.

Here's to old Edgeworth,
Edmund Condon.

To those who have never tried Edgeworth, we make this offer:

Let us send you free samples of Edgeworth so that you may put it to the pipe test. If you like the samples, you'll like Edgeworth wherever and whenever you buy it, for it never changes in quality.

Write your name and address to Larus & Brother Company, 3 S. 21st Street, Richmond, Va.

We'll be grateful for the name and address of your tobacco dealer, too, if you care to add them.

Edgeworth is sold in various sizes to suit the needs and means of all purchasers. Both Edgeworth Plug Slice and Edgeworth Ready-Rubbed are packed in small, pocket-size packages, in handsome humidors holding a pound, and also in several handy in-between sizes.

On your radio—tune in on WRVA, Richmond, Va.—the Edgeworth Station. Wave length (254.1 meters) 1180 kilocycles

Jump!

(Continued from page 28)

"Well, I was telling about the fellow who nearly fainted. He got out back of the strut, holding tight with one hand, and with the other hand on the rip cord, the way he had been told. His face was a ghastly greenish-yellow, which was natural enough; but his knees began giving away under him before he pulled the rip cord, and that wasn't so good. He was slowly slipping down the strut, and in another second or two would have been a goner. I have no doubt that chap owes his life to the very fact that he was trembling like a leaf from fright; for while he was still holding on to the rip cord, but too far gone to pull it consciously, his trembling did it for him.

"He got to the ground safely, but still scared to death. They had to take his harness off him—he couldn't do it himself.

"I NEVER would go up for a jump and come down with the plane—it's a matter of pride, or honor—and I expect the same of the men I take up. For one reason, if I brought a man down without jumping he'd be more scared the next time; for another, his life would be made miserable by his buddies. Even if I have to push a man off the plane to get him to jump, I do it.

"There was one young chap, I remember, who seemed to be doing everything very nicely. We got to the place where I wanted him to jump, and, according to our prearranged signal, I nodded my head for him to go. I was going too, but wanted him to leave the plane first.

"He nodded back as if he understood, and put first one foot and then the other over the side very gingerly, and felt around as if for something to step down on. Then he drew his legs back, looked at me, and shook his head. I figured he must have lost his nerve, so I reached over and gave him a shove that sent him into the air quick enough. He pulled the rip cord right away, and went floating down safely. I jumped immediately afterward, and by falling a long ways before I opened my 'chute, reached the ground before him. I was at his side as soon as he landed.

"He opened his mouth to say something, but not a word came out. It affects a good many that way the first time.

"But when he could talk, he said plenty. He was sore as a crab; claimed I might have killed him, and a lot more like that.

"'Look here, buddy,' I said, 'you don't know what's eating you. When you walk into quarters to-night, you'll be the parrot's pinfeathers, because you've made your first jump and got away with it in swell shape. You don't suppose I'm goin' to tell anybody I gave you a little shove, do you?

"'All right, how'd it be if you hadn't jumped at all? You don't reckon anybody keeps those things a secret, do you? The first thing you'd hear would be "Yellow!" And they'd mean you! They'd whittle their fingers and yell "'Fraidy cat!" No matter how long you served in the marines, they'd never forget it, nor let you forget it. Your life wouldn't be worth living!'

"And that's the truth. I don't know how it is in other branches of the service, but in the marines they're just like a bunch of school kids; in fact, lots of them are little more than kids in age. And, like kids, they don't respect or have mercy on any fellow who 'dassn't' do what they do.

"Ground winds can play a jumper mean tricks. Once when I was jumping a regular gale was blowing on the ground. I asked the pilot if he knew how it was up above. He said he had been in the air an hour or so before and it was pretty bad. Judging from that, I figured about where I ought to leave the plane to make a good landing somewhere near the center of the field.

"We went up, and I jumped as I had planned. But a look at the ground between my legs while I was falling, told me that the 'chute was taking me down straight as a plummet. That meant only one thing: hardly a breath of air was stirring at that point! Not until I was five hundred feet above the ground did I strike any wind, and then I fell right into the gale that had been blowing when we hopped off. I moved then a-plenty, but my calculations as to where I would land were all upset.

"I saw I was headed straight for a barbed-wire fence. I knew if I got entangled in it I'd probably drag a few hundred feet of wire off the posts, and I didn't want to nail it back on again. So I began climbing one side of the 'chute to try and empty the air out of it, figuring to land on the near side of the fence.

"That partially succeeded. I landed on one side of the fence, but my 'chute fell over the wires on the other side. My face and hands were pretty badly bloodied up by barbs.

"Ordinarily, when you land in a stiff wind it's necessary to empty the air out of your 'chute right away and get it flattened down; otherwise, it will keep going on the ground and you'll be dragged after it like a pig tied to a running elephant. The only way you can stop yourself, unless you run into something, is to pull at the lines on the lower edge of the 'chute until you gradually flatten it out.

"THE speed of a parachute's descent depends on several factors: One is the weight of the jumper—other things being equal, a heavy man comes down a little faster—and another is the size of the 'chute itself. Parachutes vary in size, but the smallest are seldom less than twenty-two feet in diameter, and the largest not more than twenty-eight. These measurements refer to the size of the 'chute when laid out flat.

"These sizes are determined not arbitrarily but by what is necessary for the 'chute to do its job. The principle, of course, is to have a device, light but sufficiently durable to support a man, and yet with a surface large enough to offer so much resistance to the air that it will counteract the law of physics and gravity which governs the speed of falling objects. The rate of fall for fairly heavy objects which do not offer much resistance to the air is approximately sixteen feet the first

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"It certainly is QUIET – is it an IROQUOIS?"

Quietness of operation is only one of the numerous features which distinguish Iroquois Electric Refrigeration. As quiet as the gentle whispering of the woodland pines. It is also so remarkably efficient that it makes for easier housekeeping all around. And it is so simple in mechanism and so economical in operation—the cost in most localities is less than the cost of ice.

Just plug the quiet Iroquois into any electric outlet and it produces that "crisp dry cold of a frosty night" so necessary to the proper preservation of food and the protection of health. Tests of ice-cooled refrigerators have shown that in the majority of them the temperature is above 50 degrees—permitting bacteria and mold to multiply rapidly, foods to decay, and constituting a menace to health.

The quiet Iroquois constantly maintains that desirable low temperature which protects against bacterial contamination. It makes you free from the damp, ill-smelling and unsanitary storage of ice-cooled refrigerators, free from the uncertainty and nuisance of ice delivery, free from all worries and troubles of keeping your food fresh—nothing left for you to do or think about.

The quiet Iroquois in the illustration—all-metal cabinet, white enamel inside and outside—is beautiful in any kitchen. It is so compact that it occupies a minimum of space; so roomy that it is amply large for homes with four or five in the family.

Only 61" high, 22½" deep, 26¼" wide. Unusual amount of shelf space—9½ square feet. Large food storage capacity, too—5½ cubic feet. And greater ice-cube capacity than any other electric refrigerator of its size—110 cubes, or more than 9 pounds of ice—with an extra tray for storing ice cubes.

The quiet Iroquois is built to give lasting satisfaction, and behind it are all the resources of a $40,000,000 corporation—a world-famous business institution established for a half-century.

There are also eight other different types of the quiet Iroquois in all-metal porcelain enamel white or gray cabinets. Or you can get a quiet Iroquois electric refrigerating unit to install in your present ice box.

Write us today for illustrated booklet, and name and address of the nearest dealer. You owe it to yourself to get acquainted with the quiet Iroquois.

THE IROQUOIS ELECTRIC REFRIGERATION COMPANY
1600 Arch Street, Philadelphia
Associate of The Barber Asphalt Company

Ham Mousse
—one of the many tasty entrees any one can make in the quiet Iroquois.

Chocolate Plum Pudding
—one of the delicacies which may be made in the quiet Iroquois.

IROQUOIS
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
The QUIET electric REFRIGERATION

The Iroquois Electric Refrigeration Company
1600 Arch Street, Philadelphia
Please send me, without obligation, your illustrated booklet and tell me where I can see the quiet Iroquois demonstrated.

Name .....
Address .....
..... A

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Beware the Coated Tongue

EVERY physician since the days of Hippocrates has regularly examined the tongue of his patients.

For a white, furry tongue is the first and unfailing index of disturbed bodily processes. It is a sure warning of intestinal stoppage, the underlying cause of many, many ills of life.

To correct the condition of stoppage signalled by a coated tongue, take Sal Hepatica—the standard effervescent saline. Sal Hepatica sweeps away accumulated food wastes promptly—usually within a half hour.

When you take Sal Hepatica you have taken the simple, basic step to guard against the headaches, and all the other enervating physical troubles due to stoppage. Sal Hepatica corrects stoppage and gently flushes away the poisons of waste that are the real cause of so many of our present-day ailments.

Sal Hepatica contains the same health-giving salines as are found in the natural spring waters of the noted European spas where so many people go to take the "cure." Like these waters, Sal Hepatica is efficacious in the treatment of many common ills.

Dissolved in water, Sal Hepatica makes a bubbling, sparkling drink, refreshing to the taste, invigorating in its effect. The best time to take it is upon arising or a half hour before any meal.

Keep yourself physically fit and mentally alert with this bracing saline. Look at your tongue every morning. If it is coated—if you awake tired and depressed—make yourself internally clean by taking Sal Hepatica at once.

Send for the free booklet that tells you more fully how to relieve the headaches and other ills traceable to self-poisoning.

Please address BRISTOL-MYERS CO.
Dept. L-28, 71 West St., N. Y. C.

Sal Hepatica

© 1928

second, and sixteen feet additional for each additional second: that is, in ten seconds a man falls, theoretically, about nine hundred feet.

"Now, a loaded parachute drops with a uniform speed, at the rate of about sixteen feet per second: in other words, its speed does not accelerate as it nears the earth. (Of course this figuring does not take into account any sidewise speed that may be imparted by the wind.) Thus, if you fall a mile with a parachute, it takes about five and a half minutes to come down, as against less than half a minute falling as a free body. The longest parachute jump on record was made by Captain A. W. Stevens, of the army. He left the plane at an elevation of twenty-five thousand six hundred and forty feet, practically five miles, and the descent took him something like thirty minutes.

"THE advantages of falling a considerable distance without opening the 'chute are found chiefly in combat. Suppose a plane is put out of commission by enemy fire, and a jump is the aviator's only resort to escape from otherwise certain death. If he jumps and opens his 'chute immediately, he presents a big, rather slow-moving mark for the enemy's guns. If he delays, the chance of his being hit is much reduced, for a man tumbling head over heels is too small and swift a target to be hit except by luck.

"Aside from combat, the long free-fall may have its occasional advantages, as perhaps in the case of a plane out of control and falling: if the aviator pulled his rip cord at once, the 'chute might become tangled in the wreck and prove useless.

"I might say that, while you are falling free through the air, your speed is so great that you have virtually no control over the movements and position of your body. The only way to control yourself at all, so far as I've been able to discover, is by kicking your feet a little. Further, there's no part of the body that seems naturally inclined to fall first. I have come down with my face to the ground; with my back to the ground, spinning head over heels; lying on my side and rolling over and over like a log—in fact, in almost every conceivable position.

"Parachute harness is designed in such a way as to hurt the jumper as little as possible when the 'chute opens. Broad strips fasten around the shoulders and legs, and scatter the strain, though the shoulders have to bear the brunt of it. There is bound to be some jar, especially if you fall free for some distance. Figure it out: At the moment of opening, you may be traveling at the rate of a hundred or more feet per second (better than sixty miles per hour, express-train speed!), and suddenly, in about the twenty-fifth part of a second, your speed is checked to approximately sixteen feet per second (a little above ten miles per hour). I have come down when my shoulders were covered with blood from the jerk.

"The position of the body when the 'chute opens makes a difference in how you feel the jar. If you're on your back and the 'chute comes up through your legs, you're due to turn a sudden flipflop—crack your toe nails, we say. If the 'chute comes up over your head, you'll stretch your neck a mile; and if your mouth happens to be open, your teeth will snap together so hard you can feel it all the way down your spine.

"On the jump when I fell free for the longest distance—fourteen hundred feet—before opening my 'chute, I didn't get much of a jar, but some other things did happen that I considered pretty unpleasant. A regular parachute circus had been arranged to celebrate Navy Day. The exhibition was held at North Island and widely heralded.

"Seven of us were to jump simultaneously from three planes: three sailors from a De Haviland, two from a Douglas, a marine named M. L. Harrison, and myself, from a Martin bomber.

"The three planes were to circle around together and head into the wind in formation across the field. The De Haviland, however, had some trouble getting into position; that was the first incident that balled things up. A few seconds later the second plane caught fire, and the pilot had to side-slip to extinguish it.

"I sat watching the men on the other planes, and especially the burning plane, to see whether they got into the air safely, and so was a little late getting ready to jump myself. I gave the pilot the signal to cut the gun. For some reason, perhaps due to misunderstood signals, he failed to do it. I had asked him before leaving the ground whether he'd ever taken up parachute jumpers before; he said he had, so I presumed he knew that the pilot always cuts the gun before a jump, to prevent the terrific propeller blast from striking the jumper.

"Harrison, seeing that the pilot wasn't going to do it, jumped anyhow: he told me later that when he hit the propeller blast, it felt as if a mule had kicked him in the seat of the pants. I waited a little, thinking I could make the pilot understand; and when I couldn't, I jumped too. By that time we were 'way beyond where I had meant to jump, and I saw, if I wasn't awful lucky, I'd probably land in the bay, which made me pretty goaty.

"NOW, I had intended all along to fall a long ways before opening my 'chute, but not quite so far as I did. I was just reaching for the rip cord, when something came up and hit me under the chin: it was my chest pack, the reserve 'chute. The belt was loose, and had allowed the whole thing to work up. I tried hurriedly to shove it back in place—and all the time, of course, I was falling.

"I had six hundred feet to go, and was eating up distance at the rate of two hundred feet per second, when I finally pulled the cord and opened her up. That's about as far, I guess, as anybody up to that time ever did fall, who lived to tell about it. People had thought such a thing was impossible; they said that a man falling so far, and at such a velocity, would be unable to breathe, and would suffocate; however, I experienced nothing of the kind.

"That jump was not finished, however, when I opened my 'chute. I saw I was dropping directly into the bay, as I had feared, and there was no help for it. So I got my hands on the snaps, and the minute we struck water, I freed myself from the 'chute.

"There is considerable danger in landing in rough water with a parachute. If you happen to fall in the trough of a wave,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"THIS IS WHY"

SAID THE MAITRE D'HOTEL

"You ask me why we always serve Heinz Tomato Ketchup," said the Maitre d'Hotel. "Well, I'll tell you, sir. The fact is that a bottle of Heinz Ketchup on our table is one of the best advertisements we have for the high standard of our restaurant. It's the best Ketchup, you know —always the same. It is the flavor that counts, that's why."

* * *

But what our good friend perhaps didn't know, was the real "why" of that flavor—an intriguing compliment to your appetite. It doesn't just "happen"—be sure of that.

With Heinz Ketchup it begins with the pedigreed seed we plant ourselves in our own greenhouses. And with the care with which the plants are grown right up to the exact day of harvest when the vine-ripened tomatoes go straight into our gleaming Kitchens set beside the gardens themselves, so that freshness is a part of flavor.

Add choicest spices brought from distant spice countries by our own buyers—and exacting care at every step—and there you are—true Heinz flavor in every bottle. Little wonder the Maitre d'Hotel says it is flavor that counts—and that the flavor of this Ketchup is always the same, a flavor which has long made it the best selling Ketchup all over the world • H. J. HEINZ COMPANY

HEINZ 57

AND REMEMBER—ALL HEINZ 57 VARIETIES ARE REASONABLE IN PRICE

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

100

Camel

The most popular cigarette in the United States

Quality put it there—quality keeps it there. Camel smokers are not concerned and need not be concerned with anything but the pleasure of smoking.

If all cigarettes were as good as Camel you wouldn't hear anything about special treatments to make cigarettes good for the throat. Nothing takes the place of choice tobaccos.

© 1927, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Winston-Salem, N. C.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

and the 'chute lands on the crest of another wave that is moving toward you, the fabric may get washed over your head and the ropes entangle you so badly that you'll smother and drown before you can work yourself free. So I struck out swimming almost as soon as we touched water. I saw I was going to be safe, so I grabbed the ropes and pulled for shore, dragging the 'chute after me.

"As I got inshore I found myself in an ugly mess of grease and oil collected on top of the water from the boats. I dragged myself and the 'chute through it all, and when I got in front of the hangars where the crowd was, I was goatier than ever and couldn't see anything funny in the performance; but the people roared at sight of me. I was black from head to heels, and my hair was so full of the stuff that it stood straight up.

"That 'chute, I supposed at the time, was ruined. But I scrubbed it with gasolene and every other cleaning preparation I could think of, and got it about as good as new. I have used it several times since and can't seem to wear it out with the severest tests—once I dropped it from a plane with a four-hundred-pound weight attached, and it floated to earth as pretty as you please.

"THE modern parachute generally works. Once in a long while a man does come down in one which for some reason—either because he is too excited to pull the rip cord, or because the 'chute was improperly folded, or for some other reason—fails to open.

"But such chances grow less and less with each improvement in design. The modern 'chute of habutai silk, a beautiful thing as it unfolds in the air, light, yet stronger than canvas, and simple to the last degree, is many times faster and surer in operation than its predecessors of ten or even five years ago. It is provided with a supplementary, or pilot 'chute, attached at the vent at the top. This pilot 'chute, being small, opens first, and helps the big one to open.

"The vent at the top of the 'chute is a small hole surrounded by a circular patch of rubberized material and fitted with an elastic draw-string. Its purpose is to take care of stresses and strains at the moment the parachute opens.

"A parachute man has to keep himself in pretty good physical condition at all times, but especially at the time of a jump. I can imagine that to anybody with a weak heart the shock might prove fatal. But otherwise, anybody can jump safely if the need arises. Usually, for a meal or two before a jump, I eat lightly. But even with this precaution there was one time when I went into the air feeling so groggy, physically, that it is something of a miracle how I got through as well as I did. This was at Tucson, Arizona, last year at a spot-jumping contest.

"In spot-jumping they mark off a circle about twenty-five feet in diameter on the landing field. You're supposed to jump and see how near you can come to hitting the circle. Four army men were entered in the Tucson contest, besides myself for the marines. It fell to my lot to make the first jump, which is the worst, because the others can see where you take off and what happens, and plan their own jumps accordingly.

"Marine Gunner Michael Wodarczyk was my pilot, and I was jumping from the rear cockpit of a two-seater plane. You can't carry on much of a conversation in a plane, because of the racket, so we had arranged that when I was ready to jump, I would give Wodarczyk the signal by a slap on the shoulder. We got about where I wanted to be, and I gave a slap. Nothing happened: the gun wasn't cut. It took a moment or so for me to realize that I hadn't slapped the gunner at all, but the windshield in front of me; but when I did realize it, I stood up and gave him a slap which nearly dislocated his shoulder. And by way of getting even, he cut the gun so suddenly that I almost fell out before I wanted to.

"I never remember being so sick as during the minute or so it took to reach the ground. I lost everything I had on my stomach, and fell farther than I meant to before opening the 'chute. And when I reached the ground, I landed so hard on my back that it knocked me out for nearly ten minutes.

"While coming down, I had an experience the like of which I never had before or since, and due in part, I suppose, to my being ill and half-dazed. I was still perhaps five hundred feet off the ground. Suddenly I heard a curious, wee sound like trumpets or church bells. Incidentally, the absolute silence in the air is one of the most impressive things about parachute work. You leave the deafening racket of the plane and drop into an absolute silence like nothing you ever experienced. I noticed it appallingly the first jump I ever made, and never have failed to notice it since.

"Well, as I said, I was about five hundred feet up when I heard this peculiar hum. For a moment, I actually thought the bells of heaven were ting-a-linging for me. In a few seconds more, coming closer to ground, I realized what it was. Automobiles parked all around the field were full of people watching the exhibition, and drivers were honking their horns by way of applause.

"I won second place in the contest, for in spite of my illness I landed about ninety paces from the white spot.

"THE biggest thrill and worst scare I ever got out of parachute jumping was the five minutes or so I spent in the air above Yosemite. That jump was a sort of semi-official stunt pulled off in October, 1926, by government men at the request of one of the moving picture news services. It seemed to be the thrillingest thing they could think of just then, and I was picked as the jumper, and for pilot, Captain H. Denny Campbell, winner of the 1926 Schiff Trophy for the largest number of hours in the air without an accident.

"We went to the Yosemite about a week ahead of time to look at the country and map out our program. I think it must be the prettiest scenery in the world up there. Mountains! And trees—boy those are trees!

"We found only one place free enough of trees so that I might land: Leidig Meadows, they call it, and I should judge it doesn't contain more than four or five acres altogether. That's a pretty small amount of ground to aim for, when you're five thousand feet in the air (the elevation we figured I'd jump from), especially when

Gets New Customers
~Holds Old Ones

QUICK delivery is in demand today and the business house that offers it — and advertises it—gets preference.

In forty-eight lines of business the Harley-Davidson ¼-ton Package Truck is cutting costs and building trade.

In many cases it has replaced light cars and bicycles or supplemented trucks—making far more trips per day — extending trading areas and saving two-thirds of operating costs.

"First through traffic"—safe—easily handled and can always be parked at the delivery point. A striking advertisement of quick service — anywhere.

Let your local Harley-Davidson dealer show you how the Package Truck will fit into your delivery work and pay a profit.

Mail coupon for illustrated literature.

HARLEY-DAVIDSON MOTOR CO.
Department AM, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Special and Stock Bodies to Meet Your Requirements.

Special body — for dairy company. Ample capacity for rush deliveries. A most attractive advertisement.

HARLEY-DAVIDSON
[¼ Ton Capacity] Package Truck
PER 3¢ MILE

Mail this Coupon!

HARLEY-DAVIDSON MOTOR CO.
Dept. AM Milwaukee, Wis.
Send illustrated literature on your Package Truck.

Name
Address
Business

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Vigorous hands like its strength. Lithe hands like its instant response. All hands like the work done by Dixon's "Ti-con-der-oga"

It is America's favorite five-cent pencil.

© 1928

DIXON
"TI-CON-DER-OGA"
An extraordinary five cent pencil

Made in the U. S. A. by JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE COMPANY
Pencil Dept. 161-J Jersey City, New Jersey

you don't have any idea what tricky air currents you're going to bump into.

"On the morning of October 6th we took the air according to schedule. There were two planes, the one I rode in, Captain Campbell piloting, and the other with the camera men.

"The floor of the Yosemite Valley is about four thousand feet above sea level. We flew five thousand feet higher than that, nine thousand altogether, and at that elevation it was bitterly cold. We had to circle around the peaks for nearly half an hour while the camera men got the pictures they wanted.

"Captain Campbell then flew straight across the Leidig Meadows, as planned; but the air proved so treacherous and uncertain that I knew I never could make it that way. Next, he turned and came up the valley, following rather closely the line of the river, which makes a double curve, like the letter S. Still I couldn't make it, so he turned and went back down. I rather think the captain had concluded I wasn't going to jump; but I never yet have gone up in a plane intending to jump, and come down without jumping.

"The last time, selecting a place that seemed as favorable as any, I gave the signal and slipped over the side. When I left, I was so cold that my teeth chattered. In much less than two minutes, sweat was pouring off me. I never spent five minutes so busily before or since. For the first time in my life, too, I realized, as I left the ship, how fast a man falls. We were about level with the top of the peaks when I jumped. In a flash, the tops were streaking away into the sky.

"AS SOON as I opened the 'chute, I was caught in an air current that started to carry me straight toward El Capitan, a great peak. I knew if I struck that, I'd never reach the earth alive. Right away I reached up and began climbing the ropes on the off side of the parachute. That brought that side down, of course, and made the whole 'chute skitter off, as I hoped it would.

"Then another air current caught the 'chute and sent it off in an entirely new direction. This time I was taken over a section of country where there were piles of jagged rocks and trees; they didn't look so good to come down in, but perhaps were a little preferable to El Capitan.

"Again I tried tricks with the 'chute (you can't do a whole lot to guide it, but you can do a little), and once more I was caught by a new air current and taken in an entirely different direction. This time I saw myself headed for the worst place of all: a big patch of those giant trees, but deadened—their bare limbs stuck out jagged and threatening every which way. I knew if I landed there, one limb would probably slice off an arm, another a leg, and by the time I reached solid ground, Arch Atherton, as such, would be practically non-existent!

"NOW, I was wearing both parachutes, the back pack and the chest pack, and I had warned the pilots that if they saw me open my second 'chute, they might know I was having trouble with air currents. With those jagged trees coming closer every second, I figured that the second parachute, if I opened it, might serve as a sort of brake at least, and maybe enable me to land clear of the trees: there was a little open place about as big as a room, which I thought I might be able to hit.

"So I opened the second 'chute, and, fortunately, it did what I wanted it to. But, better still, another change of air currents took me in a new direction, carrying me over the river.

"I finally landed in ice-cold mountain water, but in a nice shallow place maybe ten feet from shore; my 'chutes, of course, had to fall the wrong way, into the water!

"The first thing I did, with solid ground under my feet again, was to let out one gosh-awful Indian war whoop! I dragged both 'chutes up on a rock, waved my arms as a signal to the pilots that I was all right, then walked into the woods and turned a couple of handsprings, and sat down to wait for the crowd to come and get me.

"That was the first parachute jump into the Yosemite, and if people will take my advice, it ought to be the last, at least by premeditation. The air currents around those crags simply can't be figured beforehand, and they're entirely too treacherous to make a safe descent anything short of a miracle."

War Drums

(Continued from page 59)

a wide circle under the far-spaced trees.

Some still sat their horses; others had dismounted; one pock-marked, earringed seaman, his head swathed in a silken yellow scarf, sprawled at full length on the ground, his villainous face supported in cupped hands.

None knew it, but Mr. Francis O'Sullivan was praying. His smooth pink cheeks had lost none of their pink and, as always, he smiled while he fought; but his heart was solemn within him, for he knew that in a dozen years he had faced no such swordsman as this.

He knew that his was the greater skill, the more consummate artistry; but he knew, also, that the difference was very slight, so slight that Falcon's longer reach and greater height atoned for it. And while Mr. O'Sullivan prayed, he schemed and studied and calculated, his thoughts reaching into the future, even while his hand and eye dealt with the deadly, imminent present. Barring some accident, some unlikely mischance, the victory would come, he believed, to him whose endurance met the test. On this theory he based his battle.

For those who looked on, the world 'round about them had ceased to exist. To Jock Pearson, to Ugly Meg, to the pack-horse drivers, it had seemed at first an unequal combat. They knew nothing of the art of the sword. They saw a tall, powerful man, a seasoned soldier, bronzed and arrogant and thewed like Jock Pearson himself—great of shoulder yet slim of waist and clean of limb—matched against a small, plump, white-haired, woman-voiced gentleman, who might

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

To the man who is 35 and DISSATISFIED

WE DELIBERATELY pass over a large proportion of the readers of the American Magazine in order to address this page directly to men in their thirties.

There is a powerful reason for this.

The dissatisfied man of twenty-five is not usually in a difficult position. He has few responsibilities; he can move easily; he can take a chance.

But from thirty-five to forty is the age of crisis. In these years a man either marks out the course which leads to definite advancement or settles into permanent unhappiness. There are thousands who see the years passing with a feeling close to desperation.

They say

"I must make more money," but they have no plan for making more.

"There is no future for me," but they see no other opening.

"I am managing to scrape along now, but how in the world will I ever educate my children?"

To men whose minds are constantly—and often almost hopelessly—at work on such thoughts, this page is addressed. It is devoid of rhetoric. It is plain, blunt common sense.

Let us get one thing straight at the very start—

We do not want you unless you want us

There is the dissatisfied man who will do something, and the one who won't. We feel sorry for the latter, but we cannot afford to enrol him. We have a reputation for training men who—as a result of our training—earn large salaries and hold responsible positions. That reputation must be maintained. We can do much, but we cannot make a man succeed who will not help himself. So rest assured you will not be unduly urged into anything.

Now what can happen to

A dissatisfied man who acts?

We wish we could answer that question by letting you read the letters that come to us in every mail. Here is one, for example—from Victor F. Stine of Hagerstown, Md. "I was floundering around without a definite goal," he says, "and was seriously considering a Civil Service appointment." (You can tell from that how hopeless he was. A Civil Service appointment means a few thousand dollars a year for life.)

"The study of the Course and Service was not a hardship," he continues, "rather it was a real pleasure because it is so practical and inspiring thruout." (The method of the Course makes it practical and inspiring. We teach business not alone thru study but thru practice. You learn executive thinking by meeting executive problems and making executive decisions.) "Added self-confidence and increased vision gained from the Course," says Mr. Stine, "enabled me to accept and discharge added responsibilities successfully."

He is Secretary now of the organization in which he was then a dissatisfied cog.

Forging Ahead in Business

For a man like Mr. Stine we can achieve really great results. By learning, thru the Modern Business Course and Service, the necessary fundamental facts of all departments of business, he insures his success. His judgment, his value, increase. The closed roads open. The worries disappear.

We attach a coupon to this advertisement. It is a little thing, but our experience proves that it separates out of every hundred readers the few who can act. If you are one of these let us mail you that wonderful little book, "Forging Ahead in Business." For thousands it has turned dissatisfaction into immediate progress.

Alexander Hamilton Institute

Executive Training for Business Men

IN CANADA, address the Alexander Hamilton Institute, Limited, C. P. R. Bldg., Toronto

IN ENGLAND, 67 Great Russell St., London
IN AUSTRALIA, 11c Castlereagh St., Sydney

ALEXANDER HAMILTON INSTITUTE
477 Astor Place New York City

Send me the new revised edition of "Forging Ahead in Business," which I may keep without charge.

Signature.....
Please write plainly
Business Address.....

.....

Business Position.....

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Build and Save The ALADDIN Readi-cut Way

You can buy all the materials for a complete home direct from the ALADDIN mills, and make big savings on the lumber, millwork, hardware and labor.

$997

7 ROOMS
All Materials Readi-Cut
2 floor plans. Living room, dining room, kitchen, three bedrooms, bath, closets.

Save 18% LUMBER WASTE 30% LABOR COST

The Aladdin system prepares all the lumber in our mills cut-to-fit and ready to be nailed in place. Quantity production of standard designs, with no lumber waste, allows us to quote the very low prices we do, and still maintain the High Quality materials Aladdin homes are noted for.

$498

5 ROOMS
All Materials Readi-Cut
4 floor plans. Living room, dining room, kitchen, two bedrooms. Any handy man can erect an Aladdin house.

Prices Include

Lumber cut-to-fit; highest grade knotless, interior woodwork; beautiful, clear siding; flooring; windows, doors; glass; paints; hardware; nails; lath; shingles or roofing; together with complete instructions and drawings that make it easy for anyone familiar with tools to erect an Aladdin home.

$1589

9 ROOMS
All Materials Readi-cut
Reception hall, large living room, dining room, kitchen, breakfast nook, four bedrooms, clothes closets, and bath. See descriptions in FREE catalog.

We Pay Freight

We guarantee safe arrival of complete materials and PAY FREIGHT. You take absolutely no chance in dealing with the Aladdin Company.

$689

6 ROOMS
All Materials Readi-Cut
Three excellent plans. Can be built with or without fire place.

Prompt Delivery

Complete shipment of all materials can be made within a few days after order is received. Aladdin's 22 years' success is proof that you can do as thousands of other home-builders do every year—SAVE money, time and annoyance by building an Aladdin home.

$815

6 ROOMS
All Materials Readi-Cut
4 plans. Living room, dining room, kitchen, three bedrooms or 2 bedrooms and bath.

FREE CATALOG

Write today for your Free copy of the handsomely illustrated Aladdin Catalog. It is just off the press and presents many new types of modern homes, garages and summer cottages—33 styles with 99 different floor plans for you to choose from! Address nearest mill TODAY, asking for catalog No. 104.

THE ALADDIN CO., Bay City, Michigan
Wilmington, N. C., Portland, Ore., Toronto, Ont.

have been a lawyer's clerk or a minister of the Gospel.

To them it appeared that only one ending was possible. And the first stage of the fight had served to confirm their judgment, for at the outset Falcon took the offensive, driving his antagonist before him.

But there were more practiced eyes than those in that circle of spectators. Falcon's men knew a swordsman when they saw one, and the blades had scarcely crossed before those veterans gave O'Sullivan his due. It was then that he of the yellow scarf and the earrings stretched himself upon the ground to rest his limbs while he watched. He counted himself a connoisseur, this pock-marked cutthroat, and he saw this fight as no three-minute affair.

A HORROR came upon Meg Pearson. It drove the color from her furrowed cheeks and set her limbs shaking. It was a horror of the swords. Like serpents' tongues they were, the darting, flickering tongues of deadly serpents. She could not get the thought out of her head; it possessed her utterly, and turned her blood to icy water.

To Meg there was something in the spectacle which was like black magic. The deadly, flickering serpent tongues struck and struck, yet could not find their mark. Death rode on those flashing points, but some incomprehensible wizardry defied the death that rode there. It was necromancy; it smacked of the supernatural, and her horror grew. But to the pock-faced pirate, stretched upon the ground, his puckered eyes appraising every thrust and parry, it was not necromancy, it was not horrible. On the contrary, it was divinely beautiful. He reveled in the most perfect display of swordsmanship that he had ever seen.

In truth, there was much that was beautiful about that fight.

There was its almost flawless artistry, the art of the rapier in its most perfect consummation. There was Falcon's strength and grace, which was like the terrible, beautiful, smooth strength and grace of the royal tiger. There was O'Sullivan's deftness and quickness and lightness, which somehow brought to mind a swallow on the wing. And there was another beautiful thing about it—it was a gentlemen's fight. Once Falcon backed against a pine trunk, and his opponent could have killed him. Once O'Sullivan stumbled on a tussock of grass and was for an instant at Falcon's mercy. But neither blade struck home.

A time came when Meg Pearson knew somehow—though how she knew it she could not tell—that the crisis was near. It was, perhaps, that mysterious prevision which is granted to some when tragedy impends. She knew it, and that was all; but while she knew mysteriously that the end was at hand, she did not know what that end would be.

There was no perceptible change. Both were tired, but one seemed no wearier than the other. They fought as they had been fighting for an eternity—warily, carefully, circling each other like panthers, advancing, retreating; retreating, advancing; feinting, thrusting, parrying, eye to eye and blade to blade.

Yet, while in this sense there was no change, there was something new that now made its presence felt, a subtle, invisible thing, but very real—an intenser deadliness.

Meg felt it first, perhaps because she was a woman, but soon there were others who felt it also. The pock-marked, earringed pirate felt it, and his avid eyes glittered with a more savage light; and somehow that mysterious knowledge, which none could question, although there was no palpable thing on which to base it, spread from man to man until all that eager circle of spectators possessed it, and eyes widened and lips tightened as they awaited the end that was coming soon.

It came; and there was forewarning of it; but none in the circle caught the warning. They lived for nothing in that moment except the spectacle before them. Their whole being was concentrated in their eyes; all their other senses were dulled.

In the woods to the west an owl hooted; in the woods to the east another answered it. Jock Pearson and Ugly Meg, his wife, were old in the ways of the woods, and there were good woodsmen among the pack drivers. All must have heard the two owls hoot, but none was aware of the sound. In that moment of tense, taut expectation, with the climax of the drama at hand, none wondered why it was that owls were hooting in the broad light of day.

A minute passed. They no longer circled each other like panthers. They fought now as though they were rooted to the ground. The darting swords were like living light. O'Sullivan's smile had become a ghastly grin and his pink cheeks had turned gray. Falcon's face was haggard and drawn; his eyes were like those of a madman; in his forehead a great vein bulged and pumped.

Close at hand, an owl hooted again. And instantly at that signal the empty forest sprang to life.

Meg Pearson heard the whine of an arrow passing close above her shoulder. Before she could turn her head, a rifle shot shattered the silence, another and another, and all at once the air was thick with arrows raining in from every side.

Then bedlam broke—a bedlam of yells and savage, ear-splitting whoops. It was as though the forest itself had gone suddenly mad, for, though jets of flame and puffs of smoke were visible amid the trees, no foeman showed himself.

Meg knew in an instant that all was lost. She felt a stinging pain in her shoulder. She saw men pitch from their plunging horses. She saw Jock Pearson rise in his stirrups and wrench a long shaft out of his side. She heard him shout, "Ride for it, Meg! They've done me." She saw him sway drunkenly in his saddle, then fall. In an instant she was on the ground beside him, her hand on his heart; and in another instant she was in the saddle again.

O'SULLIVAN heard her voice above the tumult, pitiful and shrill and frenzied, crying out, "They've killed my Jock!"

He saw her wheel her plunging horse and dash straight into the forest to the right where the war whoops were loudest, and where now he could see naked brown forms flitting here and there amid the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

CORONA in colors!

[Channel blue]

CORONA has caught the colorful spirit of modern times! Scarlet, blue, green, maroon, cream, lavender—there is a Corona for every decorative scheme. (And, of course, the standard black Corona.) When you buy Corona, you know you are getting the utmost value in portable typewriters—the only portable with a twenty-year record of satisfactory performance. More Coronas are in use than all other makes of portables combined. See these new colored Coronas at the nearest Corona store. Convenient payment plan.

Write us for a free copy of this new folder showing the new Duco finish Coronas in actual colors.

L C Smith—the Ball-Bearing Office Machine. Its light touch and easy action increase output, eliminate fatigue.

L C Smith & Corona Typewriters Inc
Established 1903

Sales offices in principal cities of the world
202 E. Washington Street, Syracuse, N. Y.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Fight gum troubles before they start!

IT is our diet that undermines the health of our gums. For our food, dentists point out, is too soft, too quickly eaten, to impart to our gums the stimulation that should keep them robust.

That, briefly, is why gums soften, weaken and lose their tone. "Pink tooth brush," the earliest sign of gingival breakdown, is often a warning of serious troubles to come.

How Ipana and massage keep gums firm and healthy

Gum disorders are stubborn—difficult to deal with, once they gain a foothold. Yet, fortunately, they are often quite easy to prevent.

Dentists recommend massage—a gentle frictionizing of the gums, with the brush or with the fingers. And because of its content of ziratol, a preparation very beneficial to the gums, thousands of dentists direct their patients to use Ipana Tooth Paste—for the gum massage as well as for the brushing of their teeth.

Test Ipana for thirty days

You'll find Ipana's taste a treat to your palate. And its power to clean and whiten your teeth will delight you. The ten-day trial tube will readily prove these things.

But the better plan is to start at once with a full-size tube from the druggist's. Use it faithfully for one month, and see how your gums, too, improve in firmness and in health!

IPANA TOOTH PASTE

BRISTOL-MYERS CO., Dept. J-28
73 West Street, New York, N. Y.
Kindly send me a trial tube of IPANA TOOTH PASTE. Enclosed is a two-cent stamp to cover partly the cost of packing and mailing.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

© B.-M. Co., 1927

tree trunks. He saw her hurl her rifle from her as she galloped on, and snatch her tomahawk from her belt. Then a strong hand grasped him from behind and pulled him down upon the ground.

Half-lying, half-kneeling, he twisted his body sideways and saw Falcon lying beside him close to a fallen horse. He heard Falcon's voice whisper hoarsely, "Lie still, old swordsman," felt Falcon's heavy hand upon his back, pressing and holding him down. Four dead men lay near him; five riderless horses milled about or stood staring, their nostrils wide.

Down the Path he heard a thunder of hoof beats and, raising his head a little, he saw horsemen galloping away in the direction of Charles Town, while behind them the Path was filled with plumed and painted warriors, yelling like mad, and in the woods at either side other warriors fired at the fugitives.

A mental numbness came over him as he lay watching the pursuit. He was aware of a strange indifference, as though he were a mere spectator at a show. In the midst of this he heard Falcon's voice speaking very calmly.

"Eh, pedagogue," the voice said. "D'ye hear me, man?"

O'Sullivan nodded.

"They think we're dead," Falcon continued quickly; "but in a minute they'll be back for our scalps. My horse bolted, but the big roan yonder will carry my weight. You try for the gray. If you get him, ride up the Path and ride hard. Ready? Now, go!"

In the same instant they leaped to their feet and dashed for the horses; and behind them immediately a wild whoop rang out, followed by a fierce chorus of yells and a scattered volley of shots.

The big roan was Jock Pearson's horse, a veteran of the wilderness, trained to stand where his rider left him. Falcon reached him, grasped the bridle, swung to his back, raced up the Path. The gray horse jerked his head aside as O'Sullivan sprang for the bridle rein, reared, and trotted out of reach.

Beyond the gray stood quietly a sorrel Chickasaw pony which had belonged to one of Pearson's pack drivers, while beyond him again the laden ponies of the pack train snorted and tossed their heads. O'Sullivan knew that the sorrel was his only hope. The yells behind him were louder, nearer; but there were no more shots, and in an instant he understood why.

IN FRONT of him and to his right, a naked warrior came leaping straight toward him, a long-shafted steel tomahawk in his lifted right hand, a rifle in his left. His high head-dress of eagle feathers, the elaborate pattern of his black and vermilion paint proclaimed his exalted rank.

At twenty paces he hurled the tomahawk. It whirled through the air, a streak of bluish light, so swiftly that the eye could not see the revolving handle.

Yet it was no swifter than Falcon's rapier thrusts had been; and O'Sullivan was ready for it. He felt the wind of it as the steel hatchet blade cleft the air where a fraction of a second before his head had been. He was down on his hands and knees when the tomahawk passed over him. He had scarcely regained his feet when the tall Indian, leaping onward at full speed, spitted himself upon O'Sullivan's sword.

The Chickasaw pony still stood where he had been standing, ears back, tail twitching, fidgeting a little, but too well trained to bolt. O'Sullivan was an indifferent horseman, but agile as a cat. With yells and whoops ringing in his ears, with bullets and arrows singing past him, his foot fumbled at the stirrup; yet somehow he got himself on the horse's back, and by some miracle no missile touched him as the pony raced away up the Path.

IT HAD been quick work. Since their dash for the horses scarcely two minutes had elapsed. The sorrel was faster than the roan and bore a lighter load. Not long after the whoops behind him had died away, O'Sullivan saw Falcon in the Path ahead, riding hard, his chin over his shoulder.

At sight of O'Sullivan he checked the roan's stride slightly until the other was close behind him; then for two miles or so they pushed on at a swinging gallop. At last Falcon reined in. As O'Sullivan ranged abreast of him, the Irishman spoke:

"Captain Falcon," he said, "if you had not pulled me down upon the ground, Francis O'Sullivan would be a dead man now. Some day, God willing, I'll repay the debt!"

Falcon's strong teeth gleamed under his mustache.

"You owe me nothing," he replied gruffly. "If I had not pulled you down, Lance Falcon would be a dead man too. I saved you to save my own scalp, which was already wriggling on my head, and which still feels none too secure, because I know not the ways of this heathen-infested wilderness."

"Nor I," said O'Sullivan, "but, by Paul, I can learn!"

"It means, I take it," Falcon continued, "that the Cherokee rising has come. They are between us and the town. We cannot win back to the coast. We must—"

With an oath, he jerked his horse back upon his haunches.

"Sangre de dios!" he cried. "We are cut off!"

In the Path ahead stood a tall Indian, a rifle in his hand, the other held high, palm outward.

"The Lord has His eyes upon us," said O'Sullivan quietly. "To us poor babes in the wilderness a guide has been granted. It is Lachlan's man, Striking Hawk!"

(To be continued)

RAMON NOVARRO, whose great picture "Ben Hur" has made his name almost a household word to movie fans, is much more than an undeniably handsome young man. Mary B. Mullett, who interviewed him, was astounded at what she found in him. He gave her one of the greatest surprises of her life, and she has interviewed hundreds of famous people. What was it that she found that amazed her, so? Next month you will have the pleasure of discovering the surprise for yourself.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A SIGN OF MOTORING SAFETY

—the Firestone Name! A name to be trusted because it is the name of the maker and signifies the Word of Honor in Tires. It assures motorists the present-day peak of tire performance; the highest degree of safety, comfort and long mileage. It signifies, above all, a continuation of Quality and is the proof of personal integrity which demands that, whenever there is found a way to make a better tire—it will be a Firestone.

The Mark of Quality

MOST MILES PER DOLLAR

Firestone

AMERICANS SHOULD PRODUCE THEIR OWN RUBBER

Harvey S. Firestone

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The clerk whose name will live forever

TWO MEN lived in the same town a century ago; they knew the same people and had an equal chance in life.

One spent all his spare hours in idle talk or with the daily paper; he knew nothing beyond the day's news. The other brought to every subject a wealth of sidelight and illustration that kindled the interest of men and women, no matter where he went.

The name of the first man has long since been forgotten; the name of the other, the humble clerk in a country store, will live forever.

He talked like a man who had traveled, though his travels were confined to a few backwoods counties. He knew something of history and biography, of the work of great philosophers, poets and dramatists.

His Secret Given to You

What was the secret of his wide range of knowledge? How can a man who must work every day in a routine job find time to make himself so interesting to other men and women?

The answer is found in every biography, every anecdote of that greatest clerk. He owned a few great books and, in the odd moments between customers' calls, he read them systematically. It was the influence of those books that gave his mind its start; then lifted his eyes beyond the horizon of a backwoods town. Before he was fifty, the whole nation knew the name and acknowledged the power of that humble, unschooled man. His name was Abraham Lincoln.

What are the few great mind-building books? There is no more important question for you to ask yourself. It is answered in the free book that tells the scope and plan of Dr. Eliot, from his lifetime of training men for success—forty years as President of Harvard—selected the few great books that contain the essentials of all books—the "essentials," as he says, "of a liberal education."

Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books

(The Harvard Classics)

Send for this FREE booklet that gives Dr. Eliot's own plan of reading.

Your Reading Problem Solved by Dr. Eliot

Discarding all the books that waste your time, he combined these few great volumes together into a rounded library; he arranged them with reading courses and footnotes so that even in 15 minutes of pleasant reading a day a man may master them.

Think of it—the knowledge of literature and life, the broad cultural viewpoint that every university strives to give—these may be yours in the pleasant spare moments of your active days. Make yourself a bigger, more interesting man or woman this year. Send for "Fifteen Minutes a Day."

"For me," wrote one man who had sent in the coupon, "your little free book meant a big step forward, and it showed me besides the way to a vast new world of pleasure."

Every reader of this page is invited to have a copy of this handsome and entertaining little book.

Reading is an essential part of every human life, and good books made the best reading. Since 1875, P. F. Collier & Son Company has not only published good books, but has brought them within reach of all by the Collier plan, which enables you to pay for them while you are enjoying them.

Since 1875 COLLIER Good Books

MAIL THE COUPON TODAY

P. F. Collier & Son Company
250 Park Avenue, New York City

By mail, free, send me the booklet that tells all about the most famous library in the world, describing Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics), and containing the plan of reading recommended by Dr. Eliot. Also please advise how I may secure the books by small monthly payments.

NAME { Mr. Mrs. Miss .....

ADDRESS.....

The publishers cannot undertake to send the book free to children. 6010-HCB-L

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Dead Broke

(Continued from page 34)

shake off the effects of the experience. I also mean those who were pulled ashore by some helping hand, and who henceforth make scant effort to swim, relying on continued assistance to get themselves dragged to safety.

That is the black peril of dead-brokeness: one has a tendency to sink to a lower and fouler level; from being dead broke to being a dead beat.

Said a cynically big-hearted financier (the aphorism is credited to old J. Pierpont Morgan):

"Any man is worth helping, once. But the man who needs help a second time isn't worth helping at all."

Think it over. The speech holds ten times as much sense as cynicism.

As I translate its meaning, any man may once in his life get into such financial difficulties that he cannot possibly get out of them without aid. But if he is lifted to safety he lives and toils and plans, henceforth, so that he can never again be caught in the same quagmire.

And his own bitter experience will make him willing to help the next man who is mired as he himself was; and the chain of mutual helpfulness and of sympathetic understanding passes on to infinity.

ON THE other hand, there is many a man who, lifted to his feet from the slough of dead-brokeness, seems to say:

"I owe myself a good time to make up for all I've been through; and to make me forget my past poverty. Besides, I've just found that there will always be someone to lend me a hand, if ever again I get in the same hole."

Such a man is well on the road to Dead Beat Land. Such a man is morally certain to go dead broke again. Such a man, as the financier declared, "isn't worth helping at all."

By the way, I had one experience of my own (only a bush league little experience) at being a dead beat. I did it very badly, as you will see.

In those early days I used to breakfast, when my cash was low—and it usually was—at a creamery near Gramercy Park. One day while I was in there I heard a customer ask the proprietor, as he took his meal check to the desk:

"Got change for a ten-dollar bill?"

"No," said the proprietor. "I am always short of change at this time of morning. Pay next time you come in."

A week later (it was the Monday morning after my experience with the hag who made me a Momentary Millionaire for fifteen cents), I hit on a glittering scheme to get my breakfast on credit. I went into the creamery and ate an unusually hearty morning meal. Then I strolled over to the desk, with one hand in my cash pocket.

"Got change for a twenty-dollar bill?" I demanded of the proprietor.

If he hadn't had change for a ten, it was certain he wouldn't have change for a twenty. I complimented myself on my shrewdness in doubling the former customer's sum. The proprietor looked at me coldly, without replying. Once more,

"—they increase your smoke enjoyment"

A Trick Worth Knowing

Even his stenographer noticed it and commented about it.

"Since you began eating Life Savers between smokes," she ventured slyly, "I notice you don't have the frazzled nerves you used to have after a day of hard smoking."

"They certainly are great between smokes," he grinned. "I wouldn't be without them. Have some?"

* * *

More and more smokers are doing the same thing. We wondered if you knew this about Life Savers, these little candy mints with the hole; how they freshen your mouth between smokes, soothe your nerves and make the next smoke taste so much better.

It's a fact: Life Savers easily double your smoke enjoyment. Their wonderful aromatic flavors freshen your mouth like a good drink of water when you're really thirsty—and steady your nerves for work or play. Once you try them this way between smokes, you'll always have a package handy.

Six flavors are displayed at all good stores: Pep-O-Mint, Wint-O-Green, Cinn-O-Mon, Lic-O-Rice, Cl-O-Ve, Vi-O-Let. Five cents a package.

Eat a few Life Savers between smokes

P. S.
New!
A real life-saver for coughs and colds.
LIFE SAVER MENTHOL COUGH DROPS

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

THIS SHOE MAKES YOUR GOWNS MORE BECOMING!

PRETTY shoes are not enough. Shoes must be more than a fashionable covering for the feet. Unless they help you attain freedom of action, poise and charm, they are not contributing as they should to your appearance.

Thousands of women today wearing the ultra-stylish say that it gives smartness to the entire figure, that it enables them to walk correctly, to move with the fullest freedom and grace. One woman said: "It makes my gowns ever so much more becoming!"

ARCH PRESERVER SHOE

This is the famous shoe that combines the most correct style with complete comfort and healthfulness for the feet. No other shoe can have the same concealed arch bridge, flat inner sole, or metatarsal support, because the basic principles of Arch Preserver Shoe construction are patented.

So much more than foot comfort or foot style. Try a pair of Arch Preserver Shoes and you'll understand.

The Druscilla

There is only one Arch Preserver Shoe. Its principles of construction are fully protected by patents. No shoe is an Arch Preserver Shoe unless stamped with the trade-mark.

ARCH PRESERVER SHOE REG. U.S. PAT. OFFICE "KEEPS THE FOOT WELL"

Send for interesting booklet "Feet—the New Source of Youth and Smartness"

The Selby Shoe Co., 790 Seventh St., Portsmouth, Ohio.

Please send booklet No. A-90, "Feet—the New Source of Youth and Smartness."

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

with as elaborate carelessness as a dry mouth and wet palms could summon, I asked:

"Got change for a twenty-dollar bill?"

"Yes," he made answer; "I have."

"You're a lucky man," I told him. "But you won't have to change it on my account. I haven't got a cent with me."

"Yep," he yawned, "I figgered that out the minute you spoke. That's why I said I had change. I haven't. Chase on, now, and pay me next time. Only don't make any fool cracks like that. You haven't got the sense to get away with it."

Dejectedly, I slunk out of the shop, ridiculously downcast because I lacked even the intelligence to be a dead beat.

FOR it does take a form of keen if perverted intelligence to beat one's way successfully. I recall, for instance, a newspaper artist who came to my desk a few years after that dead-broke era. He began to tell me about his adored wife, who was dangerously ill. In the midst of his story, he broke down and cried. (It is a ghastly sight to see a grown man cry!) Through his sobs he told me he had not money enough to fill a prescription he showed me, for medicine the doctor said his wife must have at once.

He went away, blithering with gratitude, and bearing with him ten ill-spared dollars of mine. Not until months thereafter did I learn he had no wife; and that he made a comfortable side-income by telling the same sob-strangled lie to every new acquaintance. He used even the same prescription each time, to save the price of a new one.

He was but one of countless dead beats I helped to subsidize before the frequency of such appeals made me hard-boiled.

The abominable frequency of dead-beat demands make honest men overwary about helping the few cases of actual need which are brought to their notice. Human nature, in the main, is generous. Human sympathy, in the main, is easily awakened. But when a man has been stung innumerable times by dead beats, he is over-cautious about believing a genuine tale of need, and of giving aid to those whom it could set upon their feet again.

Thus does the dead-broke man, who has degenerated into a dead beat, wrong cruelly the dead-broke man who is honestly striving to get on his feet again.

Out of a hundred hard-luck letters I receive, I think some of them must tell of real need and are from people worth helping. Yet I pay no attention to any of them. I know by experience that the most plausible and pathetic of them are probably from people who least deserve help. The average recipient of such letters feels just as I do about them.

The man who slumps contentedly in the muddy depths is side-tracking assistance from the man who is trying gallantly to get to the surface and to stay there. Also, he is souring one of human nature's most beautiful traits. He has much to answer for. And—in this world, at least—there is not the ghost of a chance of his being forced to answer for it. He has a genius for avoiding consequences.

Here is a true dead-broke yarn, which would make a grand Christmas story, if it were elaborated a bit:

In my reporter days, I knew slightly a struggling young song-writer. He and his wife lived in a tiny elevatorless flat, far up in the Bronx. They were barely able to keep their heads above the debt-sea. Hard working they were; and he had real talent. But the luck was set against them. They used to explain gayly that the only reason they lived on the fifth floor of that liftless house was because there was no sixth floor.

I am going to call him John Jones. His real name is remembered by most of you.

Jones fell ill, with typhoid fever. Now, typhoid emphatically is a rich man's disease. It is no malady for the poor; for it leaves most of its victims weak and flabby in mind and in body for months after it has run its course. Jones was laid by for nine weeks before he was strong enough to get out of doors again.

Meanwhile, every dollar of his ready cash was gone. He faced the world, dead broke. He was still too weak to look for work. But he recalled selling a song, on royalty, to a famous music house, a few weeks before he fell ill. It occurred to him that he might induce the publishers, now, to buy it outright, for ten dollars—a sum which he sorely needed for actual food.

He borrowed a dime from the janitor and rode down-town to the music house. There he made his proposition. The head of the firm did not answer him; but went into an inner office. Presently he came back, and said to Jones:

"Your song was published two months ago. It caught on. All the town is singing it. We can't turn it out fast enough. I don't know just how much royalty we owe you for it, thus far; and the statements won't be due for another few months. But I can safely give you an advance of a thousand dollars on your first half-year's royalties."

Jones fell across the desk and rolled to the floor in a dead faint. He was not strong enough for such unbelievable news. When he was brought to his senses, he insisted that the money be given him in actual cash.

His pockets crammed with wealth, he took a cab home. As he got to the front door of his apartment, he began to walk slumpingly; his head bent, his face a mask of despair. He would break the news to his wife more gently than it had been broken to him. But he must have been a very poor actor. His wife took one swift look at him. Then, before he could speak a word, she cried out ecstatically:

"Johnny Jones, you're lying!"

By the way, that was some thirty years ago. There were moments of stringency, later, in the Jones treasury; more than once. But never again did Jones allow himself to be caught penniless. In flush times, he saved rigorously toward the possible leaner days. Never again were he and his wife dead broke. Even in the final years of wealth which crowned their struggle, they lived simply, saving more than they spent; their only big extravagance the continual helping of others who were in hard luck.

ON THE other hand, I recall the only thrifty dead beat of my acquaintance. His story has an odd interest of its own. I knew him well. In the early days of his married life—when he was little more than a boy—he went through a period of frightful hard luck; and at last was

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

In the radically different Eveready Layerbilt the cells are flat, and the battery is assembled under pressure into a solid block, eliminating waste space, packing a maximum of active materials within the battery case, and making those materials more efficient.

In the EVEREADY LAYERBILT

we have put the holes to work

Radio is better with Battery Power

There is a kind of radio reception that is radio at its very best. Clear. Hum-free. True in tone, faithful. Reliable. Reception from a receiver that is working under exactly the conditions for which it was designed. For such reception, use batteries. For batteries provide pure D. C., Direct Current, the only kind of current that is silent and unnoticeable in radio. For utmost results, undisturbed enjoyment, and unalloyed delight, use Battery Power.

THE ordinary dry cell "B" battery is full of useless holes—waste spaces between the cylindrical cells. The wasted space may amount to more than 30 per cent of the total.

A number of years ago we set about correcting this state of affairs. Dry battery traditions were dropped. An entirely new kind of dry cell was developed. It was flat and square, like a book, instead of cylindrical. Such cells were pressed together into a solid battery block with no waste spaces. The new invention was patented, thus making it exclusively Eveready. The Layerbilt embodies the first radical improvements ever made in the construction of the dry cell.

But before this remarkable battery was ever sold, it was tested for several years in the laboratory. Then it was put on trial in home service in all parts of the country. Several remarkable things were discovered in this way. The most remarkable is this: In the Layerbilt from a given quantity of materials you get more current than you would if the same amount of chemicals were put in a cylindrical cell battery. The Layerbilt construction makes the active materials produce more electricity.

That is why the Eveready Layerbilt "B" Battery No. 486 is the longest lasting of all Evereadys. It is a heavy duty battery for use on all loud-speaker receivers. Hundreds of thousands of people have found it to be the most economical battery they ever used. For convenience, as well as economy, use the Layerbilt.

NATIONAL CARBON CO., INC.
New York UCC San Francisco
Unit of Union Carbide and Carbon Corporation

Each cell in the cylindrical type of "B" is a unit connected to the others by soldered wires. The space between the cells is wasted, useless. Illustrated is the Eveready Heavy Duty "B" Battery No. 770, Eveready's highest development of the cylindrical cell type.

Tuesday night is Eveready Hour Night
East of the Rockies
9 P. M., Eastern Standard Time
Through WEAF and associated N. B. C. stations

On the Pacific Coast
9 P. M., Pacific Standard Time
Through N. B. C. Pacific Coast network

EVEREADY Radio Batteries
—they last longer

The air is full of things you shouldn't miss

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

At noon—each day

JAPAN TEA

Give yourself ten minutes

Make it a gift to yourself! Ten minutes at luncheon—to get a new start for a better afternoon.

When you've quite finished eating, sit back to linger over a cup or two of Japan Green Tea, steaming hot and fragrant.

Drink it slowly. Relax as you drink. Rest!

Ten minutes is all. But you'll find ten minutes spent this way is as refreshing as an hour's nap.

No mid-afternoon fatigue for you! No four o'clock weariness.

Japan Tea is tea at its best—tea in its natural state, uncolored and unfermented, with all the flavor-laden juices of the fresh leaves sealed in by immediate sterilization.

Specify Japan Green Tea. Packaged for the home under various brands. Several grades and prices. The best costs but a fraction of a cent a cup so impoverished that he sold his wife's wedding ring and bought with it bananas and oatmeal, on which he and she lived for weeks.

Then he succeeded at last in landing a job; and in finding a market for the stories he wrote. But the grim experience of dead-brokeness had left him abnormal. Though he was earning an excellent income, yet henceforth he borrowed every cent he could lay hands on; even "touching" brand-new acquaintances.

He put all his borrowed money in a savings bank, as fast as he got it. I have heard that his deposits from such loans amounted to thousands of dollars in all. Never by any chance did he repay a penny of it. He lived frugally, it is true—and he worked hard; but he continued to "touch" everyone in sight.

At last he saw a way to make much money, through a fraud that was too complicated for his limited financial powers. The speculation was discovered, and he vanished; leaving his family to fend for themselves.

TO THE "Evening World" office, in 1896, came a man with a series of articles to sell. At first glance, he seemed almost foppishly well-dressed. On closer inspection, I saw that his clothes were on the verge of raggedness. But he had kept them pressed and cleaned and mended; and he wore them with an air. He said to the managing editor:

"I am dead broke. I can't get any kind of work in this dull season. For the past six weeks I have been living on precisely five cents a day. That is, I have lived on five cents' worth of food a day. My room costs me nothing; for a friend left me the use of it when he went to Europe. This suit is all of my wardrobe that isn't hanging in a pawnshop. As I say, I am living on five cents a day; and I'm not starving, either. I want to sell you a series of six articles, describing just how I do it, and how every five-cent piece is invested in the cheapest and best food-materials."

The managing editor read the articles. He made inquiries and found the story was true. He bought the series. It made a hit. Other editors liked the writer's gayly common-sense style, and offered him work. I saw him again, three years later; sleek, prosperous, happy. He told me then that he was not always as prosperous as he looked, because he made it a fixed rule to save two thirds of every week's pay.

"It's simple enough to do," he went on. "For, after living on five cents a day, everything above that is luxury. I'm not going to be caught penniless again, next time the luck changes. I could save even more—only there is always someone else, somewhere or other, who needs my money more than I do."

The best dead-broke stories emanate from that source of all best stories, the Bible. It gives stern warning of one of the chief perils following on dead-brokeness. I am going to quote the gist of it. It is worth quoting; and better worth profiting by.

It tells of a servant who owed a huge sum of money to his feudal lord, and who was dead broke and had no way of meeting the debt. He besought his lord not to send him to prison but to give him time to work out the indebtedness; promising to pay it all, some day.

"Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion; and loosed him, and forgave him the debt. But the same servant went out and found one of his fellow servants which owed him an hundred pence [about fifteen dollars], and he laid hands on him and took him by the throat, saying:

"'Pay me that thou owest!'

"And his fellow servant . . . besought him, saying, 'Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.' And he would not; but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt. . . . Then his lord . . . said unto him:

"'O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt! . . . Shouldst not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow servant, even as I had pity on thee?'

"And his lord was wroth and delivered him to the tormentors [the Law] till he should pay all that was due unto him."

Yes, I believe fully there is trouble in store for the man who breaks the chain of human kindness by failing to pass along any help or clemency that has been rendered to him in his own poverty. I have seen too many instances of such trouble to be able to doubt it.

In youth, dead-brokeness is a more or less jolly adventure, besides being mighty good medicine and still better education. The older one grows, the grimmer the experience becomes. Even as old bones, broken, fail to knit as quickly as young bones—and in extreme age refuse to knit at all—so dead-brokeness in old age is prone to be incurable.

To my way of thinking, that is the form of dead-brokeness, above all others, to merit instant help. The victim is too far along in years to profit greatly by the experience; or to carve out a surer career for himself in future. He is down-and-out. It seems to me one of the rare instances when wise aid should be given; irrespective of its object's worthiness or lack of worth.

The dead-broke man who degenerates into a dead beat not only injures the dead-broke man who deserves help but his dead-beat tendencies spread like a foul infection to his wife and children, tainting them with the same virus of improvidence and of dishonesty.

For example, a child whose father is a dead beat grows up with the idea that it is easier and better to sponge on the world for a living than to work. If he works at all, he is like a swimmer who relies on water-wings. He won't put forth his best efforts to keep afloat in the financial stream—because he knows, from his father's rotten example, that there are always easy marks to be found who will lend him a hand.

PERHAPS the most delightful of all Dickens's magic books is "David Copperfield." Perhaps the most delightful of all Dickens's magic characters is Mr. Micawber. Micawber, you will remember, refused to exert himself to extra work and frugality, because he had a smug faith that when things were going badly, "something would turn up." The "something" was usually a soft-hearted friend who put the miserable old cuss on his feet again. His wife used to say, with placid assurance:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Fifteen years of development
....but an overnight popularity

WHEREVER you go you hear people praising the General Electric Refrigerator. Almost overnight it has taken a prominent place in the thoughts of homemakers.

One hears of its remarkable simplicity! That it hasn't a single belt, fan or drain-pipe! That it hasn't a bit of machinery under the cabinet—or in the basement! That it never needs oiling. There are many, many comments on the quietness with which it operates. There is enthusiasm expressed for the extreme roominess and the splendid strength of its gleaming cabinets.

Overnight, it seems .... but for more than fifteen years the vast laboratories of General Electric have been busy with the development of this truly revolutionary refrigerator. Several thousand refrigerators of nineteen different types, were made, field-tested and improved before this model was finally evolved. It was a long and expensive process—but nowhere in the field of electric refrigeration have engineers and scientists done their work so well.

Write today for booklet A-2 which is completely descriptive.

GENERAL ELECTRIC
Refrigerator

ELECTRIC REFRIGERATION DEPARTMENT · OF GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY · HANNA BUILDING · CLEVELAND, OHIO

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I heard my child scream!"

"Helen and her little brother were playing in the kitchen. Helen tried to pick up the boiling tea kettle . . . The whole kettleful of scalding water poured over the boy's cheek and chest! I spread Unguentine on thickly. The first touch made the child comfortable . . . The scalds healed very quickly. Not a scar is left."

RELY on Unguentine. Just as physicians and hospitals do the country over.

As soon as the accident happens, apply this famous dressing liberally. Immediately the pain is soothed. You are guarded against terrible infection. Soon the wound is completely healed, almost invariably without even a scar!

Use Unguentine freely for cuts, scratches and bruises, too. In severe cases, apply on gauze. Bandage lightly when necessary. Keep a tube always at hand. At your druggist's—50c. The Norwich Pharmacal Company, Norwich, N. Y.

UNGUENTINE

The famous surgical dressing

FREE!

—a trusted name

The Norwich Pharmacal Co., Dept. A-14, Norwich, N.Y.
Please send me trial tube of Unguentine and booklet, "What to do," by M. W. Stofer, M. D.

Name .....

Street .....

City and State .....

"If Mr. Micawber will keep on getting into difficulties, his friends must keep on getting him out."

Dickens was a rare character-vivisectionist. Under the guise of humor, here he put his finger on the taint I have been trying to describe. Micawber had so infected his wife with his own shiftlessness that she looked forward in serene certainty to his finding charity instead of working his own way.

As a matter of fact, you will recall that when Micawber went to Australia—a land of strangers where there was nobody to pick him up and set him on his feet every time he stumbled—he settled down to hard work and made a good living for his family and himself.

A wholesale employer of labor of all grades said to me:

"Nine times out of ten I can tell whether one of my employees had a dead beat or a thrifty man for a father. It shows in the work; at the very first crisis. A single generation of straight-living and hard-working parents would come close to clearing the industrial world of its million shirkers."

When a child sees his out-of-work father loaf around the house instead of hustling day and night to find another job, when he sees him sponging on others for the money he ought to be earning, when he hears his parents discussing ways and means for stalling off the tradesmen or of finding new credit where no credit is deserved, how can the youngster be expected to grow up with even the common rudiments of thrift and honesty?

On the other hand, many a man has gone into the world fight, keyed up by fine memories of dead-broke parents who battled gallantly and squarely until they got on their feet again; and who lived thenceforth in such way as to avoid future financial sloughs. That is a grand character-heritage to give to any son or daughter.

The Syrians have a proverb that says: "If he deceive me, shame upon him. But if he can deceive me twice, then shame upon me! For a wise man may be caught in a cunning trap; yet none but a fool can be caught a second time in the same snare."

The sanest, squarest, most industrious man may meet with an unavoidable set of circumstances which strip him of job and cash and health. But when he has fought his way to his feet (or has been lifted to them), he will see to it that under no normal conditions can the same thing befall him again.

ONE of the luckiest mishaps of my long life befell me when I had laid by my first thousand dollars. It had been cruelly hard to save that first thousand; and every dollar of it represented sweat and toil and self-denial. I was for leaving it in the savings bank, where yearly it would grow a little.

But a big-hearted friend pointed out to me how silly I was to be content with a measly four per cent on my money when I could double it in almost no time; and, meanwhile, could draw something like twenty per cent interest on it. Through the kindness of his heart, he would sell me some stock in a mine that was going to make the fortune of everyone connected with it. Because the mine syndicate did not want to lose any of the good thing by further issue of stock, he would sell me fifty shares of his own allotment, for just one thousand dollars.

He did.

I still have that stock. And, herewith, I make a bona fide offer to sell it to anyone, for just two cents a share. At that, I shall be defrauding the buyer out of precisely two cents for every share I sell him; and I shall be realizing my first dollar from my mining venture.

But the experience saved me many thousand dollars, in later years. It inoculated me, cheaply and permanently, against the speculation mania. I prefer to be a piker, thank you—"piker" being the quaint term of reproach hurled at any man who sticks to safe investments and who does not live beyond his means.

I SPEAK of this petty experience only because I have found that one of the shortest and surest roads to dead-brokeness is through the Valley of Speculation. A man has hoarded a few dollars. It has taken time and sacrifice to scrape them together. Ahead of him glitters a chance to annex money in large quantities, and by no sacrifice or break-back toil. Such-and-such a speculative stock is a bonanza. He puts his money into it; and perhaps his wife's money as well—all the family savings.

Accordingly, he goes broke—flat broke, dead broke.

If he be young enough and wise enough to recuperate from it, and if he take the lesson to heart, it may be the best thing that ever happened to him. Henceforth, he will not attempt to play a game which neither he nor any other outsider can hope to understand or to win at.

There is another and keenly important angle to the condition of dead-brokeness, when that condition is shared by man and wife. Perhaps there is no bond to weld two souls close and closer together than this mutual need to save and to plan and to toil, in order to keep alive. It offers glorious chance for the self-sacrifice which is no sacrifice—the giving up of small comforts in order that a loved one may enjoy them; the forgoing of selfishness or of extravagance, lest a loved one suffer by such heedless act.

Seldom when man and wife are dead broke do they grow apart. The lean years—"the years that the locust hath eaten"—these years knit them as one. It is when wealth and leisure arrive that man and wife tend to draw asunder; when the amusements and the friends and the parasites and the distractions of success come between them, banishing the sweet old-time need for oneness.

Yes, the Wolf is a safer guardian of the door to marital congeniality than is the Pot of Gold. To the man and wife to whom bare livelihood is a vital problem, Home is everything. Home and each other. Temptation is divinely merciful in sparing the dead broke.

Happy, thrice happy, the man and wife who, together, rise from dead-brokeness to luxury or even to modest comfort, hand in hand; indissolubly bound together by the fiery ordeal through which each has helped the other!

✤ ✤ ✤ ✤ ✤

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Yes! You can learn to play

THE thrill of playing—personally producing music; the cordial favor of approving friends; the glory of the limelight; how you have longed for these things.

How often you've been tempted—at least to send the coupon for the further information it will bring. But then!—you've turned the page, because—

On your shoulders sit two little whispering imps. Says one, "Don't be silly. You have no music in you. Music is for a certain few who have natural talent. Don't waste your time."

And the other little imp: "Be your age, Man! Learning to play is a long, tedious, expensive process, and there is always a chance of total failure. You can't afford that luxury. You can't spare the time. Besides people will laugh at you—think you foolish and sentimental. Don't do it."

So these are the lies that are cheating you. Don't listen. Obey your natural impulses. You can learn to play a Buescher quickly—easily. And it will open before you new worlds of pleasure beyond your fondest dreams.

But how can you be really sure that you can learn to play? Well! Can you beat time to music? Can you hum a tune? Could you thump out "Home, Sweet Home" with one finger, at the piano?

Then you can learn to play a Buescher. But only with the simplified fingering of the Buescher Saxophone is rapid progress assured. You don't have to favor and fuss for certain notes. You just open or close the key and blow normally. It is almost as easy as the "one finger solo" at the piano, but oh! how beautiful.

A small deposit puts any Buescher Instrument in your home for six days' trial. Then, when you've tested your skill and you see how simple it is to make beautiful music, you pay a little each month. Easy to Play, Easy to Pay.

Our beautiful book, "The Story of the Saxophone," tells more of this new world of pleasure, and gives further proof that you can learn to play. It is mailed free to any one interested in purchasing a Saxophone. No obligation. Send that "Pleasure Coupon" now.

BUESCHER BAND INSTRUMENT CO.
Everything in Band and Orchestra Instruments
2256 Buescher Block Elkhart, Indiana

BUESCHER True Tone
Band and Orchestra INSTRUMENTS

BUESCHER BAND INSTRUMENT CO., 414
2256 Buescher Block, Elkhart, Ind.
Gentlemen: Without obligating me in any way please send me your free literature. Mention instrument interested in.

Age?.....Name instrument.....

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The world-famous

S. S. GEORGE WASHINGTON

now a cabin ship

$150 and up

THE same fine accommodations, service, and cuisine that made this ship so popular as a first class liner will be maintained on the George Washington, now the largest American Cabin ship. From New York to Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Bremen.

And a new service to the Mediterranean

The fast sister ships, President Roosevelt and President Harding, are maintaining a new American flag service this winter to Algiers (12 hour stop-over privilege), Naples, Genoa and return. First class rates from $253 up, one way.

To Europe, of course

Regular sailings by the famous United States Liners, S. S. Leviathan, S. S. George Washington, S. S. Republic, and S. S. America. The S. S. America has been entirely re-conditioned and will make her first sailing on March 21 to Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Bremen.

WRITE FOR NEW BOOKLET ON TOURIST THIRD CABIN

See your nearest steamship agent at once about reservations, sailings, rates, and ports of call, or write to—

United States Lines

45 Broadway
New York City

'Phone
Whitehall 2800

One Misty Night

(Continued from page 50)

had thought he could do at least a little better than this. She was right: it was nothing. And now she would go away. This was the end. Quite right for this to be the end.

"I've got to take it . . . like a man," he said to himself.

Only, it was as if he had been dealt a mortal blow. He could not see very clearly; the fog seemed closing about him, chill as death; his face was wet with it.

"I ought to have told you before," he said carefully.

"But you never have! You've never told me anything—not anything at all!"

"Well, you see," he explained, "I—I just loved you so."

"Has it gone?"

"What?" he asked, startled.

"Your love. Haven't you got that to offer, any more?"

"My . . . love?" he said. "But that's —of course."

"Isn't that anything?"

"But you see—"

She had stopped outside a shop window, and was looking in it, with tears raining down her cheeks.

"My dear!" he cried. "My dear little darling girl! I—I do love you so. But it's not enough. I've only thirty dollars."

"Oh, oh, how cruel! How stupid! When you've so much—so much—to offer!" She took out a handkerchief and roughly brushed away the tears; but more came. "S-so much," she said, "and you will keep on—dragging it in, over and over—your stupid thirty dollars!"

"But it's so little! It's so—"

"Look!" she said.

There was a note in her voice that startled him, a note challenging and austere.

"Look!"

Her hand, in its worn glove, was outstretched, her clear eyes fixed upon some distant thing. He looked, but whatever it was that she saw, he could see nothing but the black and glistening pavement trodden by myriad hurrying feet, nothing but lights blurred in the fog.

"THIS city," she said. "Just think! The size of it: streets and streets and streets, thousands and thousands and thousands of people. Think what's going on in it now, even now, at the end of our day! The ships that will be loading and unloading, all night long, the shops that are open, the people that are working, the trucks going by. Listen to them!"

He did listen, and now he thought that he could hear a new, a strange and stirring sound, a dull thunder, like the surf of a mighty sea. It was the unceasing life of the regal city, to which comes all the world. From the golden West, from the South, from the North, trains were coming, with wheat, with fruit, with steel, with cotton, with the immense and careless abundance of this giant young land. From the East the ships were coming, with their cargoes, with people from all the nations of the earth, all thronging to this gateway.

"Yes," he said. "But I can't exactly see—"

What had all this to do with him or with her? Two shabby and sorrowful human creatures, lost in the fog, ignored by the swift, strong current of life that went past them. His eyes were fixed upon her; he was terribly stirred by her rapt, pale face. But he could not see.

"All this," she said. "You don't think, you can't think, that there isn't any place for us here! With all this going on—and nothing for us?"

HE LOOKED at her almost with awe. It was as if her words had opened his ears to what he had never before heeded, as if he could see now, through the mist, as if some part of that fierce current of life were flowing through his veins now.

"There is a place for us here!" she cried. "There is! Perhaps we haven't done so well before this. But now—now that we have each other. Oh, are you afraid?"

"I—I think I am," he said, very low. "I don't dare to ask you. It's so little. We couldn't marry on that."

"We could!" she cried.

She waited, watching his face with passionate anxiety. And then she saw her miracle, saw in his gray eyes a new light, saw dawning upon him a new look, eager and strong and young.

"D'you mean—you'd have faith in me?" he asked, with a sort of amazement. "You think I'll . . . get on?"

"Oh, I do! I do!" she answered.

And, because of the wisdom of her great love, she kept in her heart those other words: "I don't care! I hope you'll 'get on.' I do believe in you. But I love you always, anyhow, whether you do or not!"

"Mavis," he said, "I—I think you won't be sorry. Now that I've got you . . . I'll try . . . Mavis, I won't fail you. Mavis, I'll do my best for you."

Their hands clasped; they stood in an island of light, like a magic circle where the chill fog could not come.

"Mavis!" he cried. "You'll see!"

"I don't care!" said her rebel heart. "I believe in you. Helping you is something I can do. But, no matter what comes, I just love you—anyhow!"

"THAT TIRED FEELING and How to Get Rid of It," coming next month, is a health article of universal appeal. The material for it was obtained from Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, director of the famous Battle Creek Sanitarium. In it are given lists of foods which tell you how to maintain the chemical balance of the body, thus preventing acidosis—a condition highly prevalent among us as a people—together with several fundamental rules of sane living, which, if adopted as a regular régime, will maintain health and vitality into a ripe old age. This is an article which should be read by young, middle-aged, and old. No one should miss it.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Ask us AGAIN" the men begged . . .

"for Hot Cakes and Home-made Cake"

THE men just took over the kitchen when they heard there were pancakes to fry. It was a camp trick, they insisted, that no woman ever really learned to do.

They flipped them for wagers; she lost track of the times she had to mix the batter; and even the mathematician couldn't tell how many they ate.

And then they finished the cake as enthusiastically as though they'd never heard of pancakes.

She'd been keeping something from them, they complained; they hadn't known she could cook. And to tell the truth, she hadn't known it herself.

But she had tried it just for fun one day with a Royal recipe that sounded easy to follow and she'd been amazed to find how successful she was. Flaky hot biscuits that melt in your mouth she made in just 20 minutes. Her cakes rose feathery light.

She found you can always depend on Royal recipes to be accurate and clearly-stated. You can depend on Royal Baking Powder to leaven perfectly every time.

All over the world, well-informed women know that Royal is the very best baking powder—absolutely reliable, wholesome and pure. It is made always with the finest Cream of Tartar, which is a fruit product from ripe grapes.

Free: A complete book of Royal recipes—nearly 350 of them. Send for it today.

Pancakes—waffles—hot biscuits—there's a succession of Sunday Suppers that can make you famous.

Lady Goldenglow is a special Royal cake, a marvelous combination of orange and bittersweet chocolate that can be made with one batter and one icing. The recipe is in the Royal Cook Book.

The Cream of Tartar Baking Powder. Contains no alum. Leaves no bitter taste.

Mail coupon for famous Cook Book—Free

THE ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO.
Dept. B, 117 E. 42nd St., New York City

I am interested in your recipes. Please send me your complete Cook Book—Free.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Special Features

Standard keyboard • visible writing • extra wide writing line • two-color ribbon • automatic ribbon reverse • accurate back spacer • variable line spacer • margin stops • margin release • dust protection over all working points.

First aid to KEEN AMBITION

FOR the man who works at home at night, when some of the world's best work is done, the Royal Portable Typewriter is a perfect partner—an able aid to keen ambition, swift, efficient, durable, dependable, famous for ease of operation.

Most modern of lightweight writing machines, the Royal Portable is ideal for all personal and confidential writing. Royal-typed means easy to write, easy to read—the standard keyboard, visible writing and other special features give this better portable the advantages of a big office machine, yet it is amazingly light and compact.

Built to last a lifetime by the makers of over a million Easy-Writing Royal Typewriters, the Royal Portable can be had either in black or your choice of vivid colors.

$60.00 complete with carrying case, slightly higher in Canada—many prefer gradual payments. Typewriting is easy to learn, send for a free copy of Van Sant's Touch Typewriting—and phone the Royal Representative to show you the Royal Portable today.

PORTABLE
ROYAL TYPEWRITER

ROYAL TYPEWRITER COMPANY, Inc., 316 Broadway, New York

Branches and Agencies the World Over

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Lincoln—The Most Lied About Man in the World

(Continued from page 9)

green, which is neither one nor the other but a kind of illegitimate cypress!' He then proceeded to gather specimens of each and explain the distinctive formations of foliage belonging to each species. 'Trees,' he said, 'are as deceptive in their likeness to one another as are certain classes of men, amongst whom none but a physiognomist's eye can detect dissimilar moral features until events have developed them. . . .'"

In my reading, I came upon several other comments made by Lincoln redolent of the woods and of a nature which he knew and loved. But none was more touching nor to me more authentic than the anecdote my mother gave me. It was told her by her distant relative, William Cullen Bryant, who, alack, was no admirer of Lincoln. Nevertheless, he said that he had been much touched by the President's quoting to him:

"I have heard the mavis singing
Its love-song to the morn;
I have seen the dewdrop clinging
To the rose just newly born.

"And," added Lincoln, "having experienced that, a man carries about all the beauty of God's world in his remembrance."

I AM tempted to add here another comment made by Lincoln, not on nature's charm but redolent of woodcraft and refuting another popular misconception about him. He carried a cane on the occasion of his first inauguration, and much has been made of his alleged awkwardness in handling what was believed to be an utter novelty to him. A good many reporters—newspaper and otherwise—concluded that Lincoln had never touched a cane before, and their conclusion has become one of the rag-tags.

F. B. Carpenter, who painted the famous picture of Lincoln reading the Emancipation Proclamation to his Cabinet, spent six months in the White House with Lincoln in '64, while at this work. He tells many priceless stories. One of the less important, but nevertheless significant, comments concerns a cane carried by a man who was calling on the President. Taking the cane in his hand, Lincoln said:

"I always used a cane when I was a boy. It was a freak of mine. My favorite one was a knotted beech stick, and I carved the head myself. There's a mighty amount of character in sticks. Don't you think so? You have seen these fishing poles that fit into a cane? Well, that was an old idea of mine. Dogwood clubs were favorite ones with the boys. I suppose they use them yet. Hickory is too heavy, unless you get it from a young sapling. Have you ever noticed how a stick in one's hand will change one's appearance? Old women and witches wouldn't look so without sticks. Meg Merrilies understands that."

To comprehend fully the stupidity of insisting on the one poem for Lincoln, you have only to realize that poetry was far more important to his generation than to ours. Poetry was news in that period. Reading the diaries, old letters, autobiographies and biographies of the men among whom Lincoln moved, you learn that the ability to quote verse, not only classic verse but the latest from Longfellow, Whittier, Tennyson, Stedman, Bryant, Holmes, was an important part of the educated man and woman's equipment. Lincoln would have had to be intellectually deaf to have missed, indeed not to have shared, the popular liking and admiration for the poets.

GENERAL VIELE tells us that early in the war, when Lincoln and he and Stanton took the night boat down to Fortress Monroe, Lincoln quoted poetry for hours to them—Byron and Browning and Shakespeare. John Hay, his secretary, states, "Lincoln loved Burns." When he read aloud the lines beginning "The bridegroom may forget the bride," he said: "Burns never touched a sentiment without carrying it to its ultimate expression and leaving nothing further to be said." He was fond of Tom Hood's "Haunted House" and of Whittier's poems, and Bryant's, and of Whitman's "Leaves of Grass."

Brooks tells us: "One November day, when we were driving out to the Soldiers' Home, some aspect of the scene recalled 'The Last Leaf' to his mind. Slowly and with excellent judgment he recited the whole poem. Enlarging upon the pathos, wit, and humor of Holmes, I found that the President never had seen a copy of the genial doctor's works, although he was not certain that he had not. I offered to lend him my copy of the poems, a little gold and white book. . . . About a week after leaving the book with the President, I called at the house one evening and, finding him alone, we settled down for a quiet chat. He took from a drawer in his table the white and gold Holmes and went over the book with much gusto, reading or reciting several poems that had struck his fancy. He expressed his surprise at finding that some of the verses he admired most had been drifting around in newspapers without the name of the author attached to them: it was in this way, he said, that he had found 'The Last Leaf' although he did not know that Doctor Holmes was the author. Finally, he said that he liked 'Lexington' as well as anything in the book, 'The Last Leaf' excepted, and he began to read the poem; but when he came to the stanza beginning

"Green be the graves where her martyrs are lying!
Shroudless and tombless they sank to their rest . . .

his voice faltered and he gave me the book with the whispered request, 'You read it; I can't.' Months afterward, when several ladies were in the red parlor calling on Mrs. Lincoln, he recited that poem without missing a word, so far as I

Stop GROPING FOR WORDS!

IF your words flow easily, if you NEVER have trouble expressing yourself, people see immediately that your thoughts run along smoothly and that you have a sparkling, active mind.

But if you hesitate and stammer, and grope for words, if you say "er" or "what-do-you-call it" or "you know what I mean" instead of using exactly the right word to express your meaning—you tell every one that your mind is asleep. You publish the fact that your education has been sadly neglected. Your limited vocabulary shows clearly that you are dull and uninteresting.

Stop Making Mistakes

Every time you talk, every time you write, you show what you are. When you use the wrong word, when you mispronounce or misspell a word, when you punctuate incorrectly, when you use flat, ordinary words, you handicap yourself enormously. A striking command of English enables you to present your ideas clearly, forcefully, convincingly. If your language is incorrect it hurts you more than you will ever know, for people are too polite to tell you about your mistakes.

New Invention Makes Mastering English Easy

For many years Mr. Cody, one of our greatest authorities on English, studied the problem of creating instinctive habits of using good English. After countless experiments he finally invented a simple method by which you can acquire a better command of the English language in only 15 minutes a day. Now you can stop making the mistakes which have been hurting you. Mr. Cody's students have secured more improvement in five weeks than previously had been obtained by other pupils in two years!

Send for Free Book on English

To achieve your ambitions it is essential that you use good English as instinctively as you tie your shoes. Business today demands men and women who use correct, concise, forceful language. Society demands education, breeding, culture, demonstrated by the use of correct, interesting and convincing language.

A new book explaining Mr. Cody's remarkable method is ready. If you are ever embarrassed by mistakes in grammar, spelling, punctuation, pronunciation, or if you can not instantly command the exact words with which to express your ideas, this new free book, "How to Speak and Write Masterly English," will prove a revelation to you. Send the coupon or a letter or postal card for it now.

SHERWIN CODY SCHOOL OF ENGLISH
92 Searle Building Rochester, N. Y.

SHERWIN CODY SCHOOL OF ENGLISH
92 Searle Building, Rochester, N. Y.

Please send me your Free Book, "How to Speak and Write Masterly English."

Name.....

Address.....

City and State.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Free Book for Dog Owners
An authoritative booklet on the care and feeding of dogs. Explains all diseases, giving symptoms and proper home treatments. Sent free if you write to: H. Clay Glover Co., Inc., Dept. A, 119 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

ESPECIALLY IN WINTER MONTHS
dogs need these aids to health

IF your dog is more pampered and confined in the winter, look out for his health. During these months his vitality is lowest; his resistance nil. So dog experts emphasize the need for extra attention and care at this time. Be sure he is free from worms. Watch his feeding. See that he gets regular exercise.

To help keep him in sound vigorous health give him Glover's Condition Pills. Their tonic and digestive properties are endorsed for all breeds by thousands of dog owners.

Other famous Glover's Medicines are likewise indispensable for those who want healthy dogs during the months of winter. They are sold by drug stores, pet shops, and kennels, everywhere. They have been proved the most safe and efficacious of all dog medicines. Used and recommended by dog fanciers, breeders and kennel owners for more than half a century.

Safeguard your dog's health with these

GLOVER'S
IMPERIAL
DOG MEDICINES

Glover's Condition Pills	65c
Glover's Laxative Pills	65c
Glover's Cough Mixture	65c
Glover's Worm Capsules	65c
Glover's Digestive Pills	65c
Glover's Tonic	65c
Glover's Mange Medicine	65c
Glover's Vermifuge	65c

There are additional Glover's Medicines for the treatment and prevention of all dog ailments.

could remember it. And yet I do not believe that he ever saw the text of 'Lexington' except during the few busy days when he had my book."

Shakespeare, Lincoln really studied. He had some very clear-cut ideas on the way Shakespeare should be read. He said one morning to Carpenter, apropos of Edwin Booth's appearance in Washington in "Hamlet:" "There is one passage of that play which is very apt to be slurred over by the actor or omitted altogether, which seems to me the choicest part of the play. It is the soliloquy of the king after the murder. It always struck me as one of the finest touches of nature in the world."

"Then," says Carpenter, "the President, throwing himself into the very spirit of the scene, took up the words and went on for thirty-six lines, entirely from memory, with a feeling and appreciation unsurpassed by anything I have witnessed on the stage."

O! my offense is rank, it smells to heaven;

No, the splendid isolation of "Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?" will have to be destroyed!

IN THE same category with his lack of love of poetry must go his lack of religion. This rag-tag must have been based on the fact that Lincoln professed no particular creed, although he attended the Presbyterian Church. But if by religion one means a faith in an overruling Providence to Whom individuals and nations alike are accountable, Lincoln possessed religion of a high order. One has only to go to his own public utterances to prove that:

"As Jefferson said, 'I tremble for my country when I remember that God is just.'

"It is the duty of nations, as well as of men, to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God; to confess their sins and transgressions in humble sorrow, yet with the assured hope that genuine repentance will lead to mercy and pardon; and to recognize the sublime truth announced in the Holy Scriptures and proven by all history that those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord:

"And, insomuch as we know that by His divine law, nations, like individuals, are subjected to punishments and chastisements in this world, may we not justly fear that the awful calamity of civil war which now desolates the land may be but a punishment inflicted upon us for our presumptuous sins, to the needful end of our national reformation as a whole people? We have been the recipients of the choicest bounties of Heaven. We have been preserved these many years in peace and prosperity. We have grown in numbers, wealth, and power, as no other nation has ever grown; but we have forgotten God.

"We have forgotten the gracious hand which preserved us in peace, and multiplied and enriched and strengthened us; and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our hearts, that all these blessings were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us."

He then designated April 30th, 1863, as a day of fasting and prayer: "All this being done in sincerity and truth, let us then rest humbly in the hope authorized by divine teaching, that the united cry of the nation will be heard on high. . . ."

From his first inaugural: "Intelligence, patriotism, Christianity, and a firm reliance on Him who has never yet forsaken this favored land. . . ."

Thanksgiving Proclamation, 1862: "It is meet and right to recognize and confess the presence of the Almighty Father and the power of His hand equally in these triumphs and in these sorrows. . . ."

If Abraham Lincoln had no religion, then he was a deep hypocrite!

You will recall that your and my Lincoln had utter patience and never showed irritation or lost his temper. I'm not sure now quite why we wished to paint him as mealy-mouthed, or why we thought that a man so harassed must not at times give way, or why we did not recognize that in dealing with the particularly thick-skinned type Lincoln found it necessary to be explosive. There are numerous evidences that, as he settled more and more into the heavy harness, it galled him. Like most sweet-tempered people, he was rather pleased with himself when he gave way. Says John Hay's diary under date of October 30th, 1863:

"When Chase sent in his resignation" (said Lincoln), "I saw that the game was in my own hands and I put it through. When I had settled this important business at last, with much labor and to my entire satisfaction, into my room one day walked D. D. Field and Opdycke and began a new attack on me to remove Seward. For once in my life I rather gave my temper the rein, and I talked to those men pretty d—d plainly. Opdycke may be right in being cool to me. I may have given him reason this morning."

ONE must carry in mind some picture of the stress under which Lincoln worked. All day long, week after week, month after month, his anteroom was packed with anxious folk: mothers, fathers, wounded soldiers, cotton speculators, office-seekers, army and navy officers, politicians, and more politicians, committees of every form the human mind could devise, curiosity-seekers, all insisting on seeing the President.

Lincoln saw them. He believed that his time belonged to the people who gave him his office. He had no pride of place. People imposed on this fine democracy of his. None knew it better than Lincoln. Sometimes he showed this. Carpenter, sketching in the details of the Cabinet room, which also was the President's office, saw many aspects of the people's methods of tormenting the Chief Executive. He tells, for example, of an army officer who had been cashiered, and who carried the story of his grievance to Lincoln.

In due course, he was admitted and told his tale. Lincoln's comment to the man was that, upon his own evidence, the case did not warrant executive interference. The man withdrew. A day or so later he again appeared with the same tale, and received the same comment from the President. Yet a third time he appeared, forced his way to Lincoln's desk, and was heard with forbearance but received no reply for a moment.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

WILLIE HOPPE,

Champion Billiard Player, writes:

© Underwood & Underwood

"The slightest cough or throat irritation might be fatal during a close match. On this account I prefer Luckies as a steady diet. They have never irritated my throat or caused the slightest cough. I'm going to stick with Luckies."

Willie Hoppe

You, too, will find that LUCKY STRIKES give the greatest pleasure—Mild and Mellow, the finest cigarettes you ever smoked. Made of the choicest tobaccos, properly aged and blended with great skill, and there is an extra process—"IT'S TOASTED"—no harshness, not a bit of bite.

MADE OF THE CREAM OF THE CROP

"It's toasted"

No Throat Irritation-No Cough.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

CHAPPING is more important than you think—because it weathers the skin—ages it. Feels uncomfortable, too—and looks far from alluring. So keep your skin silken and fresh. You can—with Hinds Honey & Almond Cream. It prevents chapping—and drying—prevents all weathering.

Pat on Hinds Cream before you go out. Again when you come in. Pat it on every time you wash your face and hands. Then your lips, your hands, your face will stay invitingly smooth and soft—through all chapping weather. (Hinds Cream also heals and soothes a skin already chapped. Wonderful as a powder base, too!)

Let us send you a generous sample bottle to try. The coupon below will bring it to you. Just fill in your name and mail it now while you think of it.

Made by A. S. HINDS CO.
a division of Lehn & Fink Products Company

In Canada—A. S. Hinds Co. (Canada) Limited
Distributed by Lehn & Fink (Canada) Limited

HINDS
Honey & Almond CREAM
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Buy Hinds Cream in the 50c. and $1.00 sizes. You get more at less cost.

© L. & F. P. CO., 1928

Try HINDS CREAM Prevents chapping, prevents windburn, prevents sunburn, makes powder cling to face, smooths "catchy" fingers, softens skin, protects skin, cleanses skin, softens cuticle, soothes skin, before and after shaving, protects against alkali, protects from hard water, for children's skin.

LEHN & FINK, Inc., Sole Distributors
Dept. 718, Bloomfield, New Jersey

Send me a sample bottle of HINDS Honey and Almond CREAM, the protecting cream for the skin.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

This coupon not good after February, 1929

The officer then exclaimed, "Well, Mr. President, I see you are fully determined not to do me justice!"

Lincoln rose, laid down a package of papers he held in his hand, and then, seizing the officer by the coat collar, he marched him forcibly to the door, saying, as he ejected him into the passage, 'Sir! I give you fair warning never to show yourself in this room again. I can bear censure, but not insult.'"

Senator Sumner tells in his "Works" of hearing that one of Lincoln's military governors had taken a position against schools for colored children, as forbidden by the laws of the state. Sumner sought the President at once, tracing him to the War Department. As he made his complaint, he discovered "an impatience in Mr. Lincoln which he had not encountered before, the latter exclaiming, 'Do you take me for a school-committee man?' 'Not at all,' replied Sumner; 'I take you for President of the United States, and I come to you with a case of wrong, in attending to which your predecessor, George Washington, if alive, might add to his renown.' The President took this in good part, and changing his tone proceeded to consider the case."

Medill, of the Chicago "Tribune," says that when the Government tried to enforce the draft in 1864 there was so much trouble in Chicago that a delegation of Chicagoans, Medill among them, went to Lincoln to ask him to force Stanton to give them a new enrollment. Lincoln went to the War Office with the delegation in order to hear both sides.

"Lincoln," says Medill, "suddenly lifted his head and turned on us a black and frowning face. 'Gentlemen, after Boston, Chicago has been the chief instrument in bringing this war on the country. . . . It is you who are largely responsible for making blood flow as it has. You called for war until we had it. You called for emancipation, and I have given it to you. Whatever you have asked for, you have had. Now you come here begging to be let off from the call for men which I have made to carry on the war you have demanded. You ought to be ashamed of yourselves. I have a right to expect better things of you. And you, Medill, you are acting like a coward. You and your "Tribune" have had more influence than any paper in the Northwest in making this war. You can influence great masses, yet you cry to be spared at a moment when your career is suffering. Go home and send us these men!' . . . We all got up and went out, and when the door closed one of my colleagues said, 'Well, gentlemen, the Old Man is right. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves. . . .'"

ONE more episode shows up still another bit of trash. Everyone says, everyone believes, that Lincoln told smutty stories. For years I have tried to run down one of these obscene tales, but as yet I've not found one. Of course a good deal depends on what one means by "obscenity." I used as a touchstone the synonyms in Webster: "indecent, unchaste, lewd." With this definition as a test, it doesn't seem to me that Lincoln is guilty of the soft impeachment. He used, as country-bred people did then, simple Anglo-Saxon words for natural functions of the body.

But I have heard more jokes with a double meaning, more lewd references to the processes of creation, at an evening party of the self-styled Intelligentsia in New York than Lincoln probably used in his whole life! And I could find no authentic record that, during his days in the White House, he told any such jokes, made any such references.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

This is a fair sample of what I did find: It is said that when he went into Stanton's office, he frequently left his hat in a chair in the reception-room. In this room there always were visitors. On a certain evening, Lincoln laid his stovepipe, as usual, on a chair, and on his return, a very fat woman rose from the place to bow to the President. Lincoln returned the bow, then, walking behind her, picked up the remains of his hat and said, shaking his head sadly, "Madam, I could have told you that my hat wouldn't fit you before you tried it on!"

His so-called sex stories would scarcely offend a nun. A. K. McClure wanted Lincoln to give Governor Curtin a foreign mission. "But," said the President, "I'm in the position of young Sheridan when old Sheridan called him to task for his rakish conduct, and said to him that he must take a wife, to which young Sheridan replied, 'Very well, Father, but whose wife shall I take?' It's all very well to say that I will give Curtin a mission, but whose mission am I to take?"

Here is a story which is said to have shocked Horace Greeley: Secretary Stanton's private secretary returned from New York in August, 1864, with some very depressing facts as to Lincoln's chances for reëlection in the fall. Stanton thought the President ought to hear the facts, and sent his secretary to report them. Lincoln listened, walked the floor for a moment in silence, and then said, "with grim earnestness of tone and manner, 'Well, I can't run the political machine; I have enough on my ~~hands~~ without that. It is the people's business—~~the election~~ is in their hands. If they turn their backs to the fire and get scorched in the rear, they'll find they have got to sit on the blister!'"

WILLIAM STODDARD, Lincoln's secretary, has a decided statement to make on this subject. He calls attention to the fact that Lincoln, the teetotaler, was constantly accused of telling dirty stories while drunk. Stoddard adds that he had been with the President, day after day, and "failed to hear any of these objectionable stories. . . . As for a vast number of the so-called jokes attributed to him, Lincoln has never so much as heard them. But one very witty and dirty and insolent pun perpetrated by him upon a member of his own Cabinet, through the inventive brains of a well-known newspaper reporter, has been carried to Lincoln, and the literary gentleman has been sent for. "He does not dream that his story has been referred to the President. He did not see Lincoln's face flush and darken when the brand-new pattern of foul humor was given him as being circulated in his name. He will see something now, however, and hear something, for Louis has come to summon him across the hall, and he goes all smiles and chuckles. . . . He is out again. He has been in the President's room but a few moments, and he is not smiling. Whatever new thing he

CANADIAN NATIONAL—TO EVERYWHERE IN CANADA

The spirit of '98 still lives in Alaska and the Yukon

Visit the land of the '98 "gold rush"—land which inspired the thrilling tales by Rex Beach and the word-songs of Robert W. Service.

Follow in comfort, the trail of the hardy adventurers who amassed fortunes overnight or who staked their all and failed. From Skagway through the White Horse Pass, reminders of these historic days are seen on every side. Enthralling in its history, Alaska's scenic grandeur is unparalleled. Here lofty, snowcapped mountains pierce the sky. Giant glaciers reflect the gorgeous beauty of the Northern Lights and the midnight sun. Everywhere about are the ancient totem poles of a departed race, and blanketing the landscape is a carpet of wildflowers, brilliant beyond description. Take a trip to Alaska this summer. Cruise through a thousand miles of sheltered waters. Visit Ketchikan, Wrangell and Juneau en route. Reduced rates from all U. S. A. points in connection with Canadian National Railways to Vancouver. Optional routes. Compartment Observation Cars radio equipped. Superior Dining Car Service. Stop-over at Jasper National Park. Fare, Vancouver to Skagway and return, including meals and berth—a ten day voyage—$90. All outside rooms. Mail the coupon.

Canadian National operates 22,681 miles of line reaching every important city and seaport in the Dominion of Canada.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

The Largest Railway System in America

OFFICES

Boston 333 Washington St.	Duluth 430 W. Superior St.	Pittsburgh 505 Park Building
Buffalo 11 So. Division St.	Kansas City 706 Grand Ave.	Portland, Me. Grand Trunk Ry. Sta.
Chicago 108 W. Adams St.	Los Angeles 607 So. Grand Ave.	Portland, Ore. 122 Third St.
Cincinnati Dixie Terminal Building Corner 4th & Walnut	Minneapolis 518 Second Ave. So.	St. Louis 314 No. Broadway
Cleveland 948 Union Trust Bldg.	New York 505 Fifth Ave.	St. Paul 83 East Fifth St.
Detroit 1259 Griswold St.	Philadelphia 1500 Chestnut St.	San Francisco 689 Market St.
	Washington, D. C. 15th & I Sts. N. W.	Seattle 1329 Fourth Ave.

Please send me your free booklet on Alaska.

A. M.-1

Name.....
(If student state grade)

Street.....

City.....State.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Make sure that childhood's sunny smiles are always with you

CAPTURE forever the warmth and glow of Childhood's sunny smiles . . . . . with Photographs. Take your children to the Family Photographer at least once a year.

PHOTOGRAPHS Live Forever

has learned carries him out of the White House with unusual haste. . . ."

The artist, Carpenter, takes emphatic exception to statements of various biographers of Lincoln, that the President told "foul stories. Mr. Lincoln, I am convinced, has been greatly wronged in this respect. Every foul-mouthed man in the country gave currency to the slime and filth in his own imagination by attributing it to the President. . . . During the entire period of my stay in Washington, after witnessing his intercourse with nearly all classes of men, embracing governors, senators, members of Congress, officers of the army, and intimate friends, I cannot recollect to have heard him relate a circumstance to any one of them which would have been out of place in a lady's drawing-room. Doctor Stone, his family physician, came in one day to see my studies. Sitting in front of that of the President, with whom he did not sympathize politically, he remarked with much feeling: 'It is the province of the physician to probe deeply into the interior lives of men, and I affirm that Mr. Lincoln is the purest-hearted man with whom I ever came in contact.' Secretary Seward expressed the same sentiment in still stronger language."

I. N. Arnold, member of Congress from Illinois, old and intimate friend of Lincoln, also took exception to the insinuations of biographies: "I saw him constantly for many years before he went to Washington, and there I saw him daily during the greater part of his Presidency, and although his anecdotes and stories were racy, witty, and pointed beyond all comparison with others, yet I never heard one of a character to need palliation or excuse."

John George Nicolay, John Hay, Charles Dana, Noah Brooks, all are as succinct as Arnold in cleansing Lincoln's memory of this taint. We are too apt to forget that Lincoln's bitter enemies were glad to give circulation to evil reports about him. These were not all concerned with his story-telling, either. Richard Dana, the author of "Two Years Before the Mast," after visiting Washington and studying Lincoln, had this to say, writing to Charles Francis Adams in March, 1863:

"AS TO the politics of Washington, the most striking thing is the absence of personal loyalty to the President. It does not exist. He has no admirers, no enthusiastic reporters, none to bet on his head. If a Republican convention were to be held to-morrow, he would not get the vote of a state. He does not act or talk or feel like the ruler of a great empire in a great crisis. This is felt by all, and has got down through all the layers of society. It has a disastrous effect on all departments and classes of officials, as well as the public. He seems to me to be fonder of details than of principles, of tithing the mint, anise, and cummin of patronage, and personal questions than the weighty affairs of empire. He likes to talk, and to tell stories with all sorts of persons, who come to him for all sorts of purposes, better than to give his mind to the noble and manly duties of his great post. It is not difficult to see that this is the feeling of the Cabinet. He has a kind of shrewdness and common sense, mother wit, and slipshod, low-leveled honesty that made him a good Western jury lawyer. But he is an unutterable calamity to us where he is."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

And Dana is mild! Greeley, Henry Winter David, Beecher, Bryant, wrote and spoke of Lincoln with hatred. Opposition newspapers are full of astounding editorials, astounding at least to us who are in the rare position of watching the deification of a human being, and who forget that Lincoln was a man and a politician. For years before he was made Secretary of War, Stanton always spoke of Lincoln as the Illinois Gorilla. One excited orator, reported in a New York paper, called the President a harlot! And Stoddard, who opened all of Lincoln's and Mrs. Lincoln's mail, says the letters "tell of partisan bitterness and personal hatred; of the most venomous malice; of low, slanderous meannesses; of the coarsest, foulest vulgarity to which beastly men can sink; of the wildest, the fiercest, the most obscene ravings of utter insanity."

ANOTHER attribute that is rapidly becoming inseparable from Lincoln's godhood is the matter of his dress. And so sensitive is the public becoming about its own picture of Lincoln that it is scarcely safe to suggest that he ever wore, even to bed, anything save the wrinkled black frock coat and the high hat. This same public which demands and reads with avidity bawdy novels because, it says, here only is truth, demands with equal avidity that no one disturb its legendary notions about our national heroes, lest truth belittle them! So, curiously, poor Lincoln must go stalking down the ages, a clown in ill-fitting black broadcloth.

As a matter of fact, his wife, who loved good clothes and wore them, saw to it that her husband, when he became President, was properly dressed. There is a group picture of him, taken in the summer of 1860 in his yard in Springfield, in which he is wearing white. A man who was fifteen when that picture was taken, who saw it taken, tells me that Lincoln was wearing a white linen suit. This same boy heard some of the Lincoln-Douglas debate, and he told me that Lincoln wore a snuff-colored, short-coated suit during one debate, again white linen, and once a white linen duster over a blue suit with brass buttons.

My grandmother, who had four sons in the Federal army, got very cross because two of her sons didn't write her, and she went to Washington to see Lincoln about it. She insisted to me that he was a very well-dressed man. "He wore a well-starched linen coat and pants and a plush waistcoat of a sort of plum color."

William Russell, the famous British war correspondent, wrote in his Washington diary in 1861: "On my way to dinner at the legation, I met the President crossing Pennsylvania Avenue. He wore a suit of gray, with a felt hat on the back of his head." At a farmhouse near Arlington, Russell saw Lincoln on the porch, "wearing a loose gray hunting coat with a long vest." Several diarists of the period mention the deerstalker's cap which Lincoln used to wear back and forth between the White House and the various departments, "stuffing it into the pocket of his loose, snuff-colored coat when not in use." My grandfather wrote in a letter, in the

WALTER BAKER & CO., Incorporated · Established 1780

Mother takes it for lunch

She's dieting, too. A cup of Baker's gives her indispensable food elements without putting on unnecessary weight, and without starving her into a "gone" feeling before dinner-time.

Dad takes it at dinner

He loves the rich, smooth flavor of the high grade Baker cocoa-beans. And best of all, the cocoa won't "keep him awake"; as a matter of fact, he'll probably sleep better for it.

Sister has it for breakfast

Sister's doctor is the best child specialist in town. To him, Baker's Cocoa is the best-known means of varying her cold-milk diet and giving her food she'll like. (He gives it to his own daughter too—she's just Sister's age.)

. . . and Christopher Robin!

His healthy body is on the go—yelling for more fuel, from dawn to dark. He gets it in Baker's. The way he's growing certainly shows the part the nourishment in Baker's is playing in his diet. Baker's Cocoa three times a day is none too often to satisfy his appetite.

Of course, you won't get the flavor and food-value of Baker's in any cocoa which isn't made as Baker's is—of the best crop cocoa beans.

BAKER'S COCOA

The WHOLE FAMILY'S DRINK

send for "FAMOUS RECIPES"

WALTER BAKER & CO., INC.
Dorchester-Lower-Mills, Mass.
Please send me "Famous Recipes," the 64-page Cook Book for Walter Baker's Cocoa and Chocolate.

Name.....

City.....State.....

C.—A. M. 2-23

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Did you understand exactly what your doctor meant when he said:—?

WHEN your doctor advises you to eat bran to relieve constipation, he wants you to eat 100% bran, in order to add enough bulk and roughage to your diet to produce proper elimination. He knows you need a pure, natural bran, unsweetened and unadulterated, not pre-cooked to the crumbling point. You need Pillsbury's Health Bran—100% bran in the original flake, just as it comes from the mill. It is the most delightful of all to eat, for it can be made into any number of delicious foods—the recipes are on the Pillsbury package. And it really does the work, because it is true bran, and remains true bran, no matter how you prepare it—for your own home baking does not crumble it or destroy its laxative value.

On the Pillsbury package you will find thirteen delicious ways to serve this natural 100% bran. They make foods which have become favorites in thousands of homes, not only because of their health value, but because they are so particularly good to eat. Bran upside-down apple cake, bran brownies, bran doughnuts, filled bran tea cakes—every one is delightful. And every one brings you 100% bran—a dependable and pleasant source of that bulk and roughage which is so necessary to proper elimination.

For other delicious suggestions, we will gladly send you, free, our booklet, "50 Prize Winning Recipes for Pillsbury's Health Bran." Write Pillsbury Flour Mills Company, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Pillsbury's Health Bran winter of 1864, that he had seen Lincoln wearing a fashionably cut blue chinchilla coat and a brand-new silk hat of the latest mode, with buff-colored gloves. "He looks very much the well-dressed gentleman."

That he was unhappily married is the very sine qua non of the acceptable picture of Lincoln, I suppose simply because a tragic hero is so much bigger to the mind's eye than a happy one. A niece of the Lincolns', who lived in the house with them for months on end, says emphatically that this was a happy marriage; that Abraham and Mary loved each other devotedly.

Lincoln was slow, lazy, and hard to get going, not a family man in the homely sense. His wife was quick, energetic, unquenchably ambitious, with a witty tongue that could cut like a two-edged sword. She was quick to speak, quick to repent. I have met many people who knew her. They all give this description of her. Nearly all of them had experienced the warmth and generosity of her heart. She was in a continuous state of urging Lincoln on, of fussing over him and at him. He needed every bit of it. But it is easy to see how this combination gave birth to the legend of his unhappiness.

An episode related by a man who knew whereof he spoke gives the lie to this most obnoxious of all the rag-tags that conceal the real Lincoln. When this man was a boy he played with the Lincoln children. The boys got into the parlor one day during Mrs. Lincoln's absence and upset things, as children will. When Mrs. Lincoln came home she was very cross, and scolded them heartily. Lincoln came in and interfered on the boys' behalf. Instantly, Mrs. Lincoln turned on her husband: "But he only laughed, picked her up in his arms and kissed the daylights out of her. And she clung to him like a girl."

IF ONLY one of his contemporaries had been big enough to give us the full rounded man as finely as Nicolay and Hay, two of his secretaries, gave us the President! Then these bits of trash could not have clung to his real greatness. I say his real greatness, as though I knew of what that consisted. But I do not know. Nor does anyone else. Numerous admirably expressed biographies have been written about Lincoln. Innumerable statues have been chiseled, countless portraits painted, all attempting to attach him to us by homely fact before we thrust him from us forever to a place among the gods on high Olympus. Yet for all these, none of us knows Abraham Lincoln. The portraiture of him was begun too late.

I gaze and gaze at my own mosaic of him. It is not he. I go to Washington and stand in awe too deep for words before the Lincoln Memorial, that embodiment of the world's ideal of beauty. It is not Lincoln. I go to Springfield, and wander through the little house where he begot his children and ate his meals and was adjusted to Mary and she to him. Not even his ghost is left. I go to the cemetery and stand in the May sunshine, staring into his tomb. He has gone. . . . And yet in Springfield the very winds murmur his name, the birds chant of him, the folk themselves are indelibly etched with something reminiscent of his pattern. . . .

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Struggling to express him, I am divided from him by the not-to-be-crossed void that separates the great soul from understanding by the common mind. And in comparison with Lincoln all of us who are writing of him or modeling or painting him are common.

He was so near and clear to me, eight years ago when I talked so gliby of him to my father—talked so much and knew so little! But now that I have touched the hem of his mental and spiritual power, he looms too high for my glance to compass. And yet, during the years of seeking, so vital a hold has he taken on my being that I cannot force myself to write of his assassination. I can no longer read, without breaking down, the only lines in the English tongue that seem to me to come nearest to phrasing our feeling for him, Walt Whitman's epic which begins,

When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd
And the great star early drooped in the Western sky in the night,
I mourned, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring . .

and marches on with heart-shattering music to its ending; or to Walt Whitman's perfect epitaph:

This dust was once the man,
Gentle, plain, just and resolute,
under whose cautious hand,
Against the foulest crime in history
known in any land or age,
Was saved the Union of these States.

Big Matt

(Continued from page 23)

"No," he said, thinking swiftly that her presence would be a protection and a source of strength.

On coming in, Matt, doubtless prepared by Squire for Joyce's presence, paused and bowed in his awkward way to her.

"Howdy do, Mrs. Price," he said. "I've known you ever since you was a little girl—can I still call you Joyce?"

"Oh, certainly, do, please," Joyce answered, giving him her hand.

Matt seemed to be about to say something else; Blake, who knew him so well, saw that he was moved, and somewhat shaken. However, to Blake's relief, for the situation was beginning to be as embarrassing for him, and for Joyce, as it was for Matt, the big fellow turned toward him and said:

"Well, John, we lost out."

"Yes, Matt, I know. I'm—"

"Oh, I know how you feel. It's all right. You've stood by me, and I appreciate it. It's no use to talk it over now, only I want to say to you, Joyce, that I don't blame your husband. I don't know whose idea it was—"

"It was my idea, Mr. Holt," Joyce interrupted him to say. "Laurence wanted to stay away. My father here would have advised him to vote against the resolution. I urged him to do what he has done. It's all my doing; if anyone is to be blamed, blame me."

"I'm not blaming anyone, Joyce," said Matt. "It was a clever idea all right—for him, and for the Governor."

He turned then to Blake and said:

"She's a better politician than her father, John."

Look out! Wreckers at work!

A tug at a nerve, a blow at heart or digestion—steadily, the work of destruction goes on. Yet so quietly the victim seldom knows it—until his health crashes. Then, too late, he realizes how Thoughtless Habits—little daily infractions of Nature's laws of living—have been tearing him down.

You can guess the chief of these Thoughtless Habits. Failure to exercise regularly. Getting too little sleep. Eating, not wisely, but too well. Harassing the system with caffein.

This last may seem justifiable. Caffein, you may feel, "picks you up", gives you "new energy".

Actually, caffein deadens the warning signal of fatigue—whips up the nerves—repels sleep—drives the brain on when every natural impulse is crying for rest. The "new energy" is stolen from the body's precious reserve store—stolen and never paid back.

Stop this waste!

It's all so needless! You can eliminate caffein from your diet and still enjoy a hot drink at mealtime. Millions have proved it—with Postum!

For here is a drink hot, wholesome, satisfying. A drink made of roasted whole wheat and bran—not a trace of caffein in it! A drink with a zestful flavor millions prefer.

Give Postum a chance to safeguard your health against artificial stimulants! Make it your mealtime drink for thirty days. See what a difference it makes in the way you feel, in the way you look. Then decide if you will ever go back to mealtime doses of caffein!

Carrie Blanchard, food demonstrator, will help you start your 30-day test.

© 1928, P. Co., Inc.

Postum is one of the Post Health Products, which include also Grape-Nuts, Post Toasties, Post's Bran Flakes and Post's Bran Chocolate. Your grocer sells Postum in two forms. Instant Postum, made in the cup by adding boiling water, is one of the easiest drinks in the world to prepare. Postum Cereal is also easy to make, but should be boiled 20 minutes.

Carrie Blanchard's offer

"Let me send you, free, one week's supply of Postum, with my personal directions for preparing it, as a start on the 30-day test.

"Or if you would rather begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. It costs much less than most other mealtime drinks—only one-half cent a cup.

"Please indicate on the coupon whether you prefer Instant Postum, made instantly in the cup, or Postum Cereal, the kind you boil."

MAIL THE COUPON NOW!

P.—A.M-2-28

Postum Company, Incorporated, Battle Creek, Mich.

I want to make a thirty-day test of Postum. Please send me, without cost or obligation, one week's supply of Instant Postum (prepared instantly in the cup) . . . . . ☐ Check which you prefer

Postum Cereal (prepared by boiling) . . . . . ☐

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....

In Canada, address Canadian Postum Company, Ltd. 812 Metropolitan Bldg., Toronto 2, Ontario.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

© 1927, U. S. C. & F. Co.

MEET the emergency BEFORE it meets YOU

Always carry in your car a set of

McKAY

TIRE CHAINS

McK

Treat 'em rough — they like it

McKAY RED BEAD BUMPERS

Here's another way to meet the emergency—with sturdy, shock resisting McKay Red Bead Bumpers. Besides safety, they will "add good looks and protect good looks." There's a McKay Bumper for every type of car.

McKAY SPRING CONTROLLERS

Put an end to bumping and jumping with McKay Spring Controllers. Simple and easy to install, yet inexpensive, McKays do the work. For Fords, $5.00. For other cars, $6.50 and $8.00. Prices higher west of Rockies.

NATIONAL AUTOMOBILE SHOW—1928
Chicago, Ill., January 28th-February 4th, Spaces 120-121

UNITED STATES CHAIN & FORGING COMPANY — U.S. CHAIN CO. — UNION TRUST BUILDING PITTSBURGH, PA.

Manufacturers of
INDUSTRIAL AND COMMERCIAL CHAINS FOR EVERY PURPOSE

Then the smile faded, and Matt, striking one hand against the other, hesitated a moment, and said:

"Well, I guess there's nothing more to do to-night," then turned and left the room.

They watched Matt's big form disappear through the door. His broad shoulders seemed to sag, his strong back to droop wearily, and in his bearing there was a discouragement that Blake had never seen before.

Blake looked at Joyce.

"Do you think," he ventured to ask, "that he—is guilty?"

Joyce looked at him, and he looked at Joyce for a long moment. Joyce shrugged her shoulders.

THE sessions of the extraordinary court raised by Pedley's resolution were held in the largest of the Senate committee-rooms. Blake, of course, did not attend the hearings, for his presence would not have been in keeping with that dignified attitude of judicial aloofness which he had assumed; he had to be content with what Squire could report to him after each session, and with what he could read in the reports published by the newspapers.

Matt, to his relief, he must own, had kept away, but he was glad that, according to Squire's account, Matt bore himself with all his old bluff assurance, and presented to his accusers his large face, impassive and bland as ever.

But the critical moment would not come until Matt took the witness stand; and on that day the committee-room could not hold the crowd that gathered.

Squire had reported at midday that Matt had borne himself very well, and, under this encouraging impression, Blake, as he was going through the corridors of the Statehouse that afternoon, walked 'round by the committee-room where Pedley's court was sitting. When those in the crowd about the door saw him, they would have made way for him, but he signed to them not to—to respect his incognito.

He did, however, approach near enough to catch, between the hulking shoulders of two fellows who filled the doorway, a glimpse of the scene within—Pedley's dark, sallow face, poised over the green felt covering of the long table—Fenshard, scowling importantly and portentously, rummaging among his notes, running his fingers through his hair.

And there was old Matt, calm, collected, cool, in his large arm chair. He had his old friend, Judge Wilkinson, of Allen County, at his elbow, to represent him as counsel; the judge would lean over toward Matt now and then, and whisper some word of advice. Matt would nod rather indifferently, and then square himself in his chair, cross his legs, fold his hands complacently in his lap, turn slightly to one side and, with a kind of naïve innocence and disarming candor, present to the scowling Fenshard that large, fleshy, blank face.

Fenshard would look at him; their eyes would meet, then Fenshard would look at some papers that lay on the table, pick up a lead pencil, turn it end for end, over and over, and resume the examination. He was asking Matt about his duties, about the organization of his office, and finally about certain transactions in which various public service corporations in the State were concerned.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

These questions, of course, as Blake knew, were to lead up to the principal transaction in which it was expected to find irregularities; but to each one of them, Matt, after long deliberation, pondering his answer, would reply, simply, and with an almost official impersonality:

"That is a matter of public record in my office."

Matt made this reply to question after question; its baffling monotony amused the crowd and angered Fenshard. In fact, the thing was going very well; Blake felt that the sympathies of the crowd were with Matt.

"Mr. Holt," said Fenshard presently, "I will ask you if there were any transactions concerning the increased rates to be charged by the Consolidated Light and Power Company that were not recorded in your office?"

The room was very still and very hot. Matt gravely asked the stenographer to repeat the question, and then, after long consideration, said:

"No."

Fenshard put the question in different forms, and each time Matt considered, asked the stenographer to read the question, and answered:

"No."

And at last Fenshard lost his temper.

"Mr. Holt," he demanded, "do you ever play poker?"

"WE object to that question!" shouted Judge Wilkinson. But Matt put out a restraining hand.

"Do you ever play poker?" demanded Fenshard again.

Matt paused, thought, asked the stenographer to read the question, waited, and then said:

"Yes."

The crowd laughed, and Pedley threatened to clear the room.

"Is that a matter of public record, Mr. Holt?" asked Fenshard, with withering sarcasm.

"No," replied Matt, slowly, solemnly, without changing his expression, "it's a matter of common knowledge!"

The crowd roared; Blake had to laugh himself, and though he felt that it was dangerous for him to be there—what, for instance, if the reporters were to see him and make a "story" of it?—he could not leave. Fenshard waited for the laugh to die away, and then asked:

"Mr. Holt, are you acquainted with a gentleman by the name of Hugh Garrett?"

Everyone in that hot, crowded place hung on Matt's reply.

"Yes," said Matt simply.

"Have you ever played poker with him?"

"Yes."

"Did you play with him sometime during the month of June last at the Hotel Stanley?"

"Most likely."

"And how much money did you receive from him that night?"

Matt looked at Fenshard, and for once his bald face changed; it suddenly assumed an expression of something like pity, when he replied, confidentially, and as one deserving sympathy:

"Why, Grant, you know that when a feller plays poker with Hugh, he always

"If you want real value, let me put a set of Kelly-Springfields on your car. They don't cost any more than you paid for those tires you have on now."

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The average reading time of this advertisement is only 16 seconds.

What price Indifference ?

Perhaps you can "get by" sometimes without WEED Chains. But eventually a skid will come in a split-second—perhaps to smash and take life.

Costly indifference—The Devil Indifference—that's the chief cause of skidding accidents which send thousands to hospitals and funeral homes. Indifference seduces the driver, then betrays him. Indifference says: "Just be a little careful and you can get by without chains."

But when rubber slips, and the car goes into a skid, The Devil Indifference does not put WEED gripping steel chains on the wheels.

Don't be Indifferent —

Use WEED CHAINS

AMERICAN CHAIN COMPANY, Inc.
BRIDGEPORT, CONNECTICUT
In Canada
Dominion Chain Company, Limited, Niagara Falls, Ont.

loses; you know how it is yourself."

In the laughter that Pedley tried his best to silence with his gavel the Governor thought it best to get away. He had seen and heard enough to know that public opinion was veering 'round in Matt's favor.

It proved, in fact, to be the turning point of the investigation. Fenshard questioned Matt all that afternoon, and all the next morning, pitted his wits against Matt's, but to no purpose; Matt sat there, calmly denying everything, presenting that innocent face with its baffling, almost Oriental, inscrutability.

Pedley questioned him, but, after Fenshard (Squire said), Pedley was easy for Matt. In fact, when they met casually the next morning in the rotunda of the State House, Fenshard and Blake, Fenshard said:

"Matt's the toughest witness I ever tackled in all my experience at the bar. Fact is, I'm beginning to believe there's nothing in all this."

"I never thought there was," said Blake, in the dignified, rather superior and somewhat offended tone that he felt he could now take with Fenshard.

EVER since the committee had begun its hearings, Matt had kept away from the Governor's chambers, and Blake thought it rather decent in him. But the following afternoon, returning a little earlier than usual from his luncheon, Blake found Matt there, leaning over Squire's desk in whispered consultation, casting uncertain, questioning glances at the Governor's door now and then.

And something in Matt's attitude touched Blake's sympathies; he felt sorry for Matt, a kind of affectionate pity, as for one in trouble, and asked him into his private room. Matt went with him and sat down heavily, with an air of weariness.

It was not quite the Matt that Blake had seen testifying before the committee the day before; the old buoyant and confident manner was gone. He felt, for the first time in his life, stronger than Matt.

"Well, Matt," he said, "everyone says that you came through with colors flying. Fenshard told me himself that you were the most difficult witness he ever undertook to cross-examine."

"What'd he take me for, an easy mark? Did he think that all he had to do was to ask me, and I'd spill everything I knew? Thunder! But it takes it out of a fellow, to sit there for two days and be grilled."

"Oh, well, it's about over now, Matt," Blake consoled him. "The investigation can't last much longer; I rather suspect they're tired of it. Have they any more witnesses?"

"They'll want to cross-examine Hugh Garrett, I guess."

"Well, your mind and conscience are clear, anyhow," said Blake. "Why should you worry any more?"

"I'm not worrying," said Matt, "about myself. But, with election coming on in the fall, I don't like to think of this thing's affecting you and your administration."

"Now, Matt," protested Blake, generously, "don't think of that. I'm not particularly anxious to be reëlected anyhow."

Matt showed the first spark of his old fire then, when he said:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"But you've got to be reëlected now, after this!"

Perhaps Matt was right; it would never do to retire, or to be defeated now. Things were turning out better than he had expected; his luck was holding.

The subsiding fires of interest in the investigation flared up when Hugh Garrett finally appeared as a witness and presented to the committee a front that, if it did not inspire the sympathy that Matt's had done, was of a blank impassivity even colder than his. But after that, it lagged, hung fire, and, in fact, fizzled out.

It began to be whispered about in cloak-rooms and lobby that the investigation was doing no good. Blake recognized the familiar signs of that occult influence which can hush things up, and decided that the time had come for him to move. He sent for Matt.

"How does Fenshard feel now about his chances for the governorship?" he asked.

"He's got no more chance than a rabbit. He'll be doing well if he can get a renomination for attorney general, and he knows it."

"You aren't against his renomination, are you?" Blake asked.

"'Course not," Matt replied promptly. "Grant's a good fellow; he just got carried away a little by this thing, that's all."

"I'm glad you bear him no ill-will."

"Ill-will won't get a man very far in politics," said Matt, recovering, as Blake was encouraged to note, his old philosophical attitude of mind. "If Grant wants to drop this thing and play the game, I'm ready to let bygones be bygones. Then we can all get together, put up a strong ticket and all go out and work to elect it."

Blake, thus armed by the magnanimous Matt, sent Squire to sound Fenshard, and when he found that the Attorney General was indeed ready to play the game, it was not difficult to win over a majority of the committee.

Blake called in Harnley and one or two members of the committee and, with Fenshard, they agreed upon a committee report that saved the committee's face by reporting some technical irregularities in the conduct of Matt's office, yet imputed no serious blame to him.

The report was made; Pedley was discomfited and silenced; no one paid attention to him any more. The legislature adjourned.

There settled down upon the Capitol that sense of peace and dignity which only the adjournment of the legislature and the scattering of the politicians could produce.

BLAKE, on that June morning, walked through the cool, dim corridors with a sensation of deliverance, thinking of a second term, nursing the strange, persistent illusion of the office holder, that if he can only be reëlected his troubles will all be over. He sat and gossiped a long time with Squire, who was reassuring.

Squire said that the political correspondents of the newspapers were looking forward to a dull campaign: it was an off-year; the people liked the Governor and trusted him; no one would stand the ghost of a show against him. The attack on Matt, which had really been an attack on the Governor, had recoiled, in fact, on those who had made it; Fenshard was

How dare you say, "I have no opportunity"

—when men, through home-study training, are making records such as these?

Harry J. Williams, Accounting Engineer, Lehigh Valley R. R. Mr. Williams chose the Accountancy route, and within comparatively few months won a 60 per cent "raise" and promotion to a position that spells —opportunity.

Ralph H. Berndt, Treasurer and General Manager, W. C. DuComb Co., Inc., Detroit. "LaSalle has been the instrument to my success."

Charles W. Sheldon, Sheridan, Wyoming. At forty Mr. Sheldon, then telegrapher and station agent on the C. B. & Q., left railroad work and took up selling. He increased his income 500 per cent.

YOU seek a better opportunity to get ahead in business—and you want a definite program for advancement, backed by positive proof that that program works!

Listen, then, to these actual experiences —and when you have heard them, tell us, if you can, how you dare to say, "I have no opportunity!"

Mill Man Becomes Auditor—then Treasurer and General Manager

At sixteen, Ralph H. Berndt—his schooling ended with the eighth grade—entered the Carnegie Union Steel Mills.

Six years later he was assistant roller—drawing good wages and with prospect of promotion.

Looking ahead, however, he saw himself "an old man at fifty—and with nothing then to look forward to but retirement and probable poverty."

He writes, "I decided to give my brain a business training. Accordingly, I enrolled with LaSalle for home-study training, gave up the mills forever, and made a humble start in my new profession."

His apprenticeship was short. An opening came with W. C. DuComb Co., Inc., Detroit, as Accountant, then Auditor! Raise followed raise.

In 1925 he was made Treasurer and General Manager, and so highly does he value his LaSalle training that he is now on his second course—in Business Management.

Clerk Becomes Accounting Engineer—Wins 60% Raise

"You've picked a blind alley." That was what many good friends of Harry J. Williams thought when he took a job as clerk with the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

"Blind for some, perhaps," said Harry Williams, "but not for the man with the specialized training!"

Acting on his conviction, he enrolled with LaSalle for Higher Accountancy training—and soon won the position of Accounting Engineer, with an increase in salary of better than 60 per cent.

"Mr. Williams proves exceptionally competent in his new capacity," writes Francis N. Loughnane, Division Engineer. "He shows marked ability and is a very creditable product of your great university."

Send for These Free Books

You will find it of vital importance to learn more of the success-methods which Berndt and Williams and thousands of others have employed so profitably.

We have therefore prepared a special 64-page book which outlines these methods in detail. It also points out the big opportunities in the field you are in or wish to enter—shows you how you can fit yourself to grasp them. The coupon brings it to you free.

Measure your will to succeed by what you do with this coupon—NOW!

LaSalle Extension University

THE WORLD'S LARGEST BUSINESS TRAINING INSTITUTION

Find Yourself Through LaSalle

LA SALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY, Dept. 233-R CHICAGO

I would welcome an outline of the LaSalle plan, together with a copy of "Ten Years' Promotion in One," all without obligation.

- ☐ Business Management: Managerial, Sales and Executive positions
- ☐ Higher Accountancy
- ☐ Expert Bookkeeping
- ☐ C. P. A. Coaching
- ☐ Modern Salesmanship
- ☐ Traffic Management
- ☐ Railway Station Management
- ☐ Modern Business Correspondence
- ☐ Stenography—Stenotypy
- ☐ Law: LL.B. Degree
- ☐ Industrial Management
- ☐ Modern Foremanship
- ☐ Personnel Management
- ☐ Banking and Finance
- ☐ Credit and Collection Correspondence
- ☐ Business English ☐ Effective Speaking
- ☐ Commercial Law ☐ Commercial Spanish
- ☐ Telegraphy—Railway and Commercial

free! mail coupon now

Name Present Position Address

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

You can keep the thick hair of youth!

You needn't go on losing hair!

Not yet alarming, perhaps—that slightly-thin hair—but prophetic!

So soon thinning hair becomes noticeable—threatens to become baldness . . .

Yet you can check even pronounced loss of hair—make even markedly thin hair regain thickness and vigor—with this daily care—

EVERY MORNING wet your hair and scalp thoroughly with Pinaud's Eau de Quinine. Then with your fingers pressed down firmly, move the scalp vigorously in every direction, working the tonic into every inch of the scalp. Move the scalp, not the fingers! Brush the hair while still moist. It will lie smoothly just the way you want it.

This refreshing treatment removes the two things which cause thinning, dead-looking hair—dandruff and poor scalp circulation.

Swiftly reviving the tired blood vessels that have lain down on the job of nourishing the roots of your hair—destroying completely the germ of dandruff infection—the Pinaud treatment helps your hair to grow strongly—thickly—to be young-looking, well-looking.

Buy Pinaud's Eau de Quinine today at your drug or department store. Look for the signature of Ed. Pinaud in red on the bottle. Pinaud, Paris, New York.

PINAUD'S Eau de Quinine

Copr., 1928, Pinaud, Inc.

already kept busy explaining that he had only done his duty. And Pedley? Why, Pedley was finished; done for; Pedley was a joke.

Matt came sauntering in, and Blake's heart warmed at sight of him, as in the old days. Matt sat down, and looked at Blake with an unsteady eye; then Matt began to smile, a queer, confidential, and rather sheepish smile, as though there were some amusing secret between them. Matt passed his hand over his chin with a gesture that somehow gave him a crafty and cunning expression.

And suddenly Blake had a vague and confused sense of trouble; he wondered just what this disagreeable expression of Matt's was intended to intimate. Then, all at once, he realized that Matt was a little drunk.

"Well, John," Matt was saying, "here we are again. What'd I tell you? We've wriggled out of that scrape all right."

The reference to the scandal, Matt's flippant way of speaking of it and, more than all, the fleering little laugh that Matt gave, struck Blake unpleasantly. However, it would be more comfortable to forget the scandal, if he could.

"Oh well, Matt, that's over now."

"Yes," said Matt. And then, after a pause, he added: "We were lucky to get out of it as easy as we did, I reckon."

Matt lapsed into another silence, from which he emerged, as though by an effort, when he said:

"I GUESS that maybe you won't want me to take too prominent a part in the campaign; they might say things, you see, after all that's happened, think perhaps that I was getting a little too brash."

"Nonsense, Matt!" cried Blake. "What are you talking about? You've been fully exonerated, and I want them to know what I think of you!"

Matt's face seemed to expand, almost to grow larger in the expression of satisfaction that slowly overspread it. But he shook his head. "It's good of you," he said, "and I'd like nothing better, but—it wouldn't be good politics. I'd better not be too conspicuous. I'm a dog with a bad name, you know, John, no matter what I do. The people like you, but they won't stand for me; and they'd like you just a leetle better if you wouldn't. I'm much obliged, all the same." He paused, and his face grew red with a sudden surge of anger.

"It's that fellow Pedley!" Matt burst forth. "I'm going to get him—I'm going to spend the whole campaign in his district, camping on his trail, and I'll get him!"

And Matt swore, while Blake, in the flash of light that Matt's words threw on the subject, said, somewhat disillusioned:

"Oh, it's that, is it?"

"Well, not altogether," Matt replied. "Fact is, John, I've been thinking, now it's all over, that perhaps I'd better retire the first of the year, when you enter upon your second term."

"But why?" exclaimed Blake. He was surprised, though on second thought somewhat relieved; or he would have been if this sudden turn of affairs, this decision of Matt, so little like him, had not made him pause and wonder.

"I'm sick of it all. There's nothing in politics for a fellow like me."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Oh come, Matt!" exclaimed Blake. "What's the matter with you? You couldn't let politics alone if you tried!"

But Matt shook his head.

"No," he went on, "I've got a bellyful. I'm going to retire."

"But what are you going to do? And what," said Blake, "am I going to do without you?"

Matt looked up quickly with a glance of contrite appreciation.

"It's mighty fine of you, Governor," he said. "If I've been able to do anything for you, I'm glad and proud. But I'm afraid I can't do you any good, and I might do you harm. You're going on and up; you won't need me any longer."

Blake was about to protest, but Matt raised a hand to stay him.

"No, I'm going to retire; I'm going to buy a farm down in Allen County. You remember the Forbes farm? Well, I'm going to buy it and settle down to spend the rest of my days. 'Course, I may dabble a little in local politics; whenever you want the Allen County delegation it'll be for you, if I got anything to say."

Blake didn't quite fully realize, at first, the implications of what Matt had just said. And then, suddenly, a black suspicion spread its devastation over his soul. He looked at Matt; their eyes met.

"WHY, Matt," he exclaimed, "where on earth did you get the money to buy a farm?"

Matt's glance wavered; his large red face was suddenly swept by a purple blush; his unsteady eyes were turned away, and he replied:

"Oh, I'm going to buy it on a mortgage."

He turned, and by an effort fixed his eyes on the Governor's, not in the old gaze of affection and understanding, but in that cold stare with which Matt had bluffed his way through all the difficult situations that had confronted him thus far in life. He swayed slightly in his chair, and his eyelids drooped heavily.

"What's the matter, John?" he said, presently. "What ails you?"

"Nothing, Matt," Blake replied. "But something's the matter with you. You're drunk, that's what's the matter."

Matt wearily put his hand to his forehead.

"I did drink a little more'n was good for me," he admitted. "I met up with Hugh Garrett last night; we got to opening champagne."

"Well, you'd better go to bed and stay there."

"There's nothing to be scared of, John," said Matt. "I haven't bought the farm yet; you needn't worry. You don't think I'd give myself away that easy, do you?"

They were silent for a long moment, and sat there looking at each other.

"My heavens, Matt!" exclaimed Blake, finally. "You don't mean to tell me—"

Matt had fixed his eyes on him once more in that stare that had served him so long; but somewhere now in their depths the Governor saw the answer, and with it a blasting certainty possessed him.

"I haven't told you anything, have I?" said Matt. "What do you take me for?"

It was true, then, all true! The truth had leapt into Matt's blue eyes, try as he would to keep it back!

LUDEN'S

first aid to voices that dare not be muffled by any cough or cold

LUDEN'S give quick relief. When your throat is dry and husky—when it feels hot and raw all the way down—take a Luden's.

As it melts in your mouth you feel the cooling, soothing, refreshing Luden's Menthol Action, spreading gently over the tender membranes through nose and throat.

Thirty seconds from cough to comfort—your voice is clear again.

Luden's—kept fresh and handy in the triple-sealed yellow package.

WM. H. LUDEN, Inc.
Reading, Pa.

5¢

Send 25c for de luxe golden metal carrier for dress occasions. Refill from regular package.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

George Wanted Money- I Pay Him --Plenty

Louis George Illinois

$10,000 a year is what I paid Louis George, Illinois, for the last three years. This year he says he is going to earn $20,000.—And before he accepted our offer he was earning only $35 a week!

ANY MAN CAN GET This Money From Me

I paid L. D. Payne, Iowa, $4,500 for his first 200 days with me—he is still averaging from $500 to $650 a month. Putnam of a small Michigan town averages $600 every month. Many others averaging from $6,500 to $10,000 a year in this big pay field—the field of Fire Prevention.

Ray C. Hahn
Sales Director

AMAZING DISCOVERY
DOUBLES AND TREBLES INCOMES

Latest discovery by Fyr-Fyter chemists has doubled and trebled the incomes of our men and has made it necessary to make an immediate addition of 250 men to our sales force. No experience needed—no capital required. The successful applicants who can furnish good character references will be assigned to good paying territories at once—income to start immediately. Complete training, entire Fire Prevention working outfit will be furnished, and our whole organization will back you up with profit-making plans.

TELL THIS WONDERFUL STORY

As a Fyr-Fyter representative you will have a marvelous story to tell. Among our customers are such as Ford Motor Co., Diamond Match Co., Bethlehem Steel Corp., Eastman Kodak Co., International Harvester Co., Standard Oil Co., and thousands of other nationally known companies. The U. S. Government alone has purchased 260,000 Fyr-Fyters. Every store, garage, school, hospital, home, factory or farm is a prospect. Our national advertising helps you to make quick sales. National, State and City governments cooperate.

NEEDED AT ONCE

We must add 250 men at once! Send coupon today for full information and details of our generous money-making plan for men who have good character.

MAIL TODAY

Ray C. Hahn, Director of Sales
FYR-FYTER CO.,
1-B Fyr-Fyter Bldg. - Dayton, Ohio

Ray C. Hahn, Director of Sales
FYR-FYTER COMPANY
1-B Fyr-Fyter Bldg. - Dayton, Ohio.
Send full information about representatives plan and application for territory.

Name.....
Address.....
City.....State.....

There was no more calm, no more peace, no more dignity even, for him; the very light of June had gone out of the day; a cold fear pressed constantly under his heart, forcing it into his throat; he found it hard to get his breath.

At luncheon that day, his wife was talking about a holiday; they would go North, up to Mackinac. Of course they wouldn't go until after the nomination. The campaign wouldn't open until October; and, anyhow, everybody said that his reëlection was already assured.

He waited until the butler left the dining-room, and then said:

"I don't think that I'll run for reelection."

Mrs. Blake laid down her knife and fork and looked across the table at him in angry surprise.

"Why, what do you mean, John Blake?" she exclaimed. "Not run again! The idea! What do you mean?"

But he couldn't tell her.

"Oh, I'm tired of politics," he had to be content with saying.

Blake mildly broached the subject to Squire, just to see how he would take it.

"Not run again!" Squire looked at him aghast. "Why, Governor, you can't get out of running!"

In some way the rumor got about that he was loath to run again; Fenshard came to see him, and Lewis, the lieutenant governor, and Doc Sloane—everybody whose interests would be affected by his retirement—and urged him not to think of such a thing.

Then, one morning, Matt came. He was quite his old self again, sober, masterful, and a trifle severe, as though nothing had happened.

"What's this I hear," he demanded, as he closed the door behind him, "about your not running again?"

"Sit down, Matt," said Blake calmly, and Matt dropped into the chair by the Governor's desk, and sat there staring at him in a kind of indignant wonder and incredulity.

"Well?" said Matt. "There isn't anything in it, is there?"

"Yes, Matt, there is," said Blake, "there's a lot in it. How can I afford to run again after—after what has happened? To go before the people now—with what I know! I'd be a fool!" And under the stress of his feeling he got up and began to pace the floor.

Matt sat and looked at him, in silence. Then, presently, he said:

"Look here, John. You mustn't take it so tragically. I'm sorry, sorry for the scrape I got into, but that's over now. There's only one way to bring it back to life again, and that's for you to let this talk of your not running again go on. If you do that, you'll rouse suspicion, and then what'll happen, no one knows.

"MY LORD, man, you got to run! You can't get out of it! You can't give any reason for not running; you daren't give the reason you give to me—that would be fatal to you and to the party, to say nothing of me. And it would amount to the same thing, if you refused to run for any other reason or for no reason. You'd destroy the party in the state; it wouldn't come back to power again for twenty years; it would hurt the party in the nation."

"Pardon me, Matt," said the Governor, "but you ought to have thought of that before!"

He thought that Matt winced, and there was satisfaction in that. Matt, however, only nodded acquiescence, remarked that accidents would happen, and went calmly, remorselessly on:

"But that doesn't change your position. You aren't responsible for what I've done or haven't done; I told you that I'd lay low during the campaign and resign immediately after election; but if you get cold feet and quit now, you'll only identify yourself with something nobody holds you responsible for. You've got to brace up, get hold of your nerve, and go to it!"

Blake stopped by the window and looked at Matt. The large face was turned implacably toward him, the blue eyes were fixed on him, the wide mouth was set in stubborn will. There was something so inevitable, so definitive, in Matt's words when he was in this mood. Blake went to his chair and sank into it.

He felt himself in the toils of his own past, caught in the net that he and Matt had woven in those years before he reached the Executive Mansion. There was no escape.

AFTER Blake's renomination, by acclamation, in a convention that rocked with cheers and noise for a quarter of an hour, Matt said to him:

"What'd I tell you?"

His popularity, however, was now only a pain and reproach to him. Each morning he expected that the day would see the exposure of Matt's guilt; each evening he was surprised and grateful that it had not done so.

When he opened the campaign, and thought of speaking, he was hag-ridden by the fear of exposure, of some ugly contretemps, if not some appalling and irretrievable disaster. The thought of the merciless hecklers he could too easily imagine, turned him cold and limp.

Yet, what could he do? Demand Matt's resignation at once—here in the midst of the campaign, on the very eve of election, and thus wreck his own career and his party's chances?

Matt had insisted that he take no very prominent part in the campaign, and Blake had designated Harnley as manager of his campaign. But Matt had gone to the city and was hard at work, in his secret, cunning way, at headquarters, "organizing up," as he phrased it; Matt wrote him a brief letter every day; at first he had feared to open these letters, but they were all of the most reassuring kind.

And as autumn advanced and the campaign gathered momentum, Blake felt more certain of victory. He spoke everywhere, to large crowds. Joyce often went with him, and made a pretty picture, sitting on the platform. It was a comfort to Blake to have her near him; he could do better with Joyce there; and then, as Matt had observed, there was no vote-getter like a pretty woman sitting on the platform.

But, gradually, as the campaign wore on, it came to have for Blake a significance deeper than a mere desire for votes. Speaking daily, as he did, in the country districts and in the small towns that form the unit of society in the Middle West, memories of his boyhood, long dormant

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

FIRST STAR—"They tell me you'll endorse any cigarette for a consideration . . ."

SECOND STAR—"Sure, so long as the consideration isn't that I give up my Chesterfields!"

© 1928, LIGGETT & MYERS TOBACCO CO.

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The drink that has outgrown seasons

Drink Coca-Cola Delicious and Refreshing

The Coca-Cola Company, Atlanta, Ga.

More than that—it has outgrown geography—until it is now the all-year-round drink everywhere, with an average of 8 million refreshing drinks per day throughout the year.

Playing, working, walking, talking make you welcome a pause for this one great drink with that delicious taste and cool aftersense of refreshment—one little minute that's long enough for a big rest.

8 million a day

The Best Served Drink in the World

A pure drink of natural flavors served ice-cold in a patented bottle—the bottle you can identify even in the dark. Every bottle sterilized, filled and sealed air-tight by automatic machines, without the touch of human hands—insuring purity.

IT HAD TO BE GOOD TO GET WHERE IT IS

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

in his unconsciousness, were awakened.

As he looked out over the fields with their dried weeds, their stubble, their tepees of tasseled corn, to the woods in their red and bronze splendor, he would say to Joyce that autumn was the loveliest time of the year, "and," he would add, "this State is the finest in the Union."

He seemed to realize his State more than he had ever done, to possess it, to feel it a part of him, as he was the product and a part of it; it was a sense of local patriotism, greater, or at least, more vivid, more emotive, than that which he felt for the Nation.

The entity, called by the unpoetic name "United States" was somehow too vast, too continental, for his imagination; he had an affection for it of course, and gave it his patriotic loyalty. But his State, with its pretty Indian name, was somehow different; he was devoted to it, proud of it, loved it with an intimate, personal love. When the band played the State song, it brought tears to his eyes.

HE WAS to close his speaking tour at a mass meeting in the city on the Friday night before the election, and he intended to sum up and to elaborate, in this last speech of the campaign, the new civic ideas that had come to him with all the force of a spiritual revelation.

And so, on Friday morning, with his wife and Eddie, and Squire, he journeyed down to the city, elaborating the peroration to his great speech on the way. Joyce, who now lived in the city, would be there of course, and Matt was to meet him at his hotel.

Matt had gone home to Allen County on what he vaguely characterized as private business, and should have been in town at an earlier hour than Blake. But when the Governor and his party arrived, Matt was not there.

Blake waited, but it was nearly six o'clock before Matt appeared. He came up to Blake's room without troubling to have himself announced, and as he entered, Blake saw that, once more, Matt had been drinking.

He had rather dreaded the meeting with Matt, and at sight of him, the fear—which had lately been somewhat allayed by the excitement and, as he was beginning to allow himself to feel, the success of his campaign—rose once more like a horrid and menacing apparition.

"Well, John, here we are again. What'd I tell you? The campaign's over, and you've won out."

"The campaign isn't over, Matt. All sorts of things may happen between now and Tuesday. Let's not halloo till we're out of the wood."

But Matt laughed, and shook his head.

"No danger now, John. It's a cinch. I was half afraid that that unlucky scrape of mine might in some way be used against you, and if it had I should have felt like thunder. But it's over and you've won out!"

And Matt sighed, a heavy, gross sigh of relief, as though a regrettable, but not very serious, incident were happily and honourably closed.

BLAKE arrived at the meeting that evening a little late, as he always made it a point to do for the éclat it gave to his entrance. As his party entered the hall, preceded by the policemen who made a way for them through the crowds at the door, the vast audience, catching sight of Blake, broke into cheers that struck him with the force of great waves and, for an instant, almost checked his progress.

This immense and spontaneous greeting created an electrical sensation that tingled through his body, and swept up to the roots of his hair, and, for a second, he was thrilled with exultation and joy. Then he remembered; and something within him seemed to say, "Ah, if only!" And the sense of irony in a moment that in other circumstances might have been one of ecstasy, cast him down in despair.

He wished that they would keep still. He made a gesture of deprecation, but that only caused them to cheer the more. As he mounted the stage, the band in the gallery burst into the lively strains of "Hail to the Chief," and he was glad to gain his seat.

Perhaps it was because the chairman and Senator Morris talked so long that they fatigued the audience, perhaps it was his own sickness and despair; but when he rose Blake felt that the life had gone out of the occasion and out of him.

The speech that he had been preparing all the week had become impossible, its lofty sentiment seemed like a mockery to him; while he had sat there, during those long speeches, that old phrase had begun to ring again through his brain: "Matt Holt is guilty! Matt Holt is guilty!"

He tried to think, but couldn't, and at last, even when the chairman was delivering his speech of introduction, he had no idea of what he was going to say.

He got to his feet; the brasses of the band rose exultant in the strains of the "Star-Spangled Banner;" the crowd stood up, shouted, waved handkerchiefs, and at last settled down to listen. Blake took a sip of water from the glass on the table, trying to still the beating of his heart.

IN THE stillness, to Blake ominous and almost hostile, that had suddenly settled on the multitude, he heard his own voice, and it sounded strange and unnatural:

"Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:"

He bowed right and left, and to those behind him on the stage; and then, somewhat to his own surprise, his voice still sounding strange in his ears, he heard himself saying:

"As I sat here this evening listening to my old friend Senator Morris, that grand old wheel-horse of our party who for so many years and with such distinguished ability and unquestioned authority has represented our great commonwealth in that highest deliberative body in the world, the Senate of the United States, I was reminded—"

It was odd, how one could go on like that, once one had the knack of it, even when one had nothing to say. But presently, with a sickening of the heart, he had that disconcerting sense of losing touch with his audience; the mystic bond that bound those people to him had snapped; they were growing restless and inattentive.

He made a mighty effort, raised his voice. And then, suddenly, there was a slight commotion in the crowd; almost at his feet in the first rows, across the reporters' tables, a rough-looking fellow

OLD MONEY WANTED

We Paid $200 to J. D. Martin of Virginia FOR JUST ONE COPPER CENT

"Please accept my thanks for your check for $200.00 in payment for the copper cent I sent you. I appreciate the interest you have given this transaction. It is a pleasure to do business with a firm that handles matters as you do. I wish to assure you that it will be a pleasure to me to tell all my friends of your wonderful offer for old coins."
JULIAN D. MARTIN, Virginia.

Post yourself! It Pays! We paid Mr. Manning, New York, $2,500 for a single silver dollar. Mrs. G. F. Adams, $740 for some old coins. W. F. Wilharm, Pennsylvania, $13,500 for his rare coins. In the last 20 years we have paid hundreds of others handsome premiums.

All Kinds of Old Coins, Medals, Bills and Stamps WANTED!

$1.00 to $1,000 paid for certain old cents, nickels, dimes, quarters, etc. Right now we will pay $50 for 1913 Liberty Head nickels (not Buffalo), $100 for 1894 dimes, "S" Mint. $8.00 for 1853 quarters, no arrows. $10.00 for 1866 quarters, no motto. $200 each for 1884 and 1885 Silver Trade Dollars. 10 cents each for 1912 "S" Mint nickels, etc., etc.

Big Cash Premiums for Hundreds of Coins now Circulating

There are literally thousands of old coins and bills that we want at once and for which we will pay big cash premiums. Many of these coins are now passing from hand to hand in circulation. Today or tomorrow a valuable coin may come into your possession. Watch Your Change. Know what to look for.

You Will Open Your Eyes When You Read Our Large Illustrated Coin Folder

Send 4 cents. We will send at once our highly illustrated and interesting Coin Folder. WRITE TODAY for this eye-opening large, valuable wealth of information on the profits that have been made from old money. No obligation on your part. You have nothing to lose—everything to gain.

Send this COUPON Now

Numismatic Company of Texas, Dept. 254, Fort Worth, Texas.

Please send me your large Illustrated Coin Folder for which I enclose 4 cents.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Lilac protects your skin

Open doors to infection

those invisible nicks

You can't see them—those invisible nicks of the razor that give germs and dust their chance at your skin!

So, apparently without warning, little infections develop.

Try this pleasant daily precaution: dash Pinaud's Lilac all over your face after each shave . . . Your skin is always smoothly clear!

Lilac is antiseptic yet healing. The same wonderful ingredients, newly processed make Lilac blander than ever.

You can buy Pinaud's Lilac at all drug or department stores. Buy it today! The genuine Lilac has the signature of Ed. Pinaud in red on the bottle. Pinaud, Paris, New York.

PINAUD'S LILAC

[Lilas de France]

Copr., 1928, Pinaud, Inc.

with a shock of black hair, half-way rising in his seat with the air of a heckler, was looking straight at him. And Blake waited, certain that now, at last, the fatal phrase was to be publicly flung back at him, like an echo of his predominant thought. In the tense stillness the man shouted:

"Don't wear yourself out, John! You're elected now!"

BLAKE'S own vast relief was expressed in that broad smile which had never failed to charm the crowd; the crowd itself laughed, and that laugh saved him. That laugh, and something else, for just at that moment, away at the back of the hall, his large red face standing out vividly amidst all the blurred mass of faces, head and shoulders above the crowd, Blake saw Matt.

He must have come in late and found no other place in which to listen to the speaking. And, at sight of him, Blake felt himself drawn toward Matt, identified with him, his other self, as though the rest were gone, and he and Matt were alone.

"Well, my friends," he said, as he began to speak again, "I shall not pretend that I am not weary. I could lay down, here and now, so far as I personally am concerned, the cares of my office without much regret. I will not pretend to say what I have been in the governor's office; I can't tell you what, if I am to be called to that place again, I shall be. But I can tell you what I should like to be."

A queerish stillness had fallen. He felt the attention of the crowd concentrate and fix itself anew on him, the mystic bond was reëstablished; and his speech came back to him, not as he had composed it, but sublimated into something nobler and purer than studied periods could produce, a speech of sincerity, full of haunting echoes of regret, for a great occasion missed, a great task unachieved, a great ideal unrealized.

He spoke of his State, of what he should have liked to be and do for it and for its people; and he spoke not so much to the audience as to Matt, away back there against the wall, straining forward more and more, his face grown pale. The crowd could not have known all that he meant; but Matt knew.

He did not know how long he spoke; he was not aware of time; time, for this once, seemed to have paused, and in an intense silence that throbbed with emotion, Blake was conscious of that vast area of rapt and earnest faces, turned up to him and, as though suspended over them all, the large face of Matt, white now against the wall.

He came to the end; and turning, for an instant, to those on the platform, he caught a glimpse of Senator Morris's face, lifted in uncomprehending amazement; then of Joyce's face, thrust forward, the tears streaming down it.

He was bowing; the crowd sat there, motionless, still rapt by the spell of his sincerity and his feeling; and then, suddenly, they all broke out in applause and stood up to acclaim him, shutting out that last glimpse of Matt's face.

When they got back to the hotel, Blake went up to his sitting-room a moment before joining the others in the restaurant, and presently a bell-boy came to tell him that a "gentleman wanted to see him." And there was Matt. He stood there until the boy had gone out and closed the door, and when they were alone he came forward, took Blake's hand, and said:

"John." Then Matt bit his lip, and couldn't speak for a long, painful moment. "John," Matt began again, and then stammered, "I daren't even ask you to forgive me—I—I—" But Matt could not go on; he could only stand there, bite his lip, and cling desperately to Blake's hand, as though to his last stay on earth.

"Don't, Matt, don't," pleaded Blake, laying his hand on Matt's shoulder.

But Matt clung to him, the tears streaming down his large cheeks.

"Aren't you coming down to supper?" It was Joyce bursting into the room.

But, at the strange scene, with a surprised and apologetic, "Oh!" she shrank back into the doorway.

"Come in, Joyce," Blake said gently, and then, in the pity that had quite overwhelmed him—the only feeling he had in Matt's case now—he said, trying to give his invitation a casual air:

"You'll join us, won't you, Matt?"

In Matt's eyes he saw all the old adoration of him, but Matt made no reply; he only looked at him, in despair, wrung his hand again and, without a word, turned and left the room. Blake watched him disappear through the doorway, and then turned to meet Joyce's questioning eyes.

"I guess I said something in my speech that affected him."

"You said something that affected us all," said Joyce quietly, as she took his arm in hers and hugged it to her.

IN JANUARY Blake entered upon his second term, and in that larger prestige which his victory had given him he dominated his party absolutely. He was more popular than ever; his fame had spread beyond the borders of his State, it was predicted that he would be the candidate of his party for the Presidency in the next election.

He was penetrated by a new feeling of assurance and self-confidence; he could look forward to the ensuing term with security; a new sense of freedom and of power permeated him; now he could do something, make a record, have things his own way. He had Matt's resignation in his pocket, but he wasn't going to announce the fact just yet.

And then, as he was basking in this warm atmosphere of approval and popularity, one afternoon in January Squire appeared, carefully shut the door behind him, and presented a solemn, tragic face—that white face, with the compressed lips, which made Blake's heart stop beating for a second.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Do you know anything about this fellow Whateley?"

"The prosecutor of this county?"

"Yes. Have you heard?"

"Heard what?" Why didn't Squire speak out, or else keep still altogether? His heart was going now like a trip-hammer.

"Well, he's bringing Matt's case up before the Grand Jury. Pedley's back of it all. They say they'll get him this time. He has bought a farm down in Allen County. . . ."

(To be concluded)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Watch the boss's hands...

Funny thing about bosses — when caught off their guard they are as easy to embarrass as the rest of us.

And it's enough to make anyone ill at ease, to be conscious of hands or cuffs that aren't nearly as clean as they should be.

Even if he didn't have other good reasons, the big chief has learned that he simply can't afford to be careless.

For that matter, who can?

There's self-assurance in SOAP & WATER

PUBLISHED BY THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN SOAP AND GLYCERINE PRODUCERS, INC., TO AID THE WORK OF CLEANLINESS INSTITUTE

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Which Road to Knowledge Would HE Choose Today?

THERE'S immortality in store for the name of the man who can wrest knowledge from books by the flickering light of a cabin fireside and climb to the highest position in the land.

But there are few parents, indeed, who would care to have their children follow the same route today. Instead, many of them prefer to make certain their children's college education by providing funds through Provident Mutual Life Insurance.

There's a very unusual book published by Provident Mutual entitled "Seven Keys to Contentment". One of the Keys opens the way to the education of children through life insurance. Write for your free copy of this book today.

"Low Rate—Low Cost"

Provident Mutual

Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia, Penna.

Founded 1865

©P.M.L.I.Co. 1927

Uncle Ambrose

(Continued from page 15)

has been engaged, year in and year out, for decade after decade, in the compilation of two great books. One is the "Life and Letters of Captain Barton Wilkinson," and the other is the "History of the Settlement and Development of Washington County." The authorship of these books constitute his literary career—his literary career as distinct from the cards he writes to the papers, which constitute his career as a publicist.

He refers to the two books as "My major opi, sir." He is still working on the books and they are not yet ready for publication. Peculiar difficulties attend their composition, and it has been my privilege on numerous occasions to assist Uncle Ambrose and Aunt Kate in conferences in which these weighty problems were discussed.

Aunt Kate is supremely loyal, and never impatient, but I think she sometimes vaguely wonders if thirty years is not rather a long time to give to the production of any book. Uncle Ambrose would not for one minute admit, even to himself, that he is getting a trifle tired of the late Barton Wilkinson, and probably does not know it about himself; but I fear that such is the case.

"The trouble, Kittie," I can hear him explaining in one of the conferences in his study, "the trouble, Kittie, is that the early history of Washington County is so mixed up with the history of the Wilkinson family—of your family, little sweetheart—that it is almost impossible to separate the two."

"I thought we got them separated in your notes last year, Ambrose dear," says Aunt Kate.

At least once a year it has been necessary for Uncle Ambrose and Aunt Kate to give the notes and manuscripts a complete overhauling, and unscramble the two books.

But they always merge together again.

"IT IS very annoying," says Uncle Ambrose, "to write a series of lengthy chapters, after a vast deal of research, and then find myself unable to determine which of the books these chapters really belong in."

"Why don't you," I suggested one time, "just simply let nature take its course, and allow the two books to become one if they want to?"

Both Aunt Kate and Uncle Ambrose looked at me with pain and shock in their faces; and I realized an instant later that what I had uttered had struck them as almost sacrilegious. For it amounted to taking away from Barton Wilkinson the individual and distinctive tribute planned for him.

"There is another difficulty," said Uncle Ambrose, sighing somewhat wistfully and shaking his head. And he told me of it. It seems that some of these old chapters really seem to belong to a third book, a book which he had never planned to produce, and for which he has no title. A book which, in fact, perversely insists on coming into existence almost in spite of Uncle Ambrose.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Let me read some of those chapters," I requested. I looked them over. There were a great many of them. Uncle Ambrose has, in fact, written enough to fill six or eight large closely-printed volumes, and yet he insists that the surface of the subject is only scratched. As I read the chapters of the third book which he gave me, it dawned upon me what they were—they were really the beginnings of a work the proper title of which should be "The Autobiography of Ambrose Applegate."

I told him and Aunt Kate so. Their faces lighted up, and she exclaimed ecstatically: "Oh, Ambrose dear! You must finish it! How wonderful!"

BUT in a few seconds Uncle Ambrose was shadowed and saddened again, and he sighed. He had seen the impropriety of finishing his autobiography before completing the filial tribute to Captain Barton Wilkinson.

But from that time on I am sure that his vague weariness of Barton Wilkinson began to assume more definite form. I should not say that he was jealous, actually jealous, of the late Barton Wilkinson. But he certainly does see the "Life and Letters of Barton Wilkinson" as a towering barrier to be surmounted before he can settle comfortably to the task of writing the "Autobiography of the Hon. Ambrose Applegate."

Indeed, it was only last year that he led me to a secluded part of the grounds and whispered to me, with an air of guilt:

"It pains me to say so—but in my opinion Barton Wilkinson was not always right in the view he took of public questions. Not always right!"

And then, glancing around like a conspirator, he said:

"This is confidential—your Aunt Kate doesn't know. Kittie shall never know!"

Captain Barton Wilkinson presented a park to the city before he died, and there is a bronze statue of himself in it. A few years ago the proposition came up before the city authorities of setting aside a portion of Wilkinson Park for public playgrounds. It had always been the sort of park that allowed nobody on the grass.

The proposal shocked Uncle Ambrose, and without consulting Aunt Kate about the matter he sat down and wrote "The Banner" as follows:

To the Editor of "The Banner"—Sir: The ruins of the Acropolis at classic Athens present a melancholy spectacle. Greece has fallen! And why? Because the beauty that made her famed has been turned over to the vandal hordes of Huns and hooligans to be trampled into the dust of ages!

Sir, one can but view with alarm the proposition to turn over Wilkinson Park to be polluted by the hoodlum hoi polloi of the slums. Could he but have this proposition called to his attention, the late Captain Barton Wilkinson would turn over in his grave, for he gave this park to his beloved city to be a perpetual beauty spot, where the voices of feathered songsters might vie with the laughter of tinkling fountains as they fell upon the ear, and the eyes be gladdened with grass, trees, flowers, and other herbage.

A thing of beauty is a joy forever!

How long will this park last if it is invaded by playgrounds? Two or three years of wanton orgy in the way of baseball, football, swings, foot-racing, marbles, leap frog, tag, etc., to say nothing of more deleterious sports, and the desecration will be complete. Let the people DON'T wait for stiffness or lameness to set in. Rub in Absorbine, Jr. It immediately relieves the ache and pain. It reduces the inflammation. It stimulates nature to heal. It shortens the period of recovery.

There are many times you will need Absorbine, Jr. Keep it handy in the medicine cabinet. Use it for Sore Throat—Aches and Pains, Cuts, Scratches and Abrasions, Burns, Scalds—and as a daily gargle and mouthwash (diluted).

At all druggists' $1.25. Hospital size, $2.50
Send for free trial bottle

W. F. YOUNG, Inc. SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

for sprains and bruises relieve pain quickly

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Learn RADIO for BIGGER PAY!

J. E. Smith
President

Jobs paying $50 and all the way up to $200 a week are waiting for the Radio-trained man. Get into the new, growing Radio profession if you want to earn more money, have bigger opportunities for the future. I will train you at home in your spare time. Previous experience not needed—you learn quickly in a simple, clear and unforgettable way. Grade school education, or even less, is enough to start.

Earn Extra Money Weekly Right Away "On the Side"

You learn it all by doing. So practical is the training you get that almost from the time you start you can put your new knowledge to use. Little Radio jobs I'll show you how to do in your spare hours can bring you as much as $15, $20, $30 extra cash, weekly, after you get well started. This Radio training of mine is the one that's world famous as the "Course That Pays for Itself." Many of my students put aside enough extra cash to start their own Radio business on graduation—all earned by this spare-time Radio work done while they are learning.

64-Page Book Sent FREE

Free—a 64-page book that tells you all about the bigger opportunities in Radio—the big money to be earned—how I'll prepare you thoroughly and completely in the quiet of your own home to enter any one of the twenty some odd lines of the Radio profession. Book tells all about my ways of helping you earn extra spare-time cash almost from the day you start with me. Gives all information about the six big outfits of Radio material I send you to experiment with: you can build more than 100 Radio circuits with these outfits, yet there's no extra charge for them. Everything—all services and material—included in one tuition fee (and you'll find it's surprisingly low, and can be paid in very small monthly amounts). Get the proof for yourself. Radio needs you—learn right now what it has to offer you. No obligation for the book—it's sent free—just mail the coupon today.

Address:* J. E. SMITH, President

National Radio Institute
Washington, D. C.

C O U P O N

J. E. SMITH, President,
National Radio Institute,
Dept. 2B, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Smith: Kindly send me your free 64-page book with all information about learning Radio for bigger pay. I understand this places me under no obligation.

Name.....

Address.....

Town.....State.....

rise in their might and defeat this proposition to ruin their park. Young hoodlums and hooligans have usurped enough of our fair city as it is. As one who knew Barton Wilkinson well, and how outraged he would be at this proposed vandalism, I call upon the people to rise and defend the park! And in conclusion I should like to know what sinister political and financial interests are masked behind this move?

CIVITAS.

I HAPPENED to be in his study when Uncle Ambrose showed this proudly to Aunt Kate.

She read it, and looked at him reproachfully, and her eyes filled with tears.

"Oh, Ambrose!" she sobbed. "You have forgotten! To think that you have forgotten that Father really wished every part of the park to be open to the children! Oh, Ambrose, how could you!"

And putting her hands over her face she left the room.

Uncle Ambrose ran after her. He was back in ten minutes, and he began to walk up and down his study, frowning and murmuring to himself, his hand thrust into the breast of his Prince Albert coat.

I watched him as he walked and frowned. And then his murmurings began to grow articulate. He took the offending clipping, and twisted and tore it in his fingers, and cast the pieces into the grate.

"Bah!" he said. And I witnessed a strange psychological transition. By a great effort of mind and soul, he externalized this offending Civitas who had written the letter, and cast the villain off from Ambrose Applegate! He began to curse him, in a low, tense, dignified way. Civitas! Civitas, indeed! Who was this Civitas! In ten minutes he had put Civitas quite outside himself—he had begun to view Civitas as something created by the devil, who had strangely seized Ambrose Applegate's hand and written that letter. He loathed and hated and condemned Civitas; and his anger mounted and mounted against this vile brigand who had hurt his Kittie and slandered the great Barton Wilkinson! He seized his pen and wrote the following letter, which, for once, he signed with his own name, and which I carried to "The Banner" office myself:

To the Editor of "The Banner"—SIR: My attention has been called to the vapid fulmination of an obstructive nincompoop who sulks under the alias of "Civitas," in a communication to the editor which recently disgraced your usually fair-minded columns. Appointing himself the censor of this community, with what authority I know not, he undertakes to say that Wilkinson Park shall not be thrown open to the wee ones of this fair city as a playground, and he has the indecent effrontery to say that the late Captain Barton Wilkinson himself would have opposed it—a dastardly slander upon the name and fame of a great and good man who has gone before and cannot himself reply to the calumny of this anonymous ruffian. Who is this Civitas who undertakes to speak for the dead and tyrannize over the living:

As one should say, I am Sir Oracle,
And when I ope my lips, let no dog bark!

Who is this "Civitas?"

"Upon what meats has this Cæsar (Civitas!) fed that he should grow so great?" (I quote currento calumo, as my well-thumbed, dog-eared volume of Shakespeare, the Bard of Avon, is not nestling beside me as I write—"Immortal Bard, no hungry generations tread thee down!")

Now, sir, it ill behooves me to speak boastfully of a sacred relationship, more sacred frequently, and certainly so in this case, than the relation of father to son. I refer to the sacred relationship of father-in-law to son-in-law, for such Captain Barton Wilkinson of revered memory was to me; and I refer to it as evidence to my right to speak for him who can speak no longer, for his golden bowl is broken and his silver cord is loosened. I would be a traitor to every nobler instinct of humanity did I not rise, armed cap-à-pie with indignation, to repel the base insinuation that he would bar by word or deed the little ones of our fair city from the flowers and dewy grasses, the warbling songsters of the air, the shade of the forest monarchs, or the blessing of Heaven's own golden sunshine. He loved the wee tots. He loved to have them cluster round his sturdy knees, with their little pattering feet and rosy hands and prattling laughter, while he told them tales of elfland or instructed them in morality or else in business principles. Civitas! Civitas indeed! Away with this Civitas! Let us hear no more of this scoundrel!

In conclusion, sir, I do not wish to intrude my personal affairs upon the public, but perhaps I may state that this underhanded attack has stricken to the heart one who was very near and dear to Captain Barton Wilkinson. I refer, sir, to his daughter and my wife.

And, in conclusion, sir, allow me to inquire what special moneyed interests, what hidden corporation influence, are skulking behind this penny-a-lining pamphleteer who himself skulks behind the nom de plume of Civitas?

What, no answer, Civitas? None? Faugh!

In conclusion, let me say that it is not my habitual custom to dignify such anonymous aspersions with a reply.

HON. AMBROSE APPLEGATE.

This pleased Aunt Kate, and, since it was signed with his own name, earned him scores of messages of congratulation from his many friends. He never again signed himself Civitas in any of his letters to the editors, sticking to "Pro Bono puplico," "Veritas," "Indignant Taxpayet," and the other familiar signatures. With one blow he had abolished Civitas from the face of the earth.

BUT the record of Uncle Ambrose's existence is not altogether a story of futility by any means. Whatever his judgment may be, his really good and kind heart has led him to be active on the right side of many public issues. And you are wrong if you think such letters as his are without effect on the public mind. Many of the people who read them are actually influenced by them. He had made mistakes in his career as a public man; but so did Pitt and Henry Clay and Thomas Jefferson. His intentions have always been philanthropic; he is usually the first person to suggest a public meeting to consider the relief of suffering anywhere; his letters have frequently started petitions in genuinely Good Causes.

A few years ago there was a flood that did a great deal of damage in our city and caused some loss of life. Uncle Ambrose actually saved a family from drowning, and rowed them to safety in a skiff.

Later a proposal came before the city council for a statue of Hon. Ambrose Applegate to be set up in Wilkinson Park facing the statue of Barton Wilkinson, to commemorate Mr. Applegate's work of salvage in the flood time, as well as his many public services. The idea originated in a card in one of the papers which was signed "Vox Populi."

Some of Ambrose's friends took the matter up, and the city council was not averse to the statue, as long as it was to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Now She Can Buy Them

Those lovely things to make her home the cheerful, cozy place she had always dreamed of making it.

YOU must know, dear Margaret Clarke, that I am ashamed not to have written you long before this to thank you for my check.

"It certainly was easy money, for the little time spent was a pleasure to me; and think of it, I earned $30!

"Mother laughs at me, for I have my money spent in my mind before I really earn it. I am going in town tomorrow to buy a new lamp with a parchment shade and some old blue hangings for my windows.

"How can I ever thank you for helping me to get so many nice things for my home? My friends marvel at my good taste—and it is such fun to spend money for lovely things when you can really afford them!"

IF you are a lover of pretty things—and long to add some new furniture, or dainty, ruffled curtains, or something else to your home—you, therefore, know how much you'd welcome $30 extra, within the next few weeks. Mrs. N—— of Pennsylvania is just one of our ten thousand girls and women who are earning money with us.

And all are busy folks who can only snatch an hour here, or a few minutes there at the end of a busy day, or in the middle of an afternoon. Yet they are making extra money!

You'll be happy when you are a member of the Pin Money Club, the money-making department of The American Magazine. Our work is pleasant and easy to do—the kind every girl or woman can do, even if she hasn't had a day's business experience. It can be done in whatever time you can give, even if that time is only an hour a day.

So don't be satisfied to do without the things you would like to have. There is an opportunity for you, too, in our friendly, money-making Club. Write today to

Margaret Clarke

Secretary, Pin Money Club,
The American Magazine,
Department R,
250 Park Avenue, New York City.

cost the city nothing. That was arranged, that necessary money, by unknown donors. It got as far as the question, What sort of statue? before the matter was called to the attention of Uncle Ambrose directly.

"An equestrian statue," said Uncle Ambrose, after profound thought.

"But, Ambrose dear," said Aunt Kate, "you never rode a horse in your life!" And the truth is that Uncle Ambrose has always been a little afraid of horses, actual horses in the flesh—although he has written a good deal about steeds and chargers and destriers.

"An equestrian statue!" said Uncle Ambrose firmly. On this one point he was not prepared to yield to his wife. The equestrian statue rhymed with some inward lyric of his soul.

And an equestrian statue it is. Uncle Ambrose conferred frequently with the sculptor. They planned it together. It shows Uncle Ambrose in bronze, seated upon a chubby horse and with his right hand thrust into the bosom of his Prince Albert coat. Little children are clinging about the horse, and reaching up toward him, and being saved from the flood.

Uncle Ambrose's statue stares down a lengthy vista directly at the statue of the late Captain Barton Wilkinson, and stares triumphantly. Wilkinson's statue is not an equestrian statue. Applegate's is. And with its unveiling all trace of jealousy (if jealousy of Barton Wilkinson it was) has departed from Uncle Ambrose Applegate.

The Mother of Tom, Dick, and Harry

(Continued from page 19)

of the amazing line that has led to the present unique generation of Byrd men—Tom, Dick, and Harry.

"Don't think I am boasting of family," she warned me. "I am proud of our ancestors, yes; but family means little as compared with results. What I am trying to convey to you is a sense of the terrific responsibility carried by every man and woman in the world who has to do with young people. Tom and Dick and Harry were having their characters made generations ago. Young people to-day are forming the characters of the children who won't be born for generations."

Gently I asked about her husband.

For the fraction of a second, a shadow crossed her face and an almost invisible mist dimmed her eyes, that had swung away from mine. I could read her thought: "If only he were here!"

She said: "You've heard of William Byrd, who founded Richmond. That was the beginning of the Byrds in America." She touched lightly on the series of fine Virginians that led to the brilliant young lawyer who had been her husband and the father of her boys.

Her early married life was like a chapter out of a historical novel. Just two months after she met Richard Evelyn Byrd, she married him. Her age was nineteen.

Richard Byrd took his lady to Winchester, where he was building up a law

THE UTMOST KINDNESS

THERE is no person, however unfeeling, who is not moved to kindness in the presence of the passing of another. We are so willing, so eager to be kind. But how?

Today, the first obligation of protecting the precious remains is being easily fulfilled in thousands of families by securing the Clark Grave Vault.

This vault is absolutely positive in its protection because it is designed according to an immutable law of Nature. And it is permanent because made of Armco Ingot Iron, or Keystone copper steel, 12 gauge thickness and of special quality, which are in themselves highly rust-resisting. On the higher priced Clark Grave Vaults there is also a plating of pure cadmium (the greatest resistance to rust known to science) applied by the Udylite process. This process is exclusive on Clark Vaults.

All over the nation the Clark Grave Vault is becoming as essential a feature of burial equipment as the casket.

Leading funeral directors recommend it and give with each one a 50-year guaranty.

Less than Clark complete protection is no protection at all!

The Clark Grave Vault Co.
Columbus, Ohio
Western Office and Warehouse
Kansas City, Mo.

CLARK

GRAVE VAULT

This trade-mark is on every genuine Clark Grave-Vault. It is a means of identifying the vault instantly. Unless you see this mark, the vault is not a Clark.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Thinking of Building?

THEN you will want this book of photographs and floor plans of over 75 beautiful practical homes. Artistic in design, sturdy in construction and built of high grade materials, these homes can be constructed at a cost far below the average—when built the Bennett way.

Real Savings for You

Modern methods save you money. All framing materials are cut to fit by labor saving machines in our great mills. Your house is erected piece by piece as any other house is built—minus the bothersome planning and unnecessary labor. No architects' fees—complete plans are furnished FREE with each house. No waste materials—yet plenty for every purpose. No extras—as our prices are guaranteed. What's more—you buy direct from us at WHOLESALE PRICES.

Send for the Book of Bennett "Better Built" Homes and see in advance just what your home will look like. Take no chance—know exact cost before you start.

Bennett Homes
Better Built

Mail this coupon today!

Bennett Homes
128 Main St., North Tonawanda, N. Y.
Please send me the 84 page Bennett Book. Free only in Ohio, N. Y., N. J., Pa., and New England. Elsewhere $1.00.

Name.....
No. and St......
Town and State.....
Am interested in house.....garage.....summer cottage.....

Be a Nurse

Learn at Home

Study in spare time to be a nurse. Earn $30-$35 a week. Courses endorsed by physicians. Thousand graduates. Est. 28 years. Nurse's equipment included. Money back agreement. Free booklet.
CHICAGO SCHOOL OF NURSING
Dept. 72
421 S. Ashland Blvd., Chicago, Ill.
Please send me your free fascinating booklet, "Amazing Opportunities in Nursing," and 32 sample lesson pages.

Name .....
Address .....
City.....State.....

practice. There four swift years slipped by and at the end of them the young pair found themselves possessed of three sturdy boys, Tom, Dick, and Harry. From that time, Mrs. Byrd's life has grown increasingly eventful. For instance:

One morning as the mother sat sewing, she looked up to find Dick, twelve, standing beside her.

"Yes?" she laid down her sewing. Unaccountable fear clutched at her heartstrings. An intuitive presentiment warned her something was up.

"I'm going to the Philippines."

"What!"

But she knew she had lost.

The small lad before her held out the bit of white paper he had in his hands. It was a letter from Judge Carsons, a friend who held a governmental post in the Islands. He had written asking Dick if he would like to come out.

"But you can't go alone," murmured the mother, half through the letter.

Little Dick Byrd smiled that same quiet smile he still gives when someone frantically tells him: "But you can't do it, man; there's too much risk!"

It is to the mother's credit that she did not argue. She faced the inevitable with the same quick competence that has made her a help instead of a hindrance to her sons through war, politics, and exploration.

She took young Richard to Washington and put him on the Western express train; she wired a friend to meet him at San Francisco and put him on the boat. Then she waited for the first mail, that could not come from the Philippines for more than a month.

The boy got safely to his destination. He wrote precious letters that the mother devoured. But what letters! Surely they helped fiber her for later years. Cholera epidemic just outside Manila; a native uprising; typhoons. He came home by way of the Suez Canal and was met at New York by a dozen reporters, suggestive of what was later to come. Age twelve, mind you!

THIS was the opening episode of an entirely new kind of life for the young mother. She was small physically and used to being the center of attraction.

"But now it seemed," she says with a laugh, "as if I were the center of repulsion. My impression grew that the three boys were always plotting how they could best escape me.

"Of course they weren't. I was simply going through what every mother goes through when her young first begin to leave the nest."

How lucky the boys were. For instead of struggling against their natural desires to get about and do things, Mrs. Byrd aided and abetted their young enterprises with a courage that dumfounded less far-seeing mothers.

One neighbor who had known the Byrds for a lifetime told me: "We thought she didn't care. She'd let her little boys go riding and swimming miles away from home. They used to come back with all sorts of hair-raising tales of their adventures. She didn't seem to mind. In fact, I think her interest in what they did encouraged them to do more.

"Once Tom was lost. I mean, the time came for him to return and he didn't appear. Supper was eaten without the boy. Still he didn't come. There was much telephoning and checking up about where the lad had last been seen.

"Mrs. Byrd should have become frantic as the hours passed. A storm was rising. If Tom had been to the river he might well have strayed into the swampy district that lay beyond the town. In the darkness he could have been drowned there when heavy rain flooded the lowland. Already jagged lightning was flashing across the black sky, and a patter of raindrops splashed against the shutters.

"It was Mrs. Byrd's boy, yet she was far more controlled than the others of us who had gathered to help if we could. She asked one of the men to take charge of the search. She quickly laid out a plan of action. She handled the whole situation as if hunting a lost boy were a matter of dispassionate organization instead of just cause for a mother's heartbreak.

"RIGHT in the middle of her crisp orders, in walked Tom. He was dripping wet and thoroughly shamefaced. She didn't rush to him, gather him into her arms, and burst into hysterical sobbing as many a woman might have done. She told him to go into the bathroom, take off his drenched clothing and wait for her. She thanked those who had come to help, and had coffee and sandwiches for us before we had time to leave. From tragedy, the moment was turned adroitly into celebration. Not once through it all had Mrs. Byrd lost her head."

"But what happened to Tom?" I couldn't help asking.

"That's still a secret between him and his mother which I have never been able to find out," laughed the friend.

Next came exciting years of school and college. As there were no girls in the Byrd family, one may well imagine the riotous house-parties, the football games, and the muddy boots that marked the progress of Tom, Dick, and Harry through this vital period of their lives.

One by one Mrs. Byrd came to know the inner secrets of the Virginia Military Institute, the University of Virginia, and Annapolis. Here again she really got in step with her boys. She didn't just feel a fine pride in what they were doing; she based her pride on specific details that few mothers ever go into.

She knew what her boys were studying and why; she knew in what forms of athletics they were engaged, and why they did well in each. She knew the leading men in their classes. She followed many of these men in their careers; knows now where they are and what they are doing.

Then came the war. She wanted her boys to go at once. With other mothers, Mrs. Byrd knew what it was to suffer fear day in, day out. But the most courageous are those who fear and yet go on.

Tom Byrd, standing well above six feet in his stocking feet, and broad-shouldered, got into it first. In the mire of the Western Front, he lay and waited the word to go over the top.

Then came the "Big Push." For weeks the mother waited grimly without word. Yet, as in other days, she knew what went on nearly as accurately as if she had been there with her boy. She understood the terrific technique of trench warfare; what an ammunition train was; and why and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

THE DISTINGUISHED HOUSE

IS BUILT OF FACE BRICK

If Planning to Build or Buy a Home Write for these Useful Books

"The Story of Brick"—an attractive booklet with beautiful illustrations of modern homes and chapters on such matters as Comparative Costs, Basic Requirements in Building, The Extravagance of Cheapness and kindred subjects. Sent free on request.

"Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" embrace 128 designs of houses, unusual and distinctive in design, convenient in floor plan and economical to build. Four booklets showing 3 to 4-room, 5-room, 6-room and 7 to 8-room houses. Each 25 cents. Entire set $1.00.

"The Home of Beauty" contains 50 two-story, six-room houses, submitted by architects in a nation-wide competition. Sent for 50 cents.

"A New House for the Old." Stop repairing and painting by veneering the old house with beautiful Face Brick. Booklet sent free.

AMERICAN FACE BRICK ASSOCIATION
1736 Peoples Life Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

FACE BRICK

—requires no paint or whitewash

Modern Plumbing Comforts for your Suburban Home

If you live out beyond the sewer line, the conveniences and comforts of an up-to-date toilet and bath are available with

San-Equip
SEPTIC TANKS

Safe, economical sewage disposal systems. Follow U. S. Health Service designs. No failures. Write for free plan sheets and booklet "How to be Safe without Sewers".

Chemical Toilet Corp.,
810 E. Brighton Ave., Syracuse, N. Y.
Makers also of San-Equip Self-Drain Waterless Toilets.

where the Big Push began. She knew men like her own Tom were being slaughtered every hour of every day. But she did not quail.

"It was just something that had to be done," she said. "I hate war. I think there will come a time when there will be no war. But that time had not yet come; so my boys and I did the best we could in one way or another.

"Tom was a lawyer. He studied at the University of Virginia and Richmond College. He was a pretty good lawyer too."

Knowing Tom's quiet, persuasive personality, his way of saying things with a twinkle in his eye yet with a note of profound sincerity in his voice, I could well visualize his success before judge or jury.

After graduation, she went on, he followed in his father's footsteps and gradually began to build up a legal practice. By the time war was declared with Germany, he was in his late twenties and well on his way toward taking over much of the elder Byrd's lifelong clientele.

BUT 1917 changed the course of many a life; certainly Tom Byrd's. After brief preparation he went to France as a lieutenant of infantry. The white hands whose immaculate fingers had for years been turning pages of legal briefs became grimed with mud and calloused with toil. In 1919 he was back in Richmond, a captain. But there had been a more important change than that indicated by his advancement in military rank.

Trench life had taught Tom Byrd to love the land; the outdoor earthy land; bathed in sunshine and washed by rains; the land of growing things that one can touch and nurse and love, as the Creator must love the world he has created.

Tom Byrd gave up law for land. He became a "dirt" farmer. But because he was a Byrd, the son of a thorough mother and a methodical father, he became a very successful farmer. He specialized in apples. He studied apples with the same zeal and minute attention to details that he had applied to his law. Now his scientifically run apple ranches up the Shenandoah Valley have made him rich. In one year he has harvested more than sixty thousand barrels of fruit.

"Queer how few men turn out to be what they plan," I mused, hoping I would also get the story of Harry. I was not disappointed.

"In a different way, Harry changed, too," said Mrs. Byrd. "He started by being a newspaper man, and he ended up in politics.

Here again it was the father's influence. Richard Byrd, senior, had been district attorney for Winchester for many years, and was one of the most popular attorneys that had ever shaped a brief. He had a reputation for never playing a popularity game. "But he had a knack of knowing all about the people in his district," a friend told me. "He understood their personalities and ambitions and what they were aiming for in their business efforts."

Knowledge of this sort doesn't come without effort. Harry Byrd soon saw that his father devoted much time to the study of the people who had entrusted their interests to him. So when it came Harry's

Why drag— drag— drag—
when your furniture will roll so easily on Bassick's

SHOVING—tugging—dragging. That's bad for furniture and bad for floors. Bad for rugs and carpets, too.

Why not stop it? Why not put on Bassick's and gently roll your furniture, instead of dragging it? Silently—easily—Bassick Casters swivel and roll over rugs, carpets—and polished floors. No scratching. No marring. No noise.

Nearly all hardware stores sell Bassick's. If your dealer hasn't them, we'll supply you direct. Send dealer's name and enclose remittance to cover your order. Be sure to give size wanted. See description below for sizes.

Three Bassick Diamond Velvet Casters that meet nearly every need

Feltoid Wheel	Fibre Wheel	Steel Wheel
For use on hardwood and polished floors.	For use on carpets, rugs, linoleum and composition floors.	For use on carpets, rugs and rough floors.
For Heavy Weight Furniture
Size FFB $2.00 set	Size FRB $1.30 set	Size FSB $0.80 set
For Medium Weight Furniture
Size DFB $1.60 set	Size DRB $1.00 set	Size DSB $0.65 set
For Light Weight Furniture
Size BFB $1.30 set	Size BRB $0.75 set	Size BSB $0.55 set

BASSICK
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
Casters

The Bassick Co., Bridgeport, Conn.

1. Send me copy of "The Neglected Inch" to help me select the right casters for my furniture. Check Here ☐

2. Send me.....sets of Bassick Casters, Size..... for which I enclose $.....

Name.....

Street & City.....

Dealer's Name..... A-1

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

College Man Wins Big Advancement

—by the Accountancy Route

Ralph J. Daly, college-bred engineer, had made an excellent record at the University of Michigan—so satisfactory, in fact, that for three years he taught engineering at the University of Pennsylvania.

Seeking a greater opportunity, he gave up teaching for business—joined the Detroit Trust Company—but there he found himself doing little more than marking time.

Mr. Daly saw that he needed a grasp of business principles and methods which his college training had not supplied. He enrolled with LaSalle for home-study training in Higher Accountancy.

Today he is Secretary-Treasurer of the Detroit Fidelity and Surety Company—a position which he credits largely to the practical training which he got from LaSalle. "I feel that it was the one great factor," he writes, "which enabled me to find myself in the business world."

Send for Salary-Increasing Plan

Do you appreciate what accountancy means in the business world? Do you realize that it constitutes the indispensable foundation for success in any business undertaking? Would you seriously fit yourself for positions paying $3,000, $5,000, $10,000 a year, and even better?

LaSalle has prepared a 64-page book entitled "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays." The information it contains is of very real and definite value. It will pay you well to read it. And—LaSalle will send it to you free.

Balance the two minutes that it takes to fill out the coupon against the rewards of a successful career—then clip and mail the coupon—NOW.

LA SALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY
The World's Largest Business Training Institution

Dept. 233-HR Chicago

I would welcome details of your salary-increasing plan, together with copy of "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays," also a copy of "Ten Years' Promotion in One," all without obligation.

☐ Higher Accountancy

Training for positions as Auditor, Comptroller, Certified Public Accountant, Cost Accountant, etc.

Other LaSalle Opportunities

LaSalle opens the way to success in every important field of business. If more interested in one of the fields indicated below, check and mail now.

☐ Business Management
☐ Modern Salesmanship
☐ Traffic Management
☐ Railway Station Management
☐ Law—Degree of LL.B.
☐ Commercial Law
☐ Industrial Management
☐ Factory Management
☐ Modern Foremanship
☐ Personnel Management
☐ Banking and Finance
☐ Modern Business Correspondence and Practice
☐ Expert Bookkeeping
☐ C. P. A. Coaching
☐ Business English
☐ Commercial Spanish
☐ Effective Speaking
☐ Stenotypy

Name.....

Present Position.....

Address.....

NEW VEST POCKET ADDING MACHINE

ADDS, SUBTRACTS, MULTIPLIES, DIVIDES

Does work of $300 machine. Guaranteed 5 years. NOT A TOY.

Made of steel and indestructible. Million dollar capacity. Fits in pocket. Will not make mistakes. So simple child can operate it. Everybody should carry one for figuring.

FREE TRIAL $2.50 Total Cost

SEND NO MONEY—Just name and address. We will ship Calculator immediately. On delivery pay postman $2.50 (plus a few cents postage). If not satisfied after 10 day trial you get your money back. THOUSANDS OF SATISFIED USERS. (Add 10c extra if Leatherette case is desired.)

This is lowest priced practical calculator made. "Why pay more for inferior imitations?" Order from this ad.

BABY CALCULATOR SALES CO.
P. O. Box No. 1118, Chicago, Ill. Dept. 25

AGENTS Write for big commission and territory proposition.

turn, as a young man, to help his father, he did so not as a chore but because he felt the duty a most profitable one.

It is important to note that Harry was at this time a slaving journalist just serving his apprenticeship at one of the most indispensable, yet most thankless professions in our modern civilization. The lad was beginning to realize from a news angle the part that citizenship plays in a commonwealth. Hence, when he saw, and also took his part in, his father's clear-cut scrutiny of the lives of men and women, he grew unconsciously to develop his own sympathy and insight along the same lines.

But he was a practical young newspaper man. "He knew the press as well as the pen," declared one of his professional brothers in the Fourth Estate. He learned how to buy paper stock, the value of metal and ink, and how to cut overhead in the press-room without militating against the comfort or earnings of his labor.

It was inevitable that Harry Byrd should buy his own paper. As he could not afford one of the sheets in his home city, Winchester, he reached out into the town of Harrisonburg and purchased the first of several papers he was destined to own.

ALMOST at once, the man's true character and personality began to be expressed in his editorial policy. He made his paper pay; that was because the Byrds are intrinsically good business men. But he put profit second to public welfare.

He saw that one of the greatest handicaps to growth and progress in his state was the lack of good roads. So he pounded away year after year for more money to invest in highways, and for better engineering when the money was forthcoming. He succeeded. Indeed, he succeeded so well that people began to believe in his abiding love for Virginia and his competence to turn that love into practical results.

Still in his early thirties, Harry Byrd was sent to the state legislature as a senator. There he carried on with his fight for good roads. It was a fight that led to all kinds of other good things for Virginia: good financing, good inter-city understanding, good enthusiasm, and good citizenship.

Just as it was inevitable that Harry Byrd, the journalist, should ultimately own a newspaper, so was it inevitable that Harry Byrd, state senator, should be chosen as candidate for governor.

"But he's just a boy!" protested the old political warhorses. True enough; he was still in his thirties; and he didn't look his age by ten years. But since he had been chairman of the State Democratic Committee besides being senator, Virginians knew his abilities were not to be measured by his years.

When the showdown came as the climax of the campaign, Harry Byrd was elected by one of the largest majorities Virginia has ever given, and was, with Thomas Jefferson, the youngest governor in the history of the state.

Not long ago Mrs. Byrd attended a public function where there were many people of high political and social rank. For a little while, she let herself be propelled toward a gathering focus of stellar characters, men and women both. Then she quietly rebelled. Very quietly she slipped away to the outskirts of the mob and found Dick's flying partner, Floyd Bennett, who was still a cripple from his airplane crash last spring.

Presently another man eased in upon the pair: Captain Mulroy, doughty skipper of the North Pole ship, the "Chantier." Then came a writer in the confidence of the Byrd family; then a shipping magnate. Another man came up, was momentarily inspected and admitted, then another. In three minutes Mrs. Byrd was completely out of sight, hidden behind a bulwark of broad shoulders that hovered over her.

The inevitable happened. Contagious laughter, a growing knot of humanity, and perhaps a touch of mystery did their work. The party realized abruptly that "something was going on" over in this corner. A concerted movement toward that "something" started. The group about the mother of Tom, Dick, and Harry broke, and disclosed her at its center.

It is this same sort of charm that makes all three Byrd men so popular among their fellows.

I remember one day that I had been studying Tom, Dick, and Harry and comparing them. Often I had scrutinized other eminent men, because I think it is a matter of profound interest to discover just what it is that makes one of our fellows beloved and esteemed by all who come into contact with him. But when three such characters are all of the same family, the phenomenon arouses an uncontrollable curiosity.

Only the mother knows them all. The rest of us see three handsome, healthy men: Tom, a tall and competent-looking gentleman farmer who specializes in fine Virginia apples; Dick, a practical visionary who sees the earth shrunk to the size of a library globe; and Harry, an able governor.

"Which do you like best?" I once popped at the mother.

"You mean in whose work am I most interested?" she kindly and quickly reproved me.

"As you will," I laughed.

She thought rapidly. She always does. And, as usual, her conclusion was simple and to the point.

"I think I need all three," she said. "Tom's work stimulates my old and natural family love for the land. Dick's explorations keep me up to date in a lot of scientific things I believe everybody ought to try to understand. And Harry's duties as governor never let me forget what it means to keep even a part of this wonderful country of ours running smoothly and efficiently."

I asked her how she occupied the days and weeks when her three busy men were buried in their jobs. "People, mostly," she replied at once. "I like people. Besides my boys, people do most to keep me interested in life. I want people around me all the time, preferably young people.

"THE trouble with most of us is that as we go along in life we tend to become more interested in ourselves than in others. I suppose my three men have taken a lot of that out of me; certainly they did when they were growing up.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A Good Bookcase for the price of a good book!

$3.75 Per Section With Glass Doors

On Approval—Direct to User

Lundstrom
IT GROWS WITH YOUR LIBRARY
SECTIONAL BOOKCASE
Endorsed by Over 100,000 Users

Made for and universally used in the finest homes and offices throughout the country. Made in sections of different sizes, combining utility, economy and attractive appearance. Price complete as shown above, with non-binding, disappearing, felt-cushioned glass doors, beautifully finished in plain golden oak, $15.75. In quartered oak or in imitation mahogany or walnut (willow), $18.25. In genuine mahogany or walnut, $23.50. Other styles at correspondingly low prices. Shipped direct from factory or warehouse at a big saving TO YOU. Write for new catalog No. 6.

The C. J. Lundstrom Mfg. Co., Little Falls, N. Y.
Manufacturers of Sectional Bookcases since 1899
Branch Office and Warehouse: Kansas City, Mo.
New York Show Room, 130 W. 42d St.

Dignified, exclusive profession. Little competition. $5,000 to $10,000 incomes for experts. Easy to master under our correspondence methods. Assistance extended to students and graduates. Established 1916. Write today for full details.

American Landscape School 72 Newark, New York

Learn Cartooning
At Home—In Your Spare Time

The famous Picture Chart Method of teaching original drawing has opened the door of success for hundreds of beginners. Whether you think you have talent or not, send for sample chart to test your ability, and examples of the work of students earning from $50. to $300 per week. Please state your age.

THE LANDON SCHOOL
1446 National Bldg., Cleveland, O.

New Kind Of Can Opener

AGENTS

Men and Women make $6 to $12 an hour, full or spare time. Big worthwhile commissions on every sale. Exclusive territories. Send quick for SALES OUTFIT and SPECIAL TEST offers.

WORKS LIKE MAGIC!

At last! An automatic, simple little can opening machine for the home! This revolutionary invention in only a few short months has banished old can openers from over 50,000 kitchens. And no wonder! Imagine an amazing, lifetime device that holds the can and cuts out the top leaving can rim slick, smooth and clean. Just turn a crank, that's all. Approved by Good Housekeeping Inst., Modern Priscilla, etc. Write today for special, introductory advertising offer.

CENTRAL STATES MFG. CO.
Dept. B-921, 4500 Mary Ave.
St. Louis, Mo.

"Then I take a lot of pleasure in my garden. I am a great believer in the effect of one's surroundings on health and peace of mind. Nature unmolested is usually beautiful. This beauty was long a part of human life. Now we tend to get away from it with our mechanical civilization, unless we make definite efforts to bring it back.

"No, I don't bother too much about my health. Fatigue, worry, and faulty diet probably kill more people than everything else in the world put together.

"I haven't any real hobbies; haven't time for them. My boys are my hobbies."

As we were talking, some young people came near where we sat.

"What about the iniquities of our younger generation?" I asked.

"Fiddlesticks," she chuckled. "That's part of being young. Think what thrills our boys and girls would miss if they couldn't shock us older people now and then.

"I'm a mother and I know what I'm talking about. I don't believe America will ever have a finer lot of young people growing up in it than there are right this minute.

"As I go along," she concluded, "I want my body and my spirit so to blend with those of my boys that my passing will not be death as we picture it, but truly lite anew in the fine perfection of their lives."

I think that simple spontaneous aspiration is the chiefest message the mother of Tom, Dick, and Harry has to give to a world of parents.

The Most Interesting Family I Know

Prize Contest Announcement

THERE are few of us, no matter how limited our acquaintance, who have not come into contact with at least one unusually interesting family. Of course there are not many families that contain a world-renowned figure like Commander Byrd—not to mention his two outstanding brothers; but there are thousands of families scattered throughout this country that are remarkable in many ways.

Tell us about the most interesting family you have met or know about. Who is its outstanding member? What did he or she do? What is the rest of the household like? Give a clear picture of its background and its present environment.

For the best letters of not more than four hundred words we offer the following prizes: $30, first prize; $20, second prize; $10, third prize. Competition closes February 20th. Winning letters will appear in the May issue.

Address Interesting Family Contest Editor, THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, 250 Park Avenue, New York.

Contributions to this contest, and any enclosures, cannot be returned, so you must make a copy of your contest letter and of any enclosures, if you want to preserve them. Manuscripts and inquiries not connected with the contest must be sent under separate cover to the Editor of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

A 900% Increase is what N. S. T. A. Training meant to C. W. Birmingham of Dayton, O. Raised his pay from $15 a week to $7500 a year.

Record Earnings of $525 in a week for Wm. Shore, former cow-puncher of Neenach, Cal. Earned $3000 first 5 months after finishing training.

Raised His Pay from $1200 to over $7200 a year, says F. J. Walsh, Springfield, Mass., who gives N. S. T. A. full credit.

~and They Started By Reading This Amazing Book!

Now—For a Limited Time—This Remarkable Man-Building, Salary-Raising Volume Is Offered FREE to Every Ambitious Man. Read it Without Fail!

Where Shall We Send Your Copy FREE?

A Book! Just seven ounces of paper and printer's ink—but it contains the most vivid and inspiring message any ambitious man can ever read! It reveals facts and secrets that have led hundreds of men to success beyond their fondest expectations! No wonder a famous business genius has called it "The Most Amazing Book Ever Printed!"

This vital book—"Modern Salesmanship"—contains some surprising and little-known facts about the highest paid profession in the world. It blasts dozens of old theories, and explains the science of selling in simple terms. And not only that—it outlines a simple plan that will enable almost any man to master scientific salesmanship without spending years on the road—without losing a day or dollar from his present position.

What This Astonishing Book Has Done!
The achievements of this remarkable book have already won world-wide recognition. The men who have increased their earning capacities as a direct result of reading it are numbered in the thousands. For example there is E. G. Kinzie of Michigan. "Modern Salesmanship" opened his eyes and he quickly raised his salary from $8 to $100 a week. L. A. Tinnes of Minneapolis made over $600 his first month after he had mastered Salesmanship. And F. L. Real of West Virginia, a former cigar maker, stepped into a position that pays him $4600 a year drawing account alone.

Big Demand for Trained Salesmen
Salesmanship is just like any other profession. It has certain fundamental rules and laws—laws that you can master as easily as you learned the alphabet. And through an exclusive feature of the N. S. T. A. System of SALESMANSHIP training—you can acquire the equivalent of actual experience while studying.

City and traveling positions are open in hundreds of lines and for years thousands of employers have called on us to supply them with salesmen. Employment service is free to both employers and members, and thousands have secured positions through this Service.

Free to Every Man
If we were asking two or three dollars a copy for "Modern Salesmanship" you might hesitate. But it is now FREE. We can not urge you too strongly to see for yourself what it can do for you, too. No matter what your opinion is now, "Modern Salesmanship" will give you a new insight into this fascinating and highly-paid profession. Mail the coupon now!

NATIONAL SALESMEN'S TRAINING ASSOCIATION
WORLD'S OLDEST AND LARGEST SALES TRAINING INSTITUTION

Dept. B-10, N. S. T. A. Building, Chicago, Ill.

National Salesmen's Training Assn.,
Dept. B-10, N. S. T. A. Building, Chicago, Ill.
Without cost or obligation you may send me your free book, "Modern Salesmanship."

Name.....
Address.....
City.....State.....
Age.....Occupation.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He Invented a "Fool Novelty" That Founded a New Industry

(Continued from page 37)

three dollars and fifty cents a week. The boat earnings of the summer paid the difference, and also allowed him to buy a few books and his science magazine.

Strange stories were beginning to appear now and then in the magazine. They spoke of an engine men were trying to build that operated without boilers and burned a new fuel called gasolene. There was talk of boats being driven by this boilerless engine, and even carriages. Ole plunged into a study of all kinds of engines; he studied steels.

An odd youth he was, by some regarded as a fool; even his few friends secretly spoke of him as "nutty." Just as he was beginning to master farm machinery building, he quit his job for another with an electric company that built motors. For five years he did nothing but jump from job to job. To learn steel he worked in the rolling mills of Pittsburgh where steel was made; the shops of a great machine-tool works in Chicago taught him how to convert steel into tools. Then he got into engine building, with Fairbanks and Morse, with Frazier and Chalmers. The grimy shops were his school-rooms, the industry itself his college. He learned to use a drawing board, to design, to test, to invent. His knowledge fired him to build a carriage that would run without a horse.

AT TWENTY-THREE, the whirl of his study deposited him in Milwaukee in the pattern shop of the old E. P. Allis Company. He had a back room in the boarding-house of a Mrs. Doyle at Grove and Florida streets, and, much to Mrs. Doyle's alarm at the mounting gas bills, insisted upon sitting up most of the night. He forgot to get his laundry done and often forgot his meals. One night, smelling smoke, Mrs. Doyle rushed in a panic to big Ole's room, expecting to find it afire. There sat Ole lost over his drawing board. A kerosene lamp was shoved up against the bureau mirror, smoking to heaven and blackening up the whole place.

"And, believe it or not," she exploded to neighbors next day, "that man had no idea what had happened. He could have burned the house over our heads and not known there was a fire!"

Across the way a bronze-haired girl listened to the irate landlady's tale in vast amusement. She wondered what this big blundering Ole Evinrude might be like.

That summer, during his two weeks vacation, Ole rented a shed in the yard adjoining that of the girl's house; but not until he had precipitated a real panic at Mrs. Doyle's boarding-house. On a quiet June evening Mrs. Doyle had been entertaining a party of neighbors; the various boarders were also present, all excepting Ole. It was about ten o'clock. Suddenly from somewhere in the bowels of the house came a terrific mechanical cough followed by an explosion. The lights went out. In the darkness women screamed and men tumbled over the furniture.

It was Mrs. Doyle who first recovered her presence of mind. Lighting a lamp, she grimly descended to the cellar, from which the din came. There was Ollie, fairly dancing about what Mrs. Doyle later assured her guests was an "infernal machine." He had the contraption hooked up to the illuminating-gas pipe, and with every cough and bang that shook the house he gloated.

"IT WORKS!" he bellowed. "Hurray, it works!"

"Ole Evinrude, take that infernal thing from this house at once," commanded the long-tried landlady. "It's enough to have the house filled with smoke, but I won't stand here and be blown up."

So Ole obediently had rented the shed. Tenderly he carried there his drawing board and his noise-maker, which he spoke of reverently as a "gasolene engine," And the girl with the bronze hair and amused eyes, whose name he learned was Bess Cary, came to watch him work through the doorway.

"Why did you try to blow up Mrs. Doyle's house?" she asked.

"I didn't try to blow it up," protested Ole with infinite earnestness. "I wanted to see if the engine would run, and couldn't wait until next day to get gasolene. I didn't think, when I hooked it to the gas pipe, that it would draw all the gas from the lights; and I forgot all about the exhaust."

"What you doing now?" asked the girl.

Ole was as serious as a Buddha. "I'm building a horseless carriage. The engine is going to take the place of the horse." After a long shy silence he added, "When it's done, maybe you'll let me take you for a ride in it."

There are plenty of folks in Milwaukee who remember Ole Evinrude's first horseless carriage. It literally was a carriage with an engine in it, a fearsome thing, with a bark like a sea-lion and an exhaust that fogged the whole street with smoke.

When the thing broke down, which was frequently, curious crowds helped Ole push it home. The machine made him a figure in town. He forgot all about boats, for there were people who desired him to build a similar machine for them. Why shouldn't he launch his own business, he reasoned. He loved this work of engine building; the only trouble was that he "had no head" for business.

"From the very first I needed a partner, and I knew it," he confessed to me. "My idea was to get somebody who could handle the business and leave me free to design and experiment."

So began Ole's search for a partner. Bess Cary then was only sixteen, a student in a business school.

The first partner, a machinist friend of Ole's named Clark, was too much like him to provide a successful association. Clark was born for the shop, so was Ole. It took them but a few months to discover their mistake, and they parted. A second partnership followed, Clemick and Evinrude, with headquarters once more in the little shed adjoining the yard of the bronze-haired girl. Clemick had already built an engine of his own and himself was something of an inventor. Ole and he planned to produce engines to order and also to manufacture parts and castings for amateurs who wanted to build their own motors.

"Who is going to write your letters and take care of your books?" inquired Bess Cary, peering over the yard fence.

Ole had forgotten all about that phase of the business in his eagerness to get going. His blue eyes met those of the girl in helpless appeal.

"All right, don't worry," she laughed. "I'll take care of your office work after school hours."

Both Clemick and Ole breathed their relief. The latter was seeing quite a lot of Bess Cary, taking her for rides in his horseless carriage and for picnics on Sunday. Once she had told him she believed he was destined for great things.

The new firm was almost immediately successful. A motor magazine that had recently come into existence agreed to run an advertisement on the basis of no results, no pay. Carriage builders, vaguely sensing the new era, began to order motors. The United States Government granted the firm a contract for fifty portable motors to be put to some unspecified use. In a few months Clemick and Evinrude had a half-dozen small shops busy, and Bess Cary was spending all of her evenings until midnight taking care of their correspondence.

ONE Sunday, Bess and Ole with some friends went on a picnic on the lake. It was August, and the temperature had risen above ninety. By the time they had rowed out to the island which was their destination, two and a half miles from shore, they were parched and hot. "Oh, what I wouldn't give for a dish of ice cream!" sighed Bess.

The next moment, big, shy Ole was back in the rowboat. Before his companion could protest he had shoved off, headed back toward the mainland for that ice cream, a round-trip row of five miles in the blistering sun. The oars creaked in the locks, Ole's back bent in labor, and sweat poured down his face. At the end of a mile he dropped the oars to rest a minute. "Gosh, why doesn't somebody invent a motor for these boats!" he puffed.

Rowing on in the heat, the idea kept returning. He thought of those portable motors the Government had ordered. Something of that sort ought to do, only lighter in weight and simpler in operation, a motor that could be attached to a rowboat and handled by anybody. "Somebody ought to invent one," grunted big Ole. "Maybe some day I will."

At the end of six months Clemick and Ole parted. The two simply couldn't reconcile their ideas; they kept pulling in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Picks you up Instantly—when you feel "all in"

Here is a new Swiss "pick-up" drink for busy people . . . peps you up at once in a healthy, natural way

Make this 3-day test and note the results

DO YOU have "let-downs" during the day . . . times when your mind and body turn logy and drowsy—in spite of yourself?

Seven out of ten people do. Thus they are handicapped by slowed-down energy and lack of pep!

Now modern science offers you a natural means to keep you "hitting on all six"—every minute of the day. A way that picks you up almost instantly. Both mentally and physically.

It is the delicious new Swiss food-drink called Ovaltine. Not an artificial stimulant. But a quick building-up beverage. Doctors advise it.

Thousands of successful people everywhere now drink Ovaltine regularly at home. In their offices. At soda fountains. It rejuvenates. It sets tired minds a-sparkle. We urge you to make a 3-day test so that you can prove all we claim.

Cause of loginess—how Ovaltine overcomes

Mental and physical "let-downs" are due mainly to overstrained nerves or digestive unrest — or both. Delicious Ovaltine helps to overcome this trouble. This is why:

FIRST—It combines in easily digested form, certain vitalizing and building-up food essentials, in which your daily fare is often lacking. One cup of Ovaltine has more real food value than 12 cups of beef extract, 7 cups of cocoa, or 3 eggs.

SECOND—Ovaltine has the power actually to digest 4 to 5 times its weight of other foods you eat. Thus a few minutes after drinking, Ovaltine is turning itself and other foods into rich, red blood.

This quick assimilation of nourishment is restoring to the entire body. Your mind clears and your body responds. Frayed nerves are soothed. Digestion goes on efficiently. Energy returns.

Doctors recommend

You will like the flavor of Ovaltine. Unlike any drink you have ever tasted. In use in Switzerland for over 30 years. Now in universal use in England and her colonies. More than 20,000 doctors recommend it. Not only as a quick "pick-up" beverage, but because of its special dietetic properties they also recommend it for restless sleep, nerve strain, malnutrition, underweight and delicate children, nursing mothers and the aged.

A 3-day test

Drink Ovaltine, hot or cold, whenever you feel low or nervously tired. See how quickly it picks you up. There is a new zest to your work—to all your daily activities.

That is the experience of most Ovaltine users. (Note the unsolicited testimonials.)

All druggists and grocers sell Ovaltine in 4 sizes for home use. Or get it at the soda fountain. But to let you try it, we will send a 3-day introductory package for 10c to cover cost of packing and mailing. Just send in the coupon with 10c.

"Don't let yourself become over-tired" is a modern-day medical urge. Thousands of busy people, executives and workers, are meeting it with this unique "pick-up" drink.

New Pep almost instantly!

Whenever you feel pepless, drink a glass of Ovaltine. Then, note the change. How you fairly tingle with energy. Mr. Higgins writes:

"I had a very tired feeling. Tried Ovaltine and the results were wonderful. It put pep in me. Took away that tired feeling."

Joseph Higgins, Yonkers, N. Y.

"Let-down" periods vanish this way

Thousands of successful people now drink Ovaltine regularly. To end costly "let-down" periods—keep them alert, both mentally and physically. Mr. Mitchell states:

"I take Ovaltine 3 times a day and feel 100% better. Now I do not get tired during the day."

Claude Mitchell,
Hibbing, Minn.

Full enjoyment at evenings' diversions

Whenever you find yourself fatigued or tired in the late afternoon, drink a glass of Ovaltine. It will refresh you at once. Give you energy that outlasts the day. Mr. Thompson testifies:

"I am a new man since I began to take Ovaltine. Never fagged out. I feel as fresh at night as when the day started."

E. M. Thompson,
Boston, Mass.

OVALTINE

©1928, T. W. Co.

THE WANDER COMPANY, Dept. A-5
180 North Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

I enclose 10 cents to cover cost of packing and mailing. Send me your 3-day test package of Ovaltine. Print name and address clearly.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

(One package to a person)

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Three Wise Men

Each needs a different size brush —yet all use Pro-phy-lac-tic

WISE MEN of four, fourteen, or forty—for each there is a special Pro-phy-lac-tic Tooth Brush.

Temporary first teeth that peep through pink gums need a small, soft bristle brush. Pro-phy-lac-tic Baby is just suited for such baby teeth—not hard enough to harm tender gums, yet firm enough to clean each tooth crevice.

Just as soon as permanent second teeth arrive, change the Baby brush to a Pro-phy-lac-tic Small. This brush is ideal, too, for dainty mouths, for it is designed to clean the dental arch of less than the average size. Women, especially, find this Pro-phy-lac-tic Small just the right size for them.

Most grown-ups like the Pro-phy-lac-tic Adult. It has a large enough bristle surface to thoroughly clean all the teeth in the average mouth with the least possible time and exertion.

All these Pro-phy-lac-tics are designed to reach all the teeth. In each, the bristles are arranged in a curve. Each has the special end tuft to clean the hard-to-get-at places. Each has a curved handle to make brushing easy and comfortable.

And . . . each is sold in the sanitary yellow box—Pro-phy-lac-tic Baby, 25¢; Pro-phy-lac-tic Small, 40¢; Pro-phy-lac-tic Adult, 50¢. The Adult brush also comes with four rows of bristles and is priced at 60¢. Made in America by Americans. Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush Co., Florence, Mass.

At Morning . . . At Night

For your teeth's sake, keep two brushes in your bathroom. Use one in the morning; the other at night. Then you'll always have a clean, dry brush. Each brush will clean better, last longer. And—you can buy Pro-phy-lac-tics with red, green, orange, or white handles, easy to tell apart.

Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush Company
Dept. C2, Florence, Mass.

Please send me your instructive booklet on the care and preservation of the teeth.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Pro-phy-lac-tic Tooth Brushes

3 DIFFERENT SIZES · 3 DIFFERENT BRISTLE TEXTURES

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

opposite ways. Then, in partnership with a retired furniture dealer and his son, Evinrude launched the Motor Car Power Equipment Company, to manufacture a standardized motor with integral transmission that could be installed in any carriage. Once more Bess Cary agreed to do the office work; once more the new venture flourished from the start. Ole built another automobile, complete in every part, and proposed that the company put it on the market as a unit, backed by national advertising. When his partner stubbornly refused to expend a penny for advertising, Ole quit the company in despair, feeling that his efforts had been for nought.

DURING the next year Evinrude built another car, which he called the "Eclipse." Two brothers agreed to be his financial backers, but almost immediately he ran up against some new difficulties that just couldn't be ironed out. Discouraged and disillusioned, he went back to the South Side. There, where rents were cheap, he again opened a little shop of his own. Every one of his ventures into the automobile field had been disastrous. Others had made money, but he himself had scarcely enough funds to equip his shop. Business, it seemed, had no room for him. He was done with motors, and would revert to his trade of pattern making.

He started in alone to make engine patterns, machine patterns, any kind of patterns on order from machine shops. He was known and respected in the shops as a master workman. Soon he had five or six men working for him, and that year Bess Cary and he were married. The marriage was the one ray of light that pierced the gloom of what Ole Evinrude considered failure. And even darker days were to come.

Their child was born at the end of a year, an event that ate deeply into their savings. Bess was left in poor health, though she continued to care for her home and do what office work Ole's shop demanded. Unable to go daily to the shop, she set up a typewriter in the kitchen and wrote letters while the dinner cooked or whenever the house and baby gave her a few minutes of time.

Big Ole, torn to the heart by their plight, was overdoing himself at the shop. He was almost six feet in height and weighed two hundred pounds, but even his strong body began to crack under the burden he gave it. The days were not long enough, so he carried his work far into the night; two or three hours' sleep, during which he tossed and muttered in mental unrest, and he would be at it again. Bess sensed a problem at the shop that wouldn't be solved.

Winter, and rheumatism attacked Ole. It doubled up his limbs so that he almost crept to the shop like one hideously crippled, and there he worked on, in physical torture. One night in the snow he was barely able to get home at all. Next morning he was unable to rise from his bed, and he had his drawing board brought to him.

With warm weather, he once more was able to return to the shop, which he had kept running during every day of his illness. As before, his work claimed him day and night. One evening Bess went over to beg him to come home and rest. "I want to show you something," he greeted her excitedly, "Look!" And he pointed to an odd-looking contraption wearing a tail, on which was fastened a device resembling a pinwheel.

"Ole!" reproached his wife. "You have been fooling with that when you know we need money so badly!"

"It's a motor that'll run a rowboat," he explained eagerly. "You just attach it to the boat, and throw away the oars. I thought of it two years ago, that hot day I rowed for the ice cream."

There was that same look in his eyes which had made his father pause when he saw the sailboat, the rapt look of the dreamer who had adventured and won. Bess smiled. "A motor, Ollie? Why, it looks to me like a coffee grinder."

He demonstrated it. The "coffee grinder" churned away with a proud put-put-put, and the little pinwheel spun like mad. "That's the propellor," explained Ole. "I bet she'll do better than five miles an hour."

"And now that you've got it," Bess demanded practically, "what are you going to do with it?"

Ollie's eyes went blank. He hadn't considered that.

In the next moment, Bess took command. Now it was her eyes that glowed, her voice that grew excited. "Hundreds of people will want that motor as soon as they know about it," she exclaimed. "If it really does what you say, it will open a whole new business."

The man doubted that. One or two others had built a motor of this kind, but they were unsuccessful; the motors had given too much trouble.

"Then yours must be reliable," decided Bess. "It must be fool-proof and trouble-proof. If it is a good motor it will sell."

DOUBTING, but spurred on by his wife, Evinrude perfected the new motor until it was trouble free. He built twenty-five of the motors, which, as he put it, he "felt he might be able to peddle to buyers during the summer." But he couldn't see that the motor ever would develop into more than a "side line." It was Bess who saw.

One Sunday a man from the shop borrowed a motor to try out on his rowboat. He returned to work Monday with a pocketful of cash and orders for ten of them. At the news, Bess Evinrude's eyes flashed; she was sure now of her ground. Sitting down at her kitchen typewriter, she wrote her first advertisement:

Don't row! Throw the oars away!
Use an Evinrude Motor!

"Ollie, get that into the next issue of the biggest motor magazine published," she commanded. "It's all we can afford now, but it will tell us whether our motors are wanted."

Feverishly they awaited the magazine's appearance with their modest "ad." A dozen inquiries was the utmost Evinrude himself expected, so he was content with his stock of fifteen motors on hand. Even Bess did not foresee the deluge to come.

"The letters were directed to the shop," she told me. "A few days after the magazine came out Ollie came home looking like a mail carrier. His coat pockets bulged with letters, and both of his hands were full. He dumped those letters onto the table and we danced a jig around them."

They lacked the capital necessary to manufacture motors enough to meet the demand, so a company was formed and a friend admitted, who contributed five thousand dollars. "I know nothing of motors," said the friend, "so you two go ahead and run things." A larger shop was rented, an office opened—Mrs. Evinrude's kitchen no longer would accommodate the business. Nevertheless, it was she who moved to the new office and took charge.

EARLY the next year, 1911, Mrs. Evinrude launched a national advertising campaign. The results were so immediate that in one day she had to engage six additional stenographers as assistants, while Ole increased his shop force to one hundred men. The woman handled all sales matters, made contracts with dealers, and conducted a direct mail campaign. To hide the fact that the Evinrude Motor Company's sales manager was a woman, she signed herself "B. Evinrude." And in "B. Evinrude" at last Ole had found a partner who left him free in his beloved shop.

"Don't forget that we had only five thousand dollars' capital with which to begin," Mrs. Evinrude reminded. "By the time we had bought necessary equipment not much of that money was left. We were constantly pressed for money, and only my husband's ingenuity saved us. He designed his own machinery, thus saving us thousands of dollars. By turning materials into finished motors, and selling the motors for cash before the bill on the materials was due, he made a hundred dollars do the work of a thousand in the ordinary plant. And we worked! There wasn't a night that we closed our eyes before twelve or one o'clock, and some nights it was two or three." This from a woman who was in ill health, under the care of a doctor!

To build up public confidence B. Evinrude sold motors on a ten-days-trial basis. "If the motor isn't what we claim it to be," she wrote customers, "send it back at our expense." It was a daring thing to do; but she knew the man who was making the motor; and she was justified, for no motors came back.

Still the new company was far from secure. Its product was a seasonal one. Winter was coming on, when B. Evinrude knew the demand for the motor would drop to nothing, and the company was too slenderly financed to stand a barren winter. She began to pound at the doors of the export trade, centering her efforts on a great New York house. Her letters and circulars simply found their way into New York waste baskets.

Then, one day Fate stepped in. It happened that the manager of the Scandinavian department of the big export firm was sitting alone in the general manager's office, waiting for him to come in. A circular in the wastebasket caught his eye and he fished it out of the discard curiously. It described the Evinrude motor. He was interested.

"I can sell that motor," he told the general manager when the latter put in an appearance. "Fishermen will want it."

"Forget it," the general manager snapped. "It's simply another fool novelty."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Only Half There

—letting the good things of life pass by a victim of cachexia (run down condition)

You can't look your best or feel your best or be at your best if you are only "half there"—if you are suffering the fatigue, the listlessness, the physical and mental exhaustion of cachexia (run down condition).

For health and pep eat yeast; every one knows its beneficial action; millions have felt its quickening effect.

The problem of putting out pure yeast in pleasant form has now been solved. Yeast Foam Tablets are the kind of yeast you've been seeking. Palatable little tablets. Chew them up or swallow them whole; you'll like their piquant taste.

Try the 5c envelope (a day's ration) or the large 50c bottle with enough yeast for 10 days.

NORTHWESTERN YEAST CO.
1750 N. Ashland Ave., Chicago

YEAST FOAM TABLETS

ON COUNTERS EVERYWHERE

RAISE YOUR INCOME

You can have your own business, be your own boss, set your own hours, raise your own income. You can earn $50.00 or more a month in spare time! How? By taking care of your own towns-folk's subscriptions for the greatest group of magazines in the world!

W. C. McNAUGHT of Oregon says: "I think for the average man or woman, the subscription business is the most profitable and pleasant there is. I have purchased a Ford Sedan, am buying a home, and derive my income from that business!"

Send This Coupon Now

Chief of Subscription Staff, Desk 65-A
The Crowell Publishing Co.,
250 Park Ave., New York, N. Y.

Please send me full particulars about your wonderful money-making plan.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....State.....

Several days later the Scandinavian man was back again. He had been thinking the matter over. "We can sell hundreds of those motors in Norway alone!" he insisted. Finally, to get rid of the man, the general manager allowed him to order two motors.

The motors were shipped to Denmark. By return cable came instructions: "Ship six more motors at once." And a few days later, "Ship fifty more." During the weeks following, Danish orders crowded Norwegian orders over the cables.

The export company wrote Milwaukee asking a lower price on the motors, in view of its increasingly large orders. The reply from B. Evinrude was, "You have our price; it stands." Two men hurried to Milwaukee to see "Mr. B. Evinrude" in person. They were confronted by a bronze-haired woman.

"I was frightened," Mrs. Evinrude confessed. "My signature had led them to think I was a man. I was afraid that when they discovered the truth they would refuse to do business with a woman."

At first the New Yorkers were incredulous, then amazed. In the end, however, they sat down and stated their business as if B. Evinrude actually had been a man. They had learned to respect her business ability through the B. Evinrude correspondence.

The interview resulted in an order for one thousand motors, to be paid for as rapidly as they were delivered, and delivery to be made during the winter. Shortly, a second order was negotiated on the same terms, for three thousand motors; then a third, for five thousand. The problem of winter production was solved. A new factory was built by the Evinrudes, three hundred people employed, and the business securely established. The one discordant note in the harmony was the persistence of Mrs. Evinrude's ill health.

"I tried to replace her," said Mr. Evinrude. "I hunted everywhere, but nobody seemed able to fill her shoes. We made too good a team together, I guess."

BY THE end of the third year, Mrs. Evinrude's health became a matter of serious concern. Ole took matters into his own hands. Even the continuance of commercial success such as he had never dared dream was no consideration to him at the cost of his wife's health. "We'll sell," he said, and this time he was the supreme commander—the business was offered for sale.

A half-dozen buyers were eager to take over the company. That which three years before would not have brought five thousand dollars sold for three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Evinrude himself, by the terms of sale, was not to reëngage in business for a period of five years.

Sharing a love for the outdoors, they planned their long-deferred ideal honeymoon. Joyfully indulging his inventive genius, Ole converted a new touring car into a road cruiser that would make the most modern motor camper envious. It was just big enough for the two of them, and for Ralph, their son, and his dog. They bought a camp stove, fishing tackle, outing clothes. One day they set out, headed for nowhere in particular.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"We went where we wanted to, and stayed as long as we wanted to," Mrs. Evinrude related. "We had the time of our lives."

Back home again, after six months' wandering of more than eight thousand miles, out came Ole's drawing board. This time what his pencil sketched was a boat, a boat equipped as he had long dreamed a boat should be, and powered with his own designed engine. In the late fall, they set sail down the Mississippi River.

Winter came early that year. Not far from Memphis the river froze up like a drum and marooned them in the ice. The temperature fell to twelve below, and for three weeks they stuck perilously in the ice jam. At two o'clock one night the jam broke, and only by a miracle they saved their lives. When they resumed their journey two weeks later, it was without their boat.

"We wound up in New Orleans," said Mrs. Evinrude, taking up the story. "En route, Ole talked outboard motors with every river man he met. And as soon as we reached our hotel in New Orleans out came his drawing board. He had an idea for a new motor, only half the weight of the old one, faster and more powerful.

"For months he worked over this new motor in his mind and it was the only subject he would discuss from morning until night. Of course it had been understood that he would return to business at the end of five years, for we had sold out only because of my ill health. My health was good once again and Ole fretted to get back to a shop; and I—well, I, too, grew enthusiastic."

IN 1920, once more in Milwaukee, the Evinrudes founded their new company, the Elto Outboard Motor Company. The name "Elto" is an abbreviation for "Evinrude's Light Twin Outboard." Ole was president of the new concern and Bess was its secretary and treasurer. Together they owned the company as equal partners.

"We began with little before," said Ole; "we'll do it again."

Only thirty-five thousand dollars was set aside as capital, and, as before, Ole designed his own manufacturing equipment. The new motor was announced to the public late in the winter, and that year the country was undergoing a depression of business. However, the motor was almost immediately a success.

Visit the business offices of the Elto Company to-day in Milwaukee. You will be shown into a large conventional office with conference table and desk, and on the desk of this office will be the name plate of "B. Evinrude." It is the company's nerve center, and Bess Evinrude is the executive in command.

Beyond this large office is a tiny one, not more than a dozen feet square. It has one window overlooking a stretch of water, a single high plain desk surmounted by a drawing board, and a high stool. There is no name plate on this desk, and the only egress to the little office is through the large one. There Ole Evinrude holds forth, his sanctum when not in the shop. It is as he always dreamed, this cubbyhole, a retreat dedicated to invention—made possible by a "perfect partner."

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

"What is a logical investment for me?"

A certain good bond may meet the needs of a friend down your street, but yet may miss your own needs. Present holdings, personal income, and future plans all affect logical choice. When you invest through The National City Company you have the benefits of its broad experience in meeting the needs of thousands of other investors. You also have its willingness to analyze your situation thoughtfully before making recommendations. Competent bond men at any National City office will gladly help you.

The National City Company

National City Bank Building, New York

OFFICES IN 50 AMERICAN CITIES · INTERCONNECTED BY 11,000 MILES OF PRIVATE WIRES · INTERNATIONAL BRANCHES AND CONNECTIONS

MECHANICAL ENGINEERING

Learn at home

MECHANICAL Engineering embraces the design, construction and operation of machines and machine tools. It is a profession which offers almost unlimited opportunities to men who combine mechanical ability with technical training.

One of the best ways to train yourself to secure a position as a Mechanical Engineer is through the home-study courses of the International School of Engineering.

These courses are complete, up-to-date and especially arranged to meet the needs of the student who studies at home. They are particularly helpful because they are written by well-known mechanical engineers.

INTERNATIONAL SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING
Division of the International Correspondence Schools
Dept. 7487-E, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation, please send me full details of your home-study course in MECHANICAL ENGINEERING

Name.....

Address.....

Mail the Coupon for Free Booklet

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Make Foods Tastier – More Healthful –

Savita imparts a deliciousness that makes every housewife proud of her cooking.

FLAVORY foods digest more easily. The happy stimulation of the taste glands excites the flow of gastric juice.

In a purely vegetable yeast extract, the enticing flavor of finest meat has been found. To sauces, soups, gravies, salads and sandwiches it imparts a deliciousness that makes every housewife proud of her cooking.

But SAVITA, as this imported extract of yeast is known, goes far beyond duplicating the appetizing flavors of chicken, choice beef and other meats. It is so rich in food iron and vitamin, that it is a boon to growing children and invalids.

SAVITA energizes the nerves. Encourages normal elimination. Promotes vitality and mental alertness. A spoonful is equal to several times its weight of fresh yeast.

SAVITA is but one of many special Battle Creek Sanitarium Health Foods that bring enjoyment to any meal while building good health. All are on sale at authorized dealers — your local Health Food Center. Try a jar of SAVITA today.

Write for "Healthful Living" which describes, with recipes the delicious, beneficial foods used in the Battle Creek Diet System, and name of nearest dealer. Sent free upon request.

Have you tried the new Savita salt? Ask for Sal-Savita

BATTLE CREEK DIET SYSTEM HEALTH FOODS for Everybody

SAVITA

Concentrated Vegetable Extract

THE BATTLE CREEK FOOD COMPANY
Department F-2 Battle Creek, Mich.

Become an Artist

Make Money While Learning
at home in spare time. You can quickly learn to draw pictures, that sell, through remarkably simple Home Study Method. Good artists earn $50 to over $250 a week. Earn while learning.
Write for Free Book and Offer to New Students
WASHINGTON SCHOOL OF ART, Room 352-F
1115-15th St., N. W., Washington, D. C.

Save Your Feet

When all else fails, end your suffering with the Heefner Arch Support
No Metal

Fully patented. Itre-adjusts the entire foot. Write for free book and statements from doctors and users.
Heefner Arch Support Co., 557 M. E. Taylor Bldg., Louisville, Ky.

Same Size as $7 & $8.75
FOUNTAIN PENS
Highest class materials and workmanship make this an exceptional value.

THE NEW IMPROVED
INKOGRAPH
"PENCIL POINTED PEN"
The Perfect Writing Instrument

Writes with ink free and easy as a lead pencil without a miss, skip or blur. Won't blot, scratch, leak or soil hands. You'll never miss a fountain pen once you try an Inkograph. No complicated mechanism to get out of order.

$1.50

SEND NO MONEY
Pay postman $1.50 plus postage or sent prepaid if remittance accompanies order. Year's guarantee certificate assures absolute satisfaction. Money back if not satisfied within ten days.

10 DAYS FREE TRIAL

MAKES 3 to 4 CARBON COPIES With Original in Ink
Patent Automatic 14-kt. Gold Feed prevents clogging — steady uniform flow of ink actually improves your handwriting. Any one can write with your Inkograph—no style of writing can bend, spread, distort, or injure its 14 Kt. GOLD POINT. Inkograph is also made in smaller size with ring on cap for men's watch chain or ladies' soutoir.
DEALERS—Send for Catalog

INKOGRAPH CO., Inc., 199-353 Centre Street, New York

AGENTS Sell Inkographs, make bigger profits, more sales, without investment. Quicker commissions, popular prices, no collecting, no competition. Send for an Inkograph or write for special sales plan booklet

Black Java Lily

(Continued from page 13)

Dunsberg. Gorman turned too; he felt that he could forgive Dazy much if she would display a natural appreciation of his purchase.

But her small childish face puckered with actual distaste. She shrank farther back against the green lilac bush.

"He looks mean," she said, briefly. "Like he'd bite."

There was laughter. Lydy looked not unkindly at Dazy, but as if at a backward child, and sniffed with an old farm woman's contempt. Everyone knew the Java line. To be sure, in any family line will be found a disreputable member or two. But for the most part Black Java Lily had a mannerly connection of relatives, and he was known to use his own large, white, perfect teeth strictly for grain-chewing, like any normal horse.

"Dazy's afraid of horses," said Lee in apology. He stepped back and gently patted her hand.

"And tree toads and milk snakes," declared Lydy, waddling off to her dairy house. "Come on, Ophy."

"Needn't fear this horse," said Gorman resentfully; although he was not usually the man to allow his neighbors to take away the tidbit of gossip that he didn't like Lee's wife.

Al Impleton laughed. Joe narrowed brotherly eyes at him.

Old Jerry joshed, rather hastily: "Bet your father, Lee, will be doing stunts in September at the fair grounds on his black back."

"Guess a man," retorted Gorman, smiling sheepishly, "has a right to a little amusement in his old age!"

STILL, with a few days, the old man found that he did not care so much for the horse as he had expected. He guessed that he was getting pretty old.

The orchards bloomed. They burst with pink. Then strewn petals decayed into the earth. Small green marbles, regular money marbles, hid smugly under green leaves. Small prudes, which later would be flamboyant, fruity gold-diggers that would ogle the sun for the wherewithal to make themselves richly pink and yellow!

It would be a big fruit year. Weather and market were right. Gorman reflected mournfully that he had enough money already in bank. What was the good of money when his boy Lee had worried eyes? The ill-feeling that lay among three people permeated the house and orchards like an uncorked bottle of bitter medicine.

Picking time came overnight. An army of men appeared. Tents were put up. The frame cottages on the place were crowded. Tables were built for long rows of avid feeders. Lydy was the kind of gray-haired worker whose sharp tongue was equal to a dozen pert younger helpers. Besides, Gorman gave her a bonus every September. Ophy, who had had and discarded a worthless husband from one year's picking-army, moved about with a coquettish awareness of many men.

Lee was busy; indeed, his days were merely linked by sleep-sodden, sweating nights. A peach tree is a despot. At its own sweet will, it demands attention, and will suffer no delay. Gorman was busy with bills of lading, telegraphed orders from commission men and to storage houses.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Dazy—well, to be sure, Dazy helped Lydy somewhat.

Somewhat, Lydy would have said; if she had been the person to talk about the family she worked for, which Lydy was not! Dazy ordered from the local stores; Lydy's time was too good for telephone delays. Dazy looked on while Lydy and Ophy oversaw the emergency women peel potatoes, shell peas, pare apples, pick chickens, chop hash, and all the rush of tasks to do with food. Most of the transient army cooked for themselves; but enough families were added to the Dunsberg help-tables to send Ophy muttering to bed nightly over her aching arms.

ONE day, Gorman lost a collar button. It was a hot morning, and the crest of the peach picking had made all tempers edgy when the thermometer climbed. And some new pickers had packed soft fruit.

"Dang it, I left that collar button on my bureau. Who in tarnation swept it out here on this hall runner?"

He swooped at it with great angry hand, although he had a private notion that he'd let it roll there.

Dazy came from her and Lee's bedroom across the wide chintz-hung upper hall. Her small face seemed frightened.

"Did I sweep it out, Father? I made the beds this morning. I'm awfully sorry." She wet her lip. "The shades were pulled down. To keep out the sun."

Five cold little formal sentences. All in a row. She might have been a servant at fault. As for her looking frightened—well, that was only his fancy, the old man muttered grimly to himself. She had nothing to fear. She was not an old man whose son could be taken away from him, leaving him alone with more property than he wanted.

"Don't matter—don't matter," he said testily, and went down-stairs to the lunch that Lydy was setting out for the family.

The hot week went. Not much soft fruit. What was half a truckful from the hundreds of Dunsberg acres? Good price, too. But Gorman was not cheerful. Lee's face was a never-ceasing worry. Lee's pleasant youthful mouth had not that set unhappiness from work, or hot days, or because he was practically overseer of an army of men.

Lying awake one hot night, the old man heard from the open windows which, with his own, lined the east side of the house on both floors, "Oh . . . money . . . new clothes . . . What's all that, Lee"—the small, petulant voice was fierce in its whisper—"if a person can't feel at home?"

Now, what would Lee do away from his father's acres, which were Lee's own acres to all intent and purpose? And what would an old man do with too many acres on his lonesome old hands? And a familyless house? Marry again? My goodness, he couldn't at his age! Did he want a strange woman around all the time, in Mary's place? Gorman turned on his pillow and held back a groan.

The following morning, he saw Dazy

1000 Hotel Positions Open!

Hotels, Restaurants, Clubs, Apartments, Institutions, Schools, Colleges, Hospitals, etc., Everywhere, Need Trained Men and Women. Over 70,000 High-class Positions Paying $2,500 to $10,000 a Year Are Open Each Year in the Hotels of the United States. Nearly One and Three-quarter Billions of Dollars' Worth of New Hotels, Clubs, Restaurants and Institutions Built This Year Will Need Over 200,000 Trained Men and Women.

I Absolutely Contract to Teach You

In my home-study course on hotel work what the leading experts know about the business—men earning from $5,000 to $50,000 a year—and at any time there are over 1,000 hotel positions open in this industry.

I Put My Students in Touch with Positions

All over the United States they are eagerly sought by the biggest and best hotels. Hotels start you at salaries up to $3,500 a year with your living usually included. If you want a steady, permanent position, with quick advancement, big pay and fine living, which also usually includes free meals and apartment—you can find it in hotel work.

No Previous Experience Needed

You need no previous experience when you take the Lewis Course. We train you by mail in your spare time at home with the Lewis Simplified Study Plan, and put you in touch with big opportunities. All of your training will be under the personal supervision of Clifford Lewis, former U. S. Govt. Hotel and Restaurant Expert, now Managing Consultant for over 225 hotels throughout the United States.

FREE Mail Coupon Now!

Opportunity Coupon
1000 Hotel Positions Open!

Lewis Hotel Training Schools,
Room AR-1418, Washington, D. C.

Kindly send me, without obligation, a copy of the FREE BOOK, "Your Big Opportunity", with details about your National Employment Bureau.

Name.....
Address.....
City.....
State.....

PROOF!

Our files are crammed with letters like these, which prove that the hotel industry is the field of big opportunity today.

Franklin Moore:—"My present position as Manager of Penn Harris Hotel at the age of 20 is due to the Lewis Course."

Catherine H. Alexander:—"I accepted the position of Stewardess in the Logan House. I am sure the help the Lewis Schools gave me shall enable me to give entire satisfaction."

D. A. Robinson:—"I was appointed Manager of St. Clair Country Club at double the salary I earned before taking the Lewis Course."

Mrs. J. S. Wickett:—"I never had any hotel experience and this position as Assistant Manager of an Apartment House is my first."

FREE BOOK Gives Full Details

There are opportunities for you in this big paying hotel industry. Many students have obtained hotel positions paying as high as $2,500 a year, even before they had finished the course. My Free Book "Your Big Opportunity" shows you how you can do as well. The coupon above will bring you by return mail this vitally interesting, illustrated book, which shows how YOU can become a high-salaried hotel executive; also tells how our students are winning success with Lewis Training, and gives details about our National Employment Bureau, and our Money-Back Agreement.

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOLS
Clifford Lewis, President
Room AR-1418 Washington, D. C.
Charter Member National Home Study Council.

Short Story Writing

DR. ESENWEIN

A practical forty-lesson course in the writing and marketing of the Short Story, taught by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, famous critic and teacher; Editor of The Writer's Monthly.

One pupil has earned over $5,000 writing in his spare time—hundreds are selling constantly to the leading publishers.

150 page catalog free. Please address
The Home Correspondence School
Established 1897
Dept. 134 Springfield, Mass.

NEW METHODS IN CHILD TRAINING

Now for the first time—a scientific method in child training, based on confidence, shows you in your own home how to correct cause of disobedience, untruthfulness and other dangerous habits, which, if not properly remedied, lead to serious consequences. New method makes punishment unnecessary and is producing remarkable results for thousands of parents. Endorsed by leading educators. Covers all ages. Free Book, "New Methods in Child Training," describes new system. Write for your copy now.
Parents Association, Dept. 92, Pleasant Hill, Ohio.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Crooked Heels spoil a smart appearance

NO magic beauty of footwear and hosiery can hide the slovenly appearance of "run-over" shoes or crooked heels. As you notice this in others, so it is noticed in you. It also makes your ankles wobble, weaken and thicken, and spoils the grace of your walk.

Correct this fault by wearing Dr. Scholl's Walk-Strate Heel Pads. They equalize the body's weight, remove all strain and make walking a pleasure. You save more than their cost in heel repairs alone, and preserve the shape of your shoes. Quickly attached inside any shoe. Sizes for men and women. At all shoe and dept. stores, and leading drug stores—35c. per pair.

Dr Scholl's Walk-Strate Heel Pads

SAVE MONEY·PAY ONLY $13.95 for this DELIVERED

DUR-A-BILT UMBRELLA TENT FULLY EQUIPPED

Made of durable weatherproof Khaki Tent Fabric; complete with awning, screened window and door, sod cloth, metal frame, stakes, jointed poles and carrying bag. 7x7 ft. only $13.95 delivered. Same tent 9½x9½ ft. and other models at lowest prices. Satisfaction guaranteed.
SEND NO MONEY—Just name and address. Pay only price of Tent on delivery. We prepay Express.
WRITE FOR FREE CATALOG
Factory Prices save you Money.

LE ROY TENT COMPANY
3949 McDonald Av. St. Louis, Mo.

SAFE-HAPPY and Out of the Way in the EASY BABY CARRIER
(Pat. Jan. 13, 1925)

At last! A practical, durable, safe baby carrier at an amazingly low price. Adapted for automobile or home. A boon to tired mothers. Provides more leisure—more time for housework. Self-adjusting for children 6 months to 3 years. Sturdily constructed. Tested up to hundreds of pounds. Washable. Folds up like a wallet. Can be carried in coat pocket or ladies' handbag.

Not sold in stores. Mail the coupon and pay postman $2.95. Use 10 days and if not satisfied return, and money will be promptly refunded.

only $2.95

Send No Money·Mail the Coupon

Easy Baby Carrier Co., Dept. 22
35 South Broad St., Philadelphia, Pa.
Send me one Easy Baby Carrier for which I agree to pay postman $2.95, plus postage.

Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....

at her bureau through a half-open door. In a pale blue thin silk negligee, one of Lee's purchases, she was a delicate red-haired doll. Lee'd follow her where she went—of course! Again Gorman held back a groan, and had no appetite for his breakfast, even his own choice cream-drenched Elbertas.

The day was marked by misconduct from Black Java Lily too. He kicked a man, or so the fellow claimed, a transient who hinted at plenty of damages. He said that no one had told him the horse was vicious.

Gorman knew well enough that the horse wasn't vicious. The transient had a shifty eye. Gorman suspected that the horse had been well kicked before it retaliated. But Jerry admitted that the fences where the mares were pastured did not seem to hold the stallion; and, since the peach orchards surrounded the pastures on four sides, an order had to be given for Black Java Lily's confinement in paddock or stall during the few remaining heavy picking days.

It was downright cruelty to the horse, in view of the weather. But the men had to be considered. Gorman awaited the wane of peach-picking with an unwonted impatience. Lee made no secret of his promise to take Dazy to Detroit as soon as the last pink bushel was in a refrigerated freight car. Just for a little trip, Lee said. Gorman had a dark suspicion that the trip would not be a little one.

COUNTY fair week coincided with the last picking week, with the dissolution of the transient army. Gorman, with Lee and Dazy, attended the fair three days. But on Saturday he remained at home; partly because practically every man on the place wished to go on that last afternoon.

Lee and Dazy, it was assumed, would go. But Gorman heard their interminable low double murmur before dawn in their room. Dazy came down to breakfast with unhappy tight lips and low-lidded eyes. Lee, with a set mouth, rode off before noon with Jerry Ray, the only other occupant of his roadster.

Dazy did not come down-stairs for the hasty pick-up lunch, served by Lydy, whose gray hair was already best-black-hatted for the fair. The old man lonesomely picked at his food without appetite. After lunch he walked around the deserted place for a while. The denuded trees, with a piebald showing of yellow leaves, should have been a tonic to an owner's eyes, for what they stood for. But the old man's troubled soul shied at any tonic.

In pure restlessness, he went out to the barn to Black Java Lily. Bills of lading could wait till Monday for totaling.

Past the dairy house and the kitchen garden, he meandered. He paused beside the silo, a new structure of the past year, massive, red-painted, and with a riveted ladder which ran up the huge side like a giant seam.

The paddock was some thirty yards beyond the silo. Gorman walked along the high-barred fence and passed in the gate. He could hear the stallion stamping in a stall in the barn. With displeasure, these days displeasure came easily to him, for he reflected that one of the men, or Lee, should have let the horse out to-day.

The animal had been penned too long.

Developing Star Salesmen is my hobby!

No matter what you are doing now, you can earn $100 a week if you will let me show you how to sell tailored-to-measure all wool quality suits for $23.50 and $31.50. Complete selling outfit absolutely FREE. Liberal commissions paid in advance—extra bonus money—steady income from repeat orders. All you do is sell—we deliver and collect. A wonderful opportunity for ambitious men. Write NOW for choice territory.

W. Z. GIBSON, Inc., 500 Throop St., Dept. P-406, Chicago

25th Year

CHICAGO TECHNICAL COLLEGE

LEARN fundamentals of DRAFTING IN 4 MONTHS

Expert draftsmen earn $60 to $150 per week. Get into this profitable field after a Chicago Tech. fascinating short course. Couple this with practical experience and be a big-pay man. Many employment opportunities. Enter any time, days or evenings. Athletics. Also 2-yr. diploma and 3-yr. B.S. Degree Courses in Engineering, Electricity, Architecture. Write for free 84-page "Blue Book."

Chicago Technical College
Dept. B-441 118 E. 26th St. Chicago

LAW Free Book

Write today for FREE 128-page book, "THE LAW-TRAINED MAN", which shows how to learn law in spare time through the Blackstone home-study course prepared by 80 prominent legal authorities, including law school deans, lawyers, and U. S. Supreme Court justices. Combination text and case method of instruction used. All material necessary furnished with the course, including elaborate 25-volume law library, which is delivered immediately upon enrollment. Many successful attorneys among our graduates. LL.B. degree conferred. Moderate tuition, low monthly terms. Money-Back Agreement.

Write for free book today

BLACKSTONE INSTITUTE, 4753 Grand Boulevard Dept. 22 Chicago

PREPARE FOR AN ART CAREER

—thru the only art school operated as a department of a large art organization, who have actually produced over a quarter million drawings for leading advertisers. Where else can you get so wide an experience? Home study instruction. Write for illustrated book telling of our successful students.

MEYER BOTH COMPANY
Michigan Ave. at 20th St. Dept. 15, Chicago, Ill.

WANT WORK AT HOME?

Earn $20 to $50 a week retouching photos—men or women. No selling or canvassing. We teach you at home, furnishing working outfit and employment service. Write today. Artcraft Studios, Dept. D, 3900 Sheridan Road, Chicago.

VENUS PENCILS

The Largest Selling Quality Pencil in the World

At all Dealers

10¢ Each

The smooth, lasting lead, uniform grading and best quality materials, make VENUS the finest and most economical pencil for every use.

17 Black Degrees—3 Copying

American Lead Pencil Co.
210 Fifth Ave. New York

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF DRAMATIC ARTS
Founded 1884 by Franklin H. Sargent

The foremost institution for Dramatic and Expressional Training. The instruction of the Academy furnishes the essential preparation for Directing and Teaching as well as for Acting.
The training is educative and practical, developing Poise, Personality and Expressional Power, of value to those in professional life and to the layman.
Midwinter Term Opens January 16th
Extension Dramatic Courses in co-operation with COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
Free Catalog describing all Courses from Room 266-B, CARNEGIE HALL, New York

BRENAU COLLEGE CONSERVATORY
Select patronage 30 states: location foothills Blue Ridge Mts. North of Atlanta. Standard A. B. course; special advantages, music, oratory, art, domestic science, physical culture: 31 buildings, swimming, boating, horseback riding, etc. For catalogue, address BRENAU, Box R, Gainesville, Ga.

THE SARGENT SCHOOL for Physical Education
L. W. Sargent, President. Founded 1881 by Dr. D. A. Sargent. Catalogue on request. 10 Everett St., Cambridge, Mass.

TELEGRAPHY
(Morse and Wireless) and RAILWAY ACCOUNTING taught thoroughly. Big salaries; great opportunities. Oldest, largest school. Endorsed by Telegraph, Railway, Radio and Government officials. Expenses low—opportunities to earn large portion. Catalog free.
DODGE'S INSTITUTE Noma Street, Valparaiso, Ind.

KINDERGARTEN AND PRIMARY
Training. 33rd Yr. Accredited. High School graduates admitted. 2 and 3 Yr. diplomas. Student residence. Athletics. Second Semester starts January 27. Address Registrar for Illustrated Bulletin.
Chicago Teachers College, 709 Rush St., Chicago

COLUMBIA SCHOOL OF MUSIC
An accredited school. Every branch of music. 27th year. Year Book free on request.
COLUMBIA SCHOOL OF MUSIC
Box A, 509 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago

McLean Hospital Training School
Offers to men a unique course in nursing with $30 a month, room and board while in training. Graduates in demand at $5 to $10 a day. Dr. F. H. Packard, Supt., Waverly, Mass.

Missouri Military Academy
Develops red-blooded American manhood, through carefully co-ordinated military and academic training. Equipment and faculty exceptional. For catalog address
Col. E. Y. Burton, Pres., Box 122, Mexico, Missouri

BUSH CONSERVATORY—CHICAGO
AN INSTITUTION OF NATIONAL PROMINENCE
teaching MUSIC, Dramatic Art, Expression, Opera, Languages, Dancing. 125 instructors. Special courses for teachers and soloists, leading to FREE MASTER SCHOOL. We own our dormitories. Enroll NOW.
A. M. Schwenker, 839 North Dearborn Street, Chicago

THE WOODS' SCHOOL
For Exceptional Children — Three Separate Schools
GIRLS BOYS LITTLE FOLKS
Summer Camp
Booklet Box 172, Langhorne, Pa.
Mrs. Mollie Woods Hare, Principal

POSSE-NISSEN SCHOOL of Physical Education
38th year. 3 year regular course. One year special in medical gymnastics and Swedish massage. Playground work. Intensive summer courses and camp. Dormitories. Apply to Secretary, Box B, 779 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

LAYTON SCHOOL OF ART
Layton Art Gallery, Milwaukee, Wis.
Courses in Painting and Sculpture, Commercial Art, Teacher Training. Interior, Costume, and Industrial Design. Mid year term begins February 1. For illustrated catalog address
Charlotte R. Partridge, Director
Dept. A. M. 438 Jefferson St., Milwaukee, Wis.

AMERICAN COLLEGE OF PHYSICAL EDUCATION ACCREDITED CO-EDUCATIONAL 2 yr. diploma, 3 and 4 yr. B. P. E. Degree courses. H. S. graduates admitted. Special students accepted. Free placement bureau. Dormitory. Second Semester starts Feb. 1.
Dept. A. M. 1019 Diversey Parkway, Chicago, Illinois

PATENT-SENSE, free book for inventors seeking largest deserved profits. Established 1869. Write
LACEY & LACEY 773 F St. Washington, D. C.

10 BIG WEEKLY MAGAZINES 10¢
Most unusual offer! Ten weekly issues of America's liveliest illustrated magazine for 10c. Highest quality fiction; unusual articles; sparkling wit and humor; special departments for every member of the family. Send your name, address and 10 cents without delay.
The Pathfinder, Dept. C-3, Washington, D.C.

Four black heels needed grass for a saraband of release.

Leisurely he walked the length of the paddock and opened the barn doors. A passage led to the stalls. The stallion was in the third stall, and turned to watch him enter.

Gorman meant to stroke the black neck. He meant to feed the horse a carrot which he had pulled as he strolled past the kitchen gardens. He had never owned a horse whose neck he could not stroke, to whom he did not feed young, tender carrots.

BUT he knew his own awful blunder as soon as his foot felt bedding straw. And for all his natural courage and physical strength, his heart turned sick with fright.

The great black horse screamed. That maniac throat! Gorman instinctively jumped backward to gain the paddock. He hoped to close the wide barn double doors in the horse's red glaring eyes and steaming nostrils—

But he had not the chance. The black handsome shoulders were at his old heels, the black flanks leaped with him for the open space!

Second scream! Appalled, he wanted to stop his ears.

There is no sound more horrible under the life-giving sun than the scream of a mad horse. Nothing in nature is more vicious than a maniac horse.

A starved lion trekking a man's bloody steps, a tiger after a doe, a trampling elephant—none of these is to be more feared! A vicious horse is an unnatural horse; and it is as if nature abhors unnaturalness, and allows it to rage in its own excess to its own undoing.

Gorman had never the least chance to escape. Against one barn door as it swung outward to the side of the barn, he was trapped. Black Java Lily reared and plunged at him. The old man went down in a heel-drummed heap against the foundation stones.

Scream! The black form wheeled then and galloped the length of the paddock. In rage, the four black heels went high in the air, came down like four revolver shots, so reverberating their mad sound.

Gorman lay where he had been trampled down. It was not his cry, for he made none, but the animal throat that brought Dazy in her pale silk wrapper running down from her room, out the door, and across porch and side yard.

"What's the matter—Father! Where are you?"

She came flying past the garden and dairy house, past silo. "Oh—where—" From the paddock, Black Java Lily saw her.

He wheeled from the crumpled old body. His long black upper lip drew back over his handsome teeth in further grin of rage.

"O-ooh!" Dazy sobbed, and wheeled and fled before the huge, handsome black shape which made no more of the drawn paddock gate than if it had been kindling wood.

She could not gain the house. The safe house! Fantastical to try!

She could not gain the dairy house! And, even so, the cool plank door was barred with wooden pegs, and not to be opened in a hurry.

But even while the maniac white teeth

Many banks send their valued customers to us when asked to recommend an investment house.

For bankers know this institution by actual business and financial dealings, extending through many years.

A long list of American, Scotch, Dutch and British Banking Institutions and Insurance Companies have long been customers of GEORGE M. FORMAN & COMPANY.

YOU will do well to invest through an institution which has earned the confidence of Banks and Bankers.

The coupon will bring you literature describing high grade Public Utility, Real Estate, Industrial, Railroad, Municipal and Government Bonds.

$209 a month INCOME
by investing $500 a year!

Coupon brings "The Science of Fortune Building"—free. Besides above plan, this book contains a series of sane, workable, tested plans for using average incomes to build substantial fortunes—varied plans to fit different-sized incomes. For example: $1000 a year, invested at 6%, with interest reinvested at the same rate, will amount to more than $58,000 in 25 years. SEND COUPON.

GEORGE M. FORMAN & COMPANY
Investment Bonds Since 1885
112 West Adams Street, Chicago
120 Broadway, New York
St. Louis, Des Moines, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, Lexington, Ky., Springfield, Ill., Peoria, Ill.
Dept. 72: Please send me, without obligation, "The Science of Fortune Building," and descriptive literature on sound investments.
Name.....
Address.....

RIDER College
THE UNIVERSITY OF BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION. Intensive training for Commercial Teaching, or Executive Secretaries. Open to men and women of education and ambition. Lecture method supplemented with laboratory practice to develop talents, vision, financial and business acumen; 4-year college work and degree in 2 years. Master Degree in 3 yrs. For CATALOG Write Secretary, RIDER COLLEGE, TRENTON, N. J.

HILLCREST For girls 6 to 14 years
Charming home life. Cultural atmosphere. Supervised study. Thoroughness in grade work. Music emphasized. Bird study, sewing, cooking, letter writing and drawing. Interpretive dancing. Outdoor games and activities. In healthful hill country. 19th year. Only normal, healthy children are accepted.
MISS SARAH M. DAVISON, Principal
Box 4-A Beaver Dam, Wisconsin

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

COMMON SENSE and HEALTH

It isn't common sense to suffer pain when only $6.50 for the new STAR-Rite Vim-Ray will relieve it. The nagging grind of neuritis, the unbearable stab of sciatica, rigid and aching muscles, colds and sore throats—all the ills which cold weather brings, yield at once to the penetrating, comforting, relieving heat of Vim-Ray.

You've always known that heat was nature's own relief for these and countless other discomforts.

Vim-Ray brings you the most perfect method of applying heat yet devised. Invaluable in acute cases where the mere weight of the hot water bottle would be the final straw, and where rubbing would be out of the question.

It's just heat, relieving, soothing and healing.

Everybody in the family will want it for every vagrant twinge of tortured nerves.

Hundreds of delighted users are telling us of the relief Vim-Ray brings them. It will relieve you, too.

Order Today STAR-Rite $6.50 In Canada $7.75

NEW HOME HEALTH SERVICE

Vim-ray

Fitzgerald Manufacturing Co., Torrington, Conn.

Please send me one New STAR-Rite Vim-Ray for which I enclose $6.50. I understand I can use it for ten days free and have my money back if I am not satisfied. A M-2

Name.....

Street.....

City..... State.....

Dealer's Name.....

10-DAY FREE TRIAL

Print Your Own

Cards, Stationery, Circulars, Paper, etc. Save money. Print for others, big profit. Complete outfits $8.85. Job press $11, $29, Rotary $149. All easy, rules sent. Write for catalog presses type etc. THE KELSEY CO., P-30, Meriden, Conn.

EXCELSIOR

High School Course in 2 Years

This simplified, complete High School Course—specially prepared for home study by leading professors—meets all requirements for entrance to college, business, and leading professions.

20 Other Courses

Over 200 noted Engineers, Business Men, and Educators helped prepare the special instruction which you need for success. No matter what your inclinations may be, you can't hope to succeed without specialized training. Let us give you the practical training you need.

American School
Drexel Ave. & 58th Street
Dept. H-21, Chicago

Money Back When You Finish If Not Satisfied

American School, Dept. H-21, Drexel Ave. and 58th St., Chicago
Send me full information on the subject checked and how you will help me win success in that line.

.....Architect .....Electrical Engineer
.....Building Contractor .....General Education
.....Automobile Engineer .....Lawyer
.....Civil Engineer .....Mach. Shop Practice
.....Structural Engineer .....Mechanical Engineer
.....Business Manager .....Steam Engineer
.....C. P. A. & Auditor .....Sanitary & Heating
.....Bookkeeper .....Surveyor & Mapping
.....Draftsman & Designer .....High School Graduate

Name.....

Address.....

were snapping at her heels, her small hands, inept with terror, were clawing at the first red-painted rung of the silo ladder. That drawn black lip! Long afterward her stockings lay damp from that hot steaming breath against the flesh of her legs.

Sobbing with terror, but spurred by terror, she barely managed to gain a rung beyond reach of the grinning long black lip. Now she saw Gorman, inanimate inside the paddock. He was conscious. His anguished old eyes met hers.

"Oh—Father!" she sobbed. "I can't get down to come to you. He will kill me—"

As if he understood human words, Black Java Lily danced at the foot of the silo and screamed up at her. He plunged in the air at her. Sobbing, she held to a rung with one hand, and childishly put the other to one ear to shut out the sound. Sobbing, she turned her face, not to look at the old man crumpled against the barn.

But soon enough she clung to the rung with two hands, and her wet eyes could not tear themselves off the poor old body, and her ears would not close while she sobbed shrilly, "Dear God—make that horse go away—Father, are you dead? Oh, someone come, come! Help! Help, somebody!"

As if in ironic answer to part of her prayer, Black Java Lily wheeled and galloped away. Back to paddock!

"Oh—Dear God, make him come back!" screamed Dazy. "Come back!"

HEELS were hunting the crumpled body, black lip pulled back . . .

"Come back!" she screamed, clambering down from her rung.

The evil black head saw. Back to her? He was obliging!

Screaming and sobbing, she clambered back, fast up the rungs. Again that hot breath scalded her thin legs! Oh, was ever anything so horrible as those steaming nostrils?

She was out of his reach again. Back to the paddock wheeled the stallion.

"No! Come back to me!" Her thin throat almost burst.

Down she started again. The scarlet-rimmed eyes galloped back, glared up. Why, even the pupils now were red!

Up she went again, sobbing. And down again. Up and down!

Fifteen minutes? A half-hour before her strength began to go? She could not later say. Her hands were blistered. Her legs cramped with terror and the incessant clambering up and down.

She called to Gorman not to move, nor to speak, and thus attract the horse's attention. She would keep him distracted as long—"Until someone comes!" she sobbed. And, under her breath, "If I can!"

The shadow of a maple tree just east of the dairy house perceptibly lengthened while the two—girl and animal—played the grim game. Her strength oozed. Finally, when she doubted her ability to clamber up and down many times more, Black Java Lily tired of the game. Off he tore around the silo, around the dairy house, trampling dry garden stalks, and then off toward the pasture, where the other horses huddled at a fence, terrified by their fellow animal's mad black throat.

Learn Music

Free—Send for This Amazing Book

It will tell you how you can quickly and easily learn to play beautifully right in your home and in your spare time.

The Open Door to Popularity

Music will open wide the doors of social success—make you the center of popularity everywhere. You will be surprised and delighted to find how easily you can learn with the famous National Academy Method. 200,000 successful students. Low cost, easy terms.

Courses in Piano, Violin, Trumpet, Voice, Banjo, Tenor Banjo, Organ, Spanish Guitar, Hawaiian Guitar, Mandolin. Write Today.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC
Dept. 56 702 East 41st Street, Chicago

You can be quickly cured, if you

STAMMER

Send 10 cents for 288-page book on Stammering and Stuttering, "Its Cause and Cure." It tells how I cured myself after stammering 20 yrs. B. N. Bogue, 11750 Bogue Bldg., 1147 N. Ill. St., Indianapolis.

Learn ADVERTISING at Home

Greater opportunities now in advertising. Learn easily and quickly in spare time. Practical work. No text books. Old established school. Low tuition—Easy terms. Send for free booklet of interesting information.

Page-Davis School of Advertising
Dept. 1052, 3601 Mich. Av., Chicago

ACCOUNTING

The uncrowded, highly paid profession of Accountancy offers marvelous opportunities to ambitious men and women. Send for our 80-page book, "How to Learn Accounting," and the first easy lesson. Both will be sent free.

INTERNATIONAL ACCOUNTANTS SOCIETY, Inc.
A Division of the
Alexander Hamilton Institute
Dept. 9, 3411 South Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Infantile Paralysis

caused LaVerne Moore's foot to be badly deformed. Photos and letter show what McLain Sanitarium did:

We are truly grateful for your wonderful work in straightening our daughter's deformed foot caused by Infantile Paralysis. Enclosed are the names of two families who have afflicted children. Please send them literature.*

FRED R. MOORE,
Box 44, Sealy, Texas.

Both children mentioned above came later for treatment.*

McLain Sanitarium (established 1898) is a private institution devoted to the treatment of crippled children and young adults. No surgical operation requiring chloroform or general anaesthetics. Plaster Paris not used. Patients received without delay. Parents retain full charge of children if desired.

WRITE FOR FREE BOOKS "Deformities and Paralysis," and "References," which show and tell of McLain Sanitarium's facilities for treating Club Feet, Infantile Paralysis, Spinal Diseases and Deformities, Hip and Knee Disease, Wry Neck, Etc. Also illustrated magazine, "Sanitarium News," mailed free every 60 days.

McLAIN ORTHOPEDIC SANITARIUM
835 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, Missouri, U. S. A.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Write Kunderd for

Free Gladiolus Book

Follow instructions in Kunderd's free Gladiolus Book for the finest gladioli in town. Directions are simple, but make success sure. Hundreds of varieties described. Also two new types, the Snapdragon and Recurvii Gladioli. Sixty-eight pictured in color. Use the coupon.

A. E. KUNDERD, Lincoln Way West Goshen, Ind., U. S. A.
The originator of the Ruffled and the Laciniated Gladioli

A. E. KUNDERD, 465 Lincoln Way West Goshen, Ind., U. S. A.
Dear Sir:
Please send me your free Gladiolus Book.
Name
St. or R. F. D.
City State

NEW WATER FERN
Beautiful House Plant --- REQUIRES NO SOIL

THRIVES IN A VASE OF WATER

A peculiar and interesting plant that is admired by everyone; handsome, velvety, fine, fern-like foliage. Curls up and goes to sleep when taken out of water, and keeps in its sleeping or dormant state for weeks and awakens again in a few minutes after being placed in water. Owing to the fact it is capable of sleeping and awakening repeatedly, it is called the Opossum Fern. Do not confuse this plant with the much advertised Resurrection plant. If you want one of the most satisfactory and beautiful "Table Ferns," something entirely new, get one of these marvels of plant life. Plants, 25c each; 3 for 50c; 7 for $1.00, postpaid. BURGESS SEED & PLANT CO., 342 W. F., GALESBURG, MICHIGAN.

FAMOUS DINGEE ROSES

Send for hints on rose gardens, "78 Years Among the Roses." New manual for beginners and others. Our illustrated catalog, "New Guide to Rose Culture," offering over 500 roses, pla ts, seeds and bulbs, also free on request. Dingee roses favorites for 78 years. Grown on own roots. Safe delivery guaranteed. Send $1 for our trial offer of 8 bushes. Address
THE DINGEE & CONARD CO., Box 225, West Grove, Pa.

OSSEGE-BIG C.O.D. CHICK OFFER

Pay for chicks when you get them. Pure-bred selected stocks of high-laying ability. BIG CATALOG FREE. Write today for free illustrated catalog.
J. W. Ossege Hatchery, Dept. 4, Ottawa, O.

KINKADE GARDEN TRACTOR and Power Lawnmower

A Practical, Proven Power Cultivator for Gardeners, Suburbanites, Truckers, Florists, Nurserymen, Fruit Growers.
American Farm Machine Co.
1099 33rd Av. S. E., Minneapolis, Minn.
Catalog Free

Spare Cash Easily Made

Get extra money for things you want. Thousands have made big money from poultry—so can you. Small investment, quick returns. Read how in America's leading poultry journal; new money-making ideas in every issue. 50c a year; 3 months' trial 10 cents.
POULTRY TRIBUNE, Box 14, Mount Morris, Ill.

64 BREEDS Most Profitable chickens, ducks, turkeys and geese. Choice, pure bred northern raised. Fowls, eggs, chicks, incubators at low prices. America's great poultry farm. At it 35 yrs. Valuable 100-page book and catalog free.
R. F. Neubert Co., Box 882, Mankato, Minn.

ROSES OF NEW CASTLE

is a beautiful book on the culture of roses and other desirable plants; exquisitely illustrated in natural colors; offers and tells how to grow our famous plants. Write today. It's free.
HELLER BROS. CO., Box 250, New Castle, Ind.

WONDERFUL POULTRY BOOK 40 BREEDS

The Nation's Great Poultry Manual tells about Mrs. Berry's success. Blood-Tested, Pure-Bred Poultry, Hatchery, Feeding, Housing, Diseases & Remedies. Makes LOW PRICES on best Fowls, Eggs, Chicks, Supplies. Pullets lay at 4 months. Send only 5c to help mail.
BERRY'S POULTRY FARM, Box 111, Clarinda, Iowa

SHAW Garden Tractor
DOES THE WORK OF 5 MEN

Patent Tool Control

Fine for truck gardens, farms, estates. Plows, cultivates, mows, runs belt machinery. Single or twin engines, walking or riding types. Gauge wheel regulates depth of cultivating. Special Price NOW.
SHAW MFG. CO., 5302 Front St., Galesburg, Kans.
Circulars FREE

Heels! Flying thuds! They were gone at last. And Dazy was down on the ground, running to the paddock through the splintered gate.

"Father—are you killed?"

"Maybe," he managed to whisper. His voice was nearly crushed away. His face was gray and distorted. "Where's that fiend?"

"I thought only b-bulls treed folks," she sobbed, aghast at what she must do, with that big mangled body in her thin, ineffective arms.

"Never saw a horse like that before. Get . . . in . . . barn . . . me—"

Heels! Back they came! Flying thuds!

Up the long high-barred lane from the pasture. Black Java Lily was returning!

Gorman heard. He moved his eyes in despair. "You . . . get in . . . barn, Dazy," he urged, since he was the kind who in personal extremity can think of another's welfare. "Don't . . . wait a . . . a second."

Heels! Fourfold thuds! Flying back! Near at hand!

Dazy sobbed. Again would steam that awful hot breath—black mad lip—

"Get . . . in . . . barn . . . Dazy dear—"

"I can't leave you!" she sobbed in despair, arms about the big crumpled body which she had failed to lift.

It was in pure despair, a blind panic, that she snatched at a two-foot splinter fallen from the paddock gate when the black heels made havoc. She struck blindly at the black lip grinning immediately over her. . . .

Black Java Lily reared back. The black nostrils were maniacal, but, too, they were tender. And, some time in the past, they must have been well bruised by a board in somebody's hand!

Wheeling, he diverted his course and galloped out of the paddock. Dazy, sobbing, because she really had sobbed so long that she did not know how to stop, had pulled the big, inert, crumpled frame half inside the barn doors when Lee's roadster turned in the driveway.

IN TIME, enough of an old man's ribs were salvaged so that he could read his newspaper in a great chair drawn to the south-facing windows of the living-room. Dazy sat in the nearest window. She was small and silent, but her rather childish blue eyes were bright now, like her hair.

Lee stood. He was flushed. His voice was cold with anger.

"Easy to understand. They never spread much about a vicious black colt five years back. Name of Black Lily. They'd been trading him around the north end of the state for four years. Always called on to take him back or stand damages! So they thought, seeing the horse you wanted was already sold, that the cousin could be switched onto you, and you'd never know the difference. No wonder the Impletons don't succeed. I've been waiting till you got well. Shoot him? The horse, I mean."

"No," said the old man. "Once in a while a horse is born clear bad. Or else he's been mistreated. But there's men that can use him, for all his temper. He's too good an animal to be shot. How about it, Dazy?"

She wrinkled a small nose. "He ran

HEALTH and BEAUTY in 15 minutes a day

DIETING or backbreaking exercises no longer necessary! For an ingenious new device, the Battle Creek Health Builder, enables you to keep gloriously healthy—pleasingly slender — without any effort on your part! The Health Builder gives a combined massage-vibratory treatment, better than a skilled masseur. It vigorously massages the heaviest muscles, peps up sluggish circulation, aids digestion and reduces superfluous weight. Used daily in countless private homes, large medical institutions and by numerous physicians in their practice, the Health Builder is a safe, simple, scientific method of reducing weight and keeping vigorously healthy.

Send for FREE Book

Send for "Health and Beauty in Fifteen Minutes a day" —a valuable Free Book showing the Battle Creek Health Builder in operation—with complete series of home exercises. ©S. E. Co. 1927

• HEALTH AND BEAUTY COUPON •

Sanitarium Equipment Co.
Room U-746 Battle Creek, Mich.
Please send me the Free Book "Health and Beauty"—Today
Name
Address
City State

Made by manufacturers of the famous "Mechanical Health Horse" and Electric and Sunshine Baths.

BE AN OIL EXPERT!

Trained men needed! Geologists, Drillers, Refiners, (Chemists and Still Men) Oil Salesmen, earn 2 to 10 times more than in other fields. Write today! FREE Booklet! Petroleum Engineering University, Dept. 112, Fort Wayne, Ind.

LEARN TO WRITE SHORT STORIES

Jack London said: "As a veteran in the Short Story Game I feel justified in giving my judgment that your simple, direct, straight-from-the-shoulder method of presenting the course is excellently comprehensive and practical." He endorsed no other.

With our unlimited personal criticism and manuscript sales service, you, too, can learn to write the stories of your dreams and experiences. Many earn $5,000 to $10,000 yearly. Over 25,000 publications buying stories today! Write for free book "The Art of Story Writing" and details of our special offer! Also our Special course in English. No obligations!
HOOSIER INSTITUTE
Short Story Dept. 1062, Fort Wayne, Indiana

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

For a quiet, restful night—

put one in your mouth at bedtime!

The soothing, quieting effect of a Smith Brothers' Cough Drop insures cough-free nights. It calms irritation, relieves hoarseness, cools, clears and refreshes the throat. Keep a box of them handy at your bedside. 5c S. B. or Menthol.

"THE CHEAPEST HEALTH INSURANCE IN THE WORLD"

Women-an income of your own!

Gifts, Bridge Prizes, Gay Playthings and Home Decorations

Cabinets, book-shelves, wall plaques, hanging shelves, magazine baskets, lamp bases, lamp shades, table runners, beautiful bits of etched copper, batik drapes, lovable little playthings, picture frames and endless varieties of similar things. Think of the fun of decorating them, and then of having ready buyers for them—right at home—at a good profit.

Right at Home

The secret thrill of a new dress or hat. The inner longing for useful and interesting activity. The growing, glowing desire to keep brilliant the youth-giving side of character. Haven't you felt them all? Hasn't every woman? And hasn't the stumbling block always been the same—Money?

Here is the answer to that question—the happy solution that thousands of women have found. It has put new joy into many a woman's heart. And it is so delightfully simple!

No special ability or skill needed

Decorating giftwares! That has always been for people with artistic skill, until M. Gabriel Andre Petit, Art Director of Fireside Industries, developed the simple "3-Step" method. Now the delights of this fascinating work are open to every woman who desires a broader, finer, more cultured life—with a good profit in sight. No tedious books. No tiresome, nerve-straining study. No memorizing!

We Show You How

Thousands of women, wishing and hoping, just like you, have found the way to new income through our method. Now they are members of this happy group known as Fireside Industries. Their wishes came true, their hopes realized. They have an income of their own right at home.

Our help to each member is not alone in the decoration of these delightful things but we also help you find ready buyers for them without canvassing or soliciting—right at home.

Miss Leah Ramsdell made $350 in 1 week, and the only reason she didn't make more, was that she sold out her stock—had no more to sell. Miss Ramsdell started with Fireside without any special ability, without skill. She has made good in a big way. The same opportunity is offered to you.

Fireside Industries
Dept. 60-B, Adrian, Mich.

Please send me FREE the beautiful Book of Fireside Industries telling how I can earn money at home.

Name.....

Address.....

Town.....State.....

Send for the Big Beautiful Book FREE

FIRESIDE INDUSTRIES
Dept. 60-B
Adrian, Mich.

away as soon as I hit him with a stick!"

Lee shouted with laughter. "Dazy's cure! Guess she isn't afraid of anything any more. Not even you, Dad."

"I don't know why she was so 'fraid of me," sighed Gorman. "Why were you, Dazy?"

"I didn't know how to cook or keep a big house," she said, matter-of-factly. "Just rooming around for years! And I fancied you frowned the day I came."

"Well, you wouldn't kiss me," he complained, sheepishly. "Anyway, when you two take that trip to Detroit that you put off—"

"Lee telegraphed for a pair of birds," she said carelessly.

A gaunt old face relaxed peacefully.

"Well, I'm not going to buy a horse again. Guess birds are the right animal."

"I wish you'd buy a Shetland pony," said Dazy, bashfully.

"Want to ride him?" Now—this was life! Talking nonsense to a daughter-in-law whose bright, little pretty face crinkled with laughter! "'Bout your size!" he taunted gayly.

"Not her!" guffawed Lee. "Smaller rider!"

After a moment, the old man's face contracted in sheer ecstasy. A little red-haired tyke riding around the Dunsberg acres on a Shetland pony! Life was too good to be true!

"My Wife Holds the Gun . . ."

(Continued from page 47)

us armed with spears and poison arrows, which they brandished in the air while they screeched at the top of their lungs. We had our guns ready. Osa did not flinch. But it would have done no good to fire; we were hopelessly outnumbered.

Later we learned that it was the confusion which saved our lives. There was so much racket that when a wild rumor spread among the natives to the effect that there were more whites around the point, they believed it, and fled. Providentially, our boat returned at this critical moment and took us off.

When we had recovered somewhat from this close call I tried to make light of the experience by saying to Osa, "Well, how did you like those fellows?"

She shook her head and smiled one of her knowing smiles. "They're not nice people, Martin," she said; "and you know they're not." That was her only comment.

During these years I learned that a healthy woman has just as much vitality as a man. I always had good health and plenty of muscle. But often when I have been ready to give up in despair, Osa was still full of pep and ready to go on.

I remember once when we got caught out in a small open boat among the islands. The weather was tough and we had practically no food. The black boys with us were ready to beach the boat and take a chance on being marooned. I am frank to say that I had about reached the same state of mind. But not Osa. She picked up her gun and held it on our mutinous crew. "I'll shoot the first boy that goes over the side," she told them.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Do you wonder I hate to see the way women in America are so often pampered and spoilt, when I know how fine they are underneath the surface?

Many a doctor has told me that a normal woman's endurance is equal to that of any man her age. I have seen Osa come in scores of times after a hard day in the field, when I could hardly drag one foot after the other, and go to work in the kitchen seeing that the evening meal is being cooked right.

After a visit to Australia and the Malay Peninsula, with some exciting times in Borneo, we finally drifted into Africa. There I chose a permanent field for my future work, which is preservation of wild life in film form. Africa is the last large unspoiled country where one can find game as it was before mankind spread around the globe, ruthlessly driving all wild life before it.

By this time Osa was thoroughly imbued with a love for the outdoors. She was a better shot than I, got along splendidly with natives, and loved traveling through the wilderness with a passion equaled only by my own intense pleasure in animal photography.

BY HAPPY fortune we discovered a lovely and long-lost lake up in the Kenya country, in the crater of an extinct volcano. Four years ago we made our second long visit to Africa, and built a permanent home on this water, which we named Lake Paradise. There, surrounded by wild elephants and black half-naked savages, Osa entered her latest adventure in outlandish domesticity.

For many weeks after our arrival I watched her curiously. Before, the United States had always been home. Now we might visit back in the States, but our true home was in that far corner of wildest Africa.

As usual, Osa ran true to form. She entered into the spirit of the whole project from the very start. When we erected our main lodge with logs hewn from the forest and a roof thatched from native grass, she built her boudoir with her own hands. She helped plaster its walls with mud, and tinted them pink with dust; she laid the floor from provision boxes, and she put up her own towel racks.

She planted a garden, with sweet potatoes and asparagus in it. She tended the chickens and ran the dairy, where we made butter from fresh milk provided by the cows that we had bought from the natives.

She shot quails and guinea hens on the trail. She organized our laundry force. She taught the blacks to cook meat and bake bread. She was my commissary steward, not an easy job five hundred miles from the nearest grocery store.

In the serious work she also took a very serious part. She handled the gun while I cranked the camera.

I remember one ugly experience we had with elephants when Osa's nerve saved my life. She was terribly frightened, but in spite of her fear she stood by her guns, and made it possible for me to be alive and write this story to-day.

This incident happened before we built our Lake Paradise home. I used to collect a little ivory occasionally, especially when I saw a fine tusker available. One day we came on a small herd in an open space that

NOW From Your Old Materials

WE PAY EXPRESS, FREIGHT, or P.P. from ANY STATE

NEW RUGS in the latest ORIENTAL PATTERNS at a Saving of 1/2!

FREE! Mail the coupon today for SAMPLES, New Low Prices and New BOOKLET in colors, "Home Beautifying — Inexpensively," and learn why thrifty women everywhere, home economic leaders and magazine editors are so enthusiastic about these low priced rugs. Learn how we scientifically separate the valuable wool in your material—steam, sterilize, bleach, picker, card and spin into the finest kind of rug yarn—then dye in the newest colors and expertly weave on power looms into

The New OLSON Duo-Velvety Rugs

FINER RUGS than you ever thought possible—for so little money. Overwhelming demand brings mass production prices.

WE GUARANTEE you cannot distinguish these rugs from rugs of new materials. Every rug is woven reversible and seamless (any size) with the same pattern and firm, velvety nap on both sides to give double wear. Twice as soft underfoot.

Sent on Trial! We guarantee to satisfy or pay for your materials. Not necessary to send any money with order.

Mail Coupon Below to Nearest Address

Our 54th Year FREE

© O.R.C. 1928

Dept. A 38, OLSON RUG CO.

Mail to 32 Laflin St., CHICAGO—or—245 Fifth Avenue, NEW YORK

YES, send me your New FREE Rug Booklet in Colors, SAMPLES and New Low Prices

NAME..... CITY.....

STREET (R. F. D.)..... STATE.....

SPECIAL! An Extra Discount for Those Who Mail This Coupon NOW!

Enjoy Powerful 6, 7 or 8 tube Radio: 30 Day TRIAL

ALL METAL SHIELDED CHASSIS

FACTORY PRICES SAVE 1/2 Choice of fine cabinets offered

BIG NEW Ultra Selective BATTERY or All Electric MIRACO 1 dial sets

Only 49.75 RETAIL for 7 Tube Model COMPLETELY ASSEMBLED (8 Tube $69.75)

Delighted thousands report Miraco's get programs Coast to Coast, also Canada, Cuba, Mexico, with magnificent, clear cathedral tone. Built like latest $200 sets—don't confuse with cheap "Squawky" radios. Unless 30 days' trial proves your Miraco the MOST SELECTIVE, RICHEST, FULLEST TONED and MOST POWERFUL DISTANCE GETTER among highest grade sets, don't buy it! Every Miraco comes completely assembled, rigidly tested and fully guaranteed. 3 yr. guarantee. Operate your Miraco with batteries or FROM ELECTRIC HOUSE CURRENT—as you prefer. Choice of beautiful consoles (with built in orthophonic type speakers) or table cabinets. Insure complete satisfaction and save or make much money on sets, speakers, tubes, batteries or A, B and C light socket power units—deal direct with one of America's oldest reliable makers of fine radios (8th successful year).

SPECIAL WHOLESALE PRICES to user-agents who show the set to friends

MAIL THE COUPON

MIDWEST RADIO CORPORATION, Pioneer Builders of Sets
431-B Miraco Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio
WITHOUT OBLIGATION, send me free literature, AMAZING SPECIAL WHOLESALE PRICE OFFER, testimony of nearby users, etc.
NAME
ADDRESS

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

WANTED

The RIGHT MAN for a GOOD JOB

A. T. Ulon ran an elevator for $28 a week. Now, after three years with Simpson, he earns nearly $70 a week, an increase of 250%. Chadwick earned about $50 weekly as a tea and coffee man. During his four years with Simpson he has averaged over $100 every week. These are but two typical successes. H. Begrow, 28 years old, made better than $6,500 last year, and Phil Levitt averaged over $6,000 a year for four years, before being promoted to branch manager. Simpson has a real opportunity for serious minded men who are anxious to improve themselves. If you are not content in your present position, write us for full information.

Start Big and Grow Larger

SIMPSON men are able to make money right from the start, and earn it easily because they have tremendous advantages. The remarkable beauty of the fine all-wool fabrics, the astounding values, the completeness of the assortment, the reliability and standing of the house, bring to Simpson representatives the most sales.

They not only make more money but at the same time give their customers the greatest dollar's worth of tailoring to be had. Satisfied customers built this business, and our established men all enjoy profits from repeat orders. C. Sortor's earnings were $3,470 in 1925, $5,206 in 1926 and $5,340 in 1927. A. Goodwin has increased his income from $1,640 to $2,965 per year in three years. M. Reis in four years time has grown from about $3,000 to better than $4,000 per year, and N. Faber, working in his spare time, also gained from $2,106 to $2,716 in the years 1925 to 1927.

Biggest Values in Our History

This season Simpson salesmen will do better than ever, because never before have we offered such a wide variety of weaves. Every fabric pure virgin wool, of a quality that will delight buyers. No man can see these wonderful fabrics at Simpson's alluring prices without being attracted by their amazing value.

No Experience Needed
Complete Outfit Sent FREE!

We furnish everything you need—large samples of the finest fabrics for your customers to actually handle and test, latest authentic models and advertising matter. Everything helpful is furnished Free. Our plan has proven successful for others, who stay with us year after year, constantly growing in earnings. You too may find in the Simpson Plan a pass key to prosperity, happiness and success.

This Is Your Opportunity

Pure Virgin Wool
Suits and Topcoats TAILORED TO ORDER

$23.50

ACT NOW!

Call at nearest branch
New York, Boston, Newark, Philadelphia, Detroit, St. Louis, Kansas City, Pittsburgh and Los Angeles or Mail Coupon to

Others at $31.50 Our Only Prices

J. B. SIMPSON Inc.
841 W. Adams St. Dept. 1460
CHICAGO

Please send me, without obligation, complete facts about your money-making offer.

*Name*_____
*Address*_____
*Town*_____ *State*_____

J. B. Simpson Inc.* CHICAGO

It's different because it's better

THERE'S nothing else quite like the new Glo-Co. It not only keeps the hair in place, but it acts as a tonic too. The new fresh odor is unlike that of any other hair preparation. Glo-Co is sold at all the better drug stores, department stores and barber shops. If your dealer doesn't handle Glo-Co, the Liquid Hair Dressing, send fifty cents for a full-size bottle to Glo-Co Company, 6511 McKinley Ave., Los Angeles, Calif. Same price in Canada, 10 McCaul Street, Toronto.

GLO-CO
LIQUID HAIR DRESSING

As necessary as the morning shave

You too can make writing pay dividends

"I sold another story . . . my second to this magazine. I received $120 for it," writes a Palmer student, Mrs. M. L. of Long Beach, Cal.

Perhaps you too have the urge to write. The ability that, with the help of Palmer training, can be made to pay you dividends. Palmer instruction is personal, inspirational. Katharine Newlin Burt, author of many stories in Cosmopolitan and other magazines, says: "I'd have started ten years sooner on a literary career. But there was no Palmer Institute then. . . . Given a natural ability, some perseverance, and the necessary power to understand instruction, any writer—would-be or experienced—would certainly find help in your course. The instruction ought to prevent a hundred false starts."

KATHARINE NEWLIN BURT best known for "Quest"—her sixth novel

Write stories that sell! Use the coupon

PALMER INSTITUTE OF AUTHORSHIP
Dept. 122-B, Palmer Building, Hollywood, Cal.
Please send me, without obligation, details about the course I have checked.
☐ Short Story Writing ☐ Photoplay Writing
☐ English and Self-Expression

Name_____
Address_____

All correspondence strictly confidential
No salesman will call on you

Learn to write short stories

promised easy shooting. Looming above the females was an old bull with a particularly fine pair of tusks.

None of the elephants saw us. I whispered to Osa to stay by the camera while I went in closer for a shot. I knew there was a good chance of some interesting film if one of the beasts charged me.

As I crept forward I kept my gun at ready. One can never tell whether an elephant will charge, or run away, and I did not want to lose my tusker.

Suddenly, the big fellow glanced up and saw me. As I was very close, I fired. I thought I had hit him in a vital spot. But I had missed the small brain area which the bullet must penetrate to be fatal.

The bull jumped and charged. I ran at top speed toward Osa. She was cranking the camera, getting priceless film as I fled for my life: It may seem to you that she was callous in letting the charging elephant come after me and doing nothing about it except take our picture. But her quick eye instantly caught the fact that the elephant was not gaining much.

The great danger to me lay in the possibility that I might stumble. Out of the corner of her eye Osa kept watch on her gun bearer. This was a black boy whose duty it was to remain at her elbow and hand out her rifle in an emergency. Here again she took a chance, because the natural impulse of the native was to flee.

Of course the other elephants in the herd came after the big bull. That is the instinct of most animals which travel in groups. The sight of the huge lumbering beasts pounding along in a charge that was meant to wipe us all off the map was enough to make anyone shiver. I think Osa did more shivering than I because she was standing still and could see more.

She cranked as long as she dared. Then in a split second she had the rifle to her shoulder and fired. I swerved as the mortally wounded elephant thundered past and fell with a thud that shook us all.

Seeing that the others of the herd were checked and that our danger was over I stepped up to Osa for a word of admiration. She was very pale.

"I—I guess I must sit down for a minute, Martin," she said.

ON ANOTHER occasion, a lion came charging for me in the open with swift, powerful springs. Knowing that Osa held the gun I continued to turn the crank. At fifteen feet she fired. The enraged beast stumbled, but came on. She fired again. This time she dropped him so close I could touch his mane with my toe.

The feeling that Osa is so accurate a shot means a lot in my camera work. I am usually intent on focusing and speed of film, and often do not realize the danger facing us. Osa stands there coolly, gun in hand, ready for any emergency. If the game is too quiet she wanders forward cautiously and stirs it up. She seems to have no nerves.

I must add here that we shoot no game save in self-defense, or for food. Indeed, we make it a practice never to fire a gun in the vicinity of Lake Paradise.

Osa isn't afraid of the dark. I mention this because much of my photography is done by flashlight at night.

I remember one exciting evening when Osa and our guide, Bukari, climbed a ten-foot rock some distance back of our camp. I wanted to get some photographs of rhinos as they went down to the water hole for a drink. We agreed on signals in advance. One whistle, repeated at intervals, meant a rhino was coming in front of us; two that he came from the left, and three from the right. If she saw one coming up behind us she was to give four blasts.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

With one other man I lay down in the sand about twelve feet from the flashlight lamps, which were set up by the trail to the water hole.

About ten o'clock Osa gave one whistle. In a few minutes we could see the monster coming right down the path for us. At that moment Osa sighted another rhino.

The heavy thud of footsteps soon revealed his whereabouts, and when he was within a few feet I set off the flash. He went galloping back in Osa's direction.

In a few minutes another rhino came along. More whistling and a flashlight. This went on until about midnight. Osa was kept busy whistling until she stopped in despair. There were so many rhinos coming and going that she could not keep track of them. Finally, we had to throw stones at them to keep them away from us. As for poor Osa, she was held a prisoner on that rock until after two A. M., when she found it safe to join us in camp for a well-deserved night's rest.

YOU wouldn't think Mrs. Johnson could keep her feminine looks and personality in such a life as we lead. But she does. I think her perfect health has more to do with her looks than any other single factor. Next comes her enthusiasm in our work. We lead an absolutely normal life; nothing artificial in either our pleasures or our comforts. Her habits are regular, and she always has plenty of hard work on hand. When she is in the field she often rides and walks fifteen or twenty miles a day. At home she is continually tinkering with her garden or our house. She rises early and goes to bed soon after dark. She wears men's clothing much of the time, but, no matter how wild the country through which we may be traveling, she dresses her hair each morning.

I have been asked if it is much of an effort to keep Osa from the pursuits of other women. I confess that she is normal enough to like pretty clothes and bridge and dancing. Sometimes in America I have a sneaking fear that such things are weaning her away from me and our work. But there always comes a time when she secretly slips up to me and whispers, "Gee, Martin, I'll be glad when we get back to Africa!"

People wonder what Osa and I talk about on our long safaris, often with no companions other than the hundred or so black porters who handle our camels and carry our baggage.

We talk about America and wonder what the folks are doing back there. We talk of happenings of the day. So-and-so did this or that wrong; we must tell him not to do it again. But we do less talking together than people in civilization. We are so close and our companionship is so perfect that I think we exchange many thoughts without words.

It means a lot to have a real partner in one's life work.

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Keeps Your Hair Neat, Rich-looking and Orderly

IF your hair lacks natural gloss and lustre, or is difficult to keep in place, it is very easy to give it that rich, glossy, refined and orderly appearance, so essential to well-groomed men.

Just rub a little Glostora through your hair once or twice a week,—or after shampooing, and your hair will then stay, each day, just as you comb it.

Glostora softens the hair and makes it pliable. Then, even stubborn hair will stay in place of its own accord.

It gives your hair that natural, rich well-groomed effect, instead of leaving it stiff and artificial looking as waxy pastes and creams do. Glostora also keeps the scalp soft, and the hair healthy by restoring the natural oils from which the hair derives its health, life, gloss and lustre.

Try it! See how easy it is to keep your hair combed any style you like, whether brushed lightly or combed down flat.

If you want your hair to lie down particularly smooth and tight, after applying Glostora, simply moisten your hair with water before brushing it.

A large bottle of Glostora costs but a trifle at any drug store.

A generous sample FREE upon request.

Send This Coupon and Try it FREE

28-G-25

THE R. L. WATKINS COMPANY
1276 West 3rd Street, Cleveland, Ohio

Please send me FREE, a sample of GLOSTORA, all charges paid.

Name.....

Address.....

Canadian address: 462 Wellington St., West, Toronto 2-Ont.

CASH!

Want Some?

Of course you do. And you can get it, too.

Subscription representatives of Woman's Home Companion and the other popular Crowell magazines—The American Magazine, Collier's, The Mentor and Farm and Fireside—are making their spare time pay big profits in commissions, bonuses and prizes. You, too, can be sure of extra cash, whenever you want it!

$1.50 to $2.00 An Hour For Your Spare Time!

Write for Free Outfit and Instructions

Mrs. C. L. Irwin of Ohio earned over $200 last December.

Chief of Subscription Staff, Desk 64-A
The Crowell Publishing Company, 250 Park Avenue, New York City.

'Course I want extra cash. Please send without obligation full details of how to go after it.

Name.....

Address.....

Post Office.....State.....

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

3/4 million a day! And every one must pass inspection to be an Esterbrook

Try this JACKSON STUB

For samples of 8 most popular pens and booklet: "Personality in Handwriting," send 10c to Esterbrook Pen Co., Dept. A-1, Camden, N. J. or Brown Bros., Toronto

Esterbrook

GO INTO BUSINESS for Yourself Establish and operate a "New System Specialty Candy Factory" in your community. We furnish everything. Money-making opportunity unlimited. Either men or women. Big Candy Booklet Free. Write for it today. Don't put it off! W. HILLYER RAGSDALE Drawer 35 EAST ORANGE, N. J.

ALWAYS Ask For DENISON'S—52 Years of Hits PLAYS Comedy-Dramas, Farces, Musical Comedies, Revues, Vaudeville Acts, Monologs, Dialogs, Make-up Goods, Minstrels, Blackface Skits, Comedy Songs. Catalog Free. T. S. DENISON & CO., 623 S. Wabash, Dept. 157, CHICAGO

Bunte WORLD FAMOUS MENTHOL HOREHOUND COUGH DROPS

Easing and Pleasing

THE MENTHOL HEALS THE HOREHOUND SOOTHES

5¢

For Hoarseness—Nothing relieves so quickly as a Bunte Cough Drop. Just pure sugar, menthol and old-fashioned horehound.

BUNTE BROTHERS, CHICAGO
Est. 1876
Makers of World Famous Candies
Look for the funny fat man on the Red Box

Fussbudget!

(Continued from page 41)

fat guy named Malinsky and off they went.

The lieutenant sent two other guns away and held the fourth in reserve. Eddie was with the reserve gun. He hid, with the lieutenant and the rest of the platoon, as best he could back of the two pieces of houses. There was a peephole that gave him a bee line out to Fussbudget and Malinsky crawling across the field like a couple of flies in a puddle of ink.

Fussbudget finally stopped in a shellhole in the center of the field. The lieutenant saw he was set, and sent out a lot of ammunition, and, for good measure, some grenades in a big bacon can. He waited about a quarter of an hour after the last box had gone out, and then he said, "Well! Thank heaven, he's fixed without the Germans spotting him!"

He'd barely got it out of his mouth when a shell came from in back of the German lines. It dropped about forty yards in front of Fussbudget's shellhole. Then another shell dropped, this time about as far on the other side of Fussbudget's hole. "Bracketed!" said the lieutenant. "Bracketed, by heaven!"

Eddie had been told what "bracketed!" meant, but for a minute he couldn't remember. While he was trying to think, a third shell came over. The lietuenant said six words in a row, and all of them were cuss words.

Eddie had been looking, so he didn't need to be told why the lieutenant swore. He'd seen that shell land, and it seemed to him it had landed dead in Fussbudget's hole.

A big squirt of dust flew up and spread out like a fan across the dark sky. It held for a second or two, and then floated away, sort of. And there was everything just as it had been before—the field like a puddle of ink, the woods standing up on the far side of the field, and over everything the darkness, like a blue-black haze.

"LOOK!" said Eddie. And he pointed. One fly was coming out of Fussbudget's shellhole, crawling toward the village, keeping in the shadows.

Eddie held his breath. The fly crawled closer; it was Malinsky.

"The gun's gone, Lieutenant," Malinsky said. "And that other guy. The shell busted right in front of us. It missed me, because I was at the back of the shellhole and I dropped flat."

Eddie tried to put a cigarette into his mouth. But he couldn't, because his hand was shaking. "You're a dirty liar!" he said. "You're a dirty liar if you say Fussbudget's gone."

"Who's Fussbudget?" said Malinsky.

Eddie didn't answer. He dropped his cigarette and reached for another, and found he hadn't any more. "A swell war," he said, "when a guy can't even have enough cigarettes!"

He stood up and wiped his mouth with the back of one hand. "Lieutenant!" he said, "this bird's a lousy liar!" All of a sudden he was sore, the way he'd been when he thought Fussbudget had been left at Brest, only more so. "I'll bet forty million dollars," he said, "and put it up right now," and he shoved a hand into one pocket as if he meant to haul out the forty million on the spot, "that Fussbudget's alive, and that this yellow bum pulled out on him."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Were you together back States?" said the lieutenant. And when Eddie nodded, he said to Malinsky, "Are you sure, Malinsky?"

"You should have seen his head," said Malinsky.

Eddie reached for a cigarette, and then, remembering he hadn't any, he got more sore than ever. "Listen, Lieutenant!" he said. "I know Fussbudget ain't gone. Why, that guy's too mean to let himself get popped off!"

"That's a funny way to talk about your buddy," said the Lieutenant.

"Buddy?" said Eddie. Whatever had given the lieutenant the idea that Fussbudget was his buddy? As if he'd have the biggest nuisance in the A. E. F. for a buddy! But he didn't say anything more, because what was the use of arguing with an officer?

JUST the same, though, Eddie couldn't get Fussbudget out of his head. And he kept looking across that open field, sure that Fussbudget would come crawling along it.

The before-morning black settled over everything. After a while, a little light began to squeeze into the black. After a while more, there was so much light Eddie could begin to see across the field again. A little more light came. Eddie could see plainer.

"I knew it!" he said. "Look, Lieutenant! Something moved out there. I told you he wasn't gone. Didn't I tell you he was too mean to die?"

The lieutenant squinted.

"Listen, Lieutenant!" said Eddie. "Lemme go out and look."

"Look at what?" said the lieutenant. "I don't see anything." And the way he said it would have satisfied a deaf guy that he thought Eddie was having a pipe dream.

"Listen, Lieutenant!" said Eddie. "I've got to go out. If that big bum's alive, I've got to go help him, or I'll never hear the last of it. He's been on my neck ever since we came into the army. If ever he has a chance to say I left him in the lurch, Good night!" And he really thought that was why he wanted to go out.

So did the lieutenant. "Well," he said, "if that isn't a hot reason for wanting to go out there! Don't you know you wouldn't have a chance in a hundred of coming back? Go sit down. You give me a pain."

"Lieutenant!" said Eddie. He'd seen a movement in Fussbudget's shellhole again, and he meant to ask again for permission to go look. But then, he asked himself, what was the use of asking. So he sat down, as if he was admitting the lieutenant was right.

A few shells began dropping into the field. One came pretty close to where the lieutenant was. He moved to a piece of house farther back. That was Eddie's chance, and he grabbed it. He crawled into the field, keeping flat on his belly, because by now it was if anything a little

No More Razor Blades To Buy!

365 Keen Shaves A Year With One Single Blade
"I want to say that KRISS-KROSS Stropper is the best thing I ever saw. I have been using one blade continuously for one year and nine months and have no idea how much longer it will last."
C. S. Stephenson, Okla.

Inventor Discovers Amazing New Way to Shave!

KEEN, velvety shaves forever and no more blades to buy!

No wonder KRISS-KROSS has revolutionized shaving traditions! It is so sensational that it seems hardly fair to call it a stropper. Rather it is a super-stropper or blade-rejuvenator! Produces unbelievable sharpness and prolongs the life of any blade for months and even years. Actually—you can take a blade right out of a fresh package and improve it beyond belief in eleven seconds with KRISS-KROSS!

This surprising invention utilizes the famous diagonal stroke, same as a master barber uses. Strops from heavy to light. Adjustable, automatic jig flies up and notifies you when your blade is ready—ready with the keenest cutting-edge that steel can take!

AGENTS! Make big money with KRISS-KROSS.—$75 to $200 a week. Emil Ham made $50 his very first day. J. C. Kellogg made $200 in 7 days spare time. Others are making $6-$12 extra a day showing KRISS-KROSS to friends, etc. We show you how. Send coupon for details. Check bottom line and mail at once.

Rhodes KRISS KROSS STROPPER
RHODES MFG. CO.
Dept. B-252, 1418 Pendleton Ave.
St. Louis, Mo.

Sensational Free Offer

And now for my surprising offer. To introduce KRISS-KROSS, I am giving with it Free a new kind of razor. Possesses remarkable features. Instantly adjustable 3-ways. Gives a sliding instead of pulling stroke. Simply zips right through the toughest crop of whiskers. . . . This generous offer is limited. Send for details and information on amazing KRISS-KROSS inventions today. They are even more remarkable than I can tell you in this short space. Clip the coupon now!

Rhodes Manufacturing Co., Dept. B-252
1418 Pendleton Ave., St. Louis, Mo.
Without obligation, please send me illustrated description and details of your special introductory offer on KRISS-KROSS stropper and FREE 3-way razor.
Name.....
Address.....
Town.....State.....
—Check here if interested in becoming representative.

Campbell's Automatic Electric

Fireless Cooker Range

You Will Love It On Sight

It's now ready—the most wonderful electric range we have ever offered. Made with new quick ring heating elements which actually

Cook As Fast As Gas

40 per cent more efficient, which means 40 per cent less electricity and less cooking time. Just think of it—boil water and cook food as fast as gas. Results are astonishing. Never before has any one offered an electric range as quick to operate—as simple, convenient, practical, time-saving, work-saving, economical, attractive, and truly beautiful in design.

Write and Get My Factory Price

Ask for our new big catalog and special introductory offer. Low cash price—or easy payments. Direct from factory to user. Here's where you can positively get the finest electric range that you could desire and at a wonderfully low factory-to-you price. You will love the range—you will like the price—it will give you a world of satisfactory service. 30 days trial. Money back if you are not entirely satisfied. Write today for catalog and special introductory offer.

THE WILLIAM CAMPBELL CO., 1602 Union Ave., Alliance, Ohio
Mfrs. of a full line of low priced electric stoves

Automatic oven control turns the heat on and off as needed. Oven door, large cooking top and splasher back made entirely of aluminum. Lifetime luster. Range beautifully finished in silver white enamel. Large Aluminum lined electric fireless cooker in the bottom slides in and out like the drawer in a desk. Also automatically controlled.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Make Money in Professional Decorating or Beautify Your Home

WHETHER you make Interior Decorating your profession, or take it up to beautify your own home, in either case you will find learning by this easy home-study way a joy! No previous experience necessary. Prominent New York Decorators give you personal instruction; and you gain, in a few short months, the practical benefit of their many years of experience.

Start your preparation now. Then decide which you would like: a dignified full or part time occupation; a profitable business of your own; an authoritative source of information on how to keep your home charmingly artistic and attractive; a definite means of increasing your cultural knowledge and social prestige.

Free Booklet Tells All

Our new 40-page illustrated book explains in detail the splendid opportunities in Interior Decoration, as well as this most successful home-study method. Write for your copy today. National School of Interior Decoration, Dept. 352, 119 West 57th Street, New York City.

National School of Interior Decoration
Dept. 352, 119 West 57th Street, New York City.

You may send me, FREE and without obligation a copy of the new book "Interior Decorating for Profit."

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

PATENTS. Write for Free Guide Book, "HOW TO OBTAIN A PATENT" and Record of Invention Blank. Send model or sketch and description of your invention for our Inspection and Advice Free. Terms Reasonable.

Victor J. Evans & Co., 757 Ninth, Washington, D. C.

AMAZINGLY Easy Way to Get into ELECTRICITY

Don't spend your life waiting for $5 raises in a dull, hopeless job. Now . . . and forever . . . say good-bye to 25 and 35 dollars a week. Let me teach you how to prepare for positions that lead to $50, $60 and up a week in Electricity — NOT by correspondence, but by an amazing way to teach that makes you a practical electrician in 90 days! Getting into electricity is far easier than you imagine!

Lack of experience—age or advanced education bars no one. Many students earn a good part of all their living expenses while attending Coyne. Our Free Employment Service will assist you. Learn on actual Electrical Machinery in new $2,000,000 School. Learn by doing—many earn while learning. Mail coupon!

COYNE Electrical SCHOOL

Not a Correspondence School—H. C. Lewis, Pres.—Est. 1899
500 So. Paulina St. Dept. 28-05 Chicago, Ill.

Mr. H. C. Lewis, Coyne Electrical School, Dept. 28-05
500 So. Paulina Street, Chicago, Ill.
Please send me Illustrated FREE Book on Electricity and Coyne. No obligation. Also details on free employment service, radio, and automotive electrical courses that are included.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

lighter than the moon had made it when Fussbudget went out, and he knew the Germans were watching.

After he'd gone a way, it seemed to him that the shells were coming faster. When he was half way to Fussbudget's hole he knew they were. He was in a barrage. Barrage! That meant an attack. He stopped. Then he started again.

"If it was anybody but you, you big bum," he said, "I'd go back. But, just as sure as I did, you'd turn up, and I'd never hear the last of it."

The shells kept coming. A lot of them. He felt like a sparrow in a hailstorm.

But finally he got to the edge of Fussbudget's hole, and he looked in.

And there was Fussbudget. With a head that looked as if forty cops had drummed on it. But he was a long, long way from dead.

When Eddie got his first squint, Fussbudget was taking a last wipe at his machine gun. And from the way things were around the shellhole, it looked as if Fussbudget had been knocked out, had come to, had dug his gun out, cleaned it, cleaned his ammunition boxes, and made everything ready for a reception to the Germans. All as neat as an old maid's sewing basket.

"The big bum!" Eddie thought to himself. "And with that head too!" And then he said out loud, "I told the lieutenant you were too mean to let yourself get popped off."

Fussbudget snapped around. When he saw who it was, he dropped his pistol arm and jerked his mouth. "If you're all the lieutenant could send to help me," he said, "go back, and say I'd rather be alone."

Eddie slid down into the hole. "That bozo Malinsky," he said, "came back and reported you were a goner. You showed your usual sense," he said, "taking a guy who'd run out on you."

"Well, keep your big feet where they belong if you're going to stay in this shellhole," said Fussbudget.

"Say!" said Eddie. He set himself to tell Fussbudget that, just as soon as they got through this detail, he was going to have the pleasure of having his block knocked off, the way it ought to have been knocked off back in the States. But, instead, he said, "You can consider yourself lucky I got here when I did. Take a look." And he nodded toward the woods.

FUSSBUDGET peeked over the edge of the shellhole. Without another word, he squatted behind the machine gun. "Keep awake," he said. "Get a belt ready." And he started shooting.

The Heinies were coming. A whole slough of them. The first wave was at the edge of the field. The second was half way to the field from the woods. A third was at the edge of the woods, and Eddie thought that if it had been a bit lighter he could have made sure a fourth was in the trees.

They were coming forward as if they were hunting something and meant to find it, long thin lines of them, spaced out like football teams moving into kick-off formation. About a thousand teams, it looked to Eddie.

"Where's that belt?" Fussbudget hollered, to make himself heard above the clatter of the gun. Eddie shoved the brass tab into the feed block. Fussbudget gave it a jerk. He went through the loading as neat and orderly as if he'd been on the drill grounds. And the gun started firing again.

"Well," Eddie said to himself, "I never thought I'd be glad over this bird's neatness! But I am." He had a reason. He knew all the belts Fussbudget had cleared of dirt would run through the gun with no more chance of a jam and a stoppage than if they'd been fresh from the loading machine. And this, he knew, was a time when he didn't want a jam and a stoppage!

He certainly didn't. Because it was some hot little riffle. Back of them, in the village, the fat-headed infantry woke up and got going with rifles, automatics, one-pounders, and everything but hobnails, just about.

BUT it didn't take the Heinies long to figure out that it was something in the middle of the field that was holding them up. And finally, after they'd seen one wave after another get so far and no farther, they got down to business.

"What've they stopped for?" Eddie wondered. In a few minutes he knew. A grenade busted out in front. Then another. "Hey!" Eddie said. "Cut that out!" He squinted over the edge of the hole. A coal-scuttle helmet was ducking down off to his left. "Fifty-fifty," said Eddie, and grabbed a grenade out of the big bacon can and threw it back.

Right then that shellhole got to be a darned hot place. A German grenade landed on the far slope of it. Zowie! Eddie ducked. His left arm went numb. He threw two grenades back, one after the other, and the second one landed right. That didn't help much, though, because by then some Germans had got close on the other side.

All the time, Fussbudget was potshotting the strung-out football teams that started up and forward every so often.

"Say!" said Eddie, getting sore. "The birds you're shooting are ten times as far off as my lot. Turn that gun this way, will you?"

"Do your little job, and don't interrupt me," said Fussbudget.

Eddie got so sore he threw two grenades at once. "I'll do my little job, all right," he said. "And believe you me, when we get back I'll do a little job on you!"

The funny thing about that argument was that they were both right. Fussbudget certainly needed his gun to stop the coal-scuttle helmets out in front. But Eddie needed it just as much to thin out the grenade throwers. The truth was, about four guns were needed for the job they had on hand.

Lucky for them the fat-headed infantry came to life and swarmed out of the village in time. The Germans didn't like that so well. They took to the woods. One minute, it seemed to Eddie, there were about a hundred thousand of them around. The next there weren't any. The riffle was over. It was over even quicker than it had started. Eddie waited with a grenade until he was sure. Then he sat down.

"I certainly am glad those bozos found a good place to stop," he said. "Believe you me! If this is war, anybody can have my hunk of it."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He looked up and saw Fussbudget's nose jerk. Now what was wrong? He looked down and saw he'd flopped onto one of those boxes of ammunition that Fussbudget had cleaned so nice and neat.

He started up in a hurry, because from the jerk of Fussbudget's big nose there'd be a battle in about two seconds. But before he was half way up he sat down again. Something was wrong! He didn't want a battle. He'd been waiting to sock Fussbudget ever since they'd left Camp Dodge. But now that the chance was come he didn't want to do it.

AND then he took a second look, and saw he wasn't going to have to. What he'd thought was a jerk of Fussbudget's big nose wasn't a jerk at all. It was as near as Fussbudget could come, without practice, to a grin. Absolute! Fussbudget was looking at that mussed-up ammunition box—and grinning.

Eddie grinned right back. "Darn it!" he thought. "I've been treating this bird like something that the cat dragged in, but I knew all along he was a good guy. He's a fussbudget, all right; but where'd we have been just now if he wasn't?"

"Say?" he said, "you haven't got a cigarette, have you?"

"Yes!" said Fussbudget, "I have a cigarette," and to prove it he took one out of his pocket. And he leaned down and shoved it into Eddie's mouth.

Well, that was the finishing touch for Eddie. "Sit down here," he said, "and gimme your first-aid packet. I'll wrap up your dome for you." And when he'd got the bandage pretty well on, he said, "Listen! How about calling off our little private war, and the two of us ganging up against Germany?"

Fussbudget grinned again. Yes, he did! Twice in five minutes. "I was just about to make that identical proposal, Buddy," he said.

"Buddies suits me," said Eddie, grinning back. He gave the ammunition box a kick to clear a better seat. Fussbudget picked it up and dusted it off as neat as "Nice!"

"It is my opinion," said Fussbudget, "that we are going to make a good team!"

"Good?" said Eddie. "Why, we could finish this war in five minutes if Pershing would turn us loose and make the fat-headed infantry give us the proper support!"

WHETHER or not we believe in psychic phenomena, Hamlin Garland's serious, but unbiased, article, "I Don't Know What Happened at These Séances," will interest everyone. Even after thirty years of scientific study Mr. Garland is unable to explain to his own satisfaction the curious things that he has seen and heard. Are spirits actually trying to communicate with us? If not, what are the forces behind these strange happenings? Next month, you will read about some amazing "spiritual" happenings. What do you make of them?

Gordon-Van Tine Home No. 633
5 rooms, bath.
Materials Plan-Cut.
$1860

Buy Direct from Mill—Wholesale Prices!

Get our low wholesale prices before you build. We furnish complete architects' plans, with lumber and mill-work cut to plan at mill. Saves you 30% labor cost and 18% lumber waste. Customers say they save up to $2,000 on house. One guaranteed price covers all—no extras. Write or send coupon.

Garages $83 Up
Build yourself. Materials furnished Plan-Cut. Summer Cottages—one to five rooms; write for prices.

Highest Quality
We furnish only highest quality material—backed by our 20-year satisfaction guarantee. Over 200,000 pleased customers.

This 140 Page FREE Book shows photos, floor-plans, specifications, direct-from-mill prices on 100 PLAN-CUT HOMES. Also ask for books on Garages, Summer Cottages, Barns and Poultry Houses.

Gordon-Van Tine
(Established 1865)
PLAN-CUT Homes

Gordon-Van Tine Co.
1051 Case St., Davenport, Iowa
Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Back.
Please send me Catalogs.
I am interested in.....
Name.....
Address.....

350 EASY WAYS TO MAKE BIG MONEY!

Amazing money-making opportunities for men and women. Full time or spare time. Many clear $100 a week and more with my proved methods. No capital, training or experience needed. Anyone, anywhere, can cash in on new Profit-Sharing Plans. Full particulars free. Write Albert Mills, 76 Monmouth Ave., Cincinnati, O.

Learn Cartooning Simple Home Method

Steady demand for good cartoonists. Big salaries—wonderful opportunities. Miss Dorothy Johnson writes "I was offered more money for one week's work than entire course cost me." Send postcard for FREE BOOK and offer to New Students. Write Name Plainly. State Age and whether Mr., Mrs. or Miss. (No salesman will call.)
WASHINGTON SCHOOL OF CARTOONING
Room 352-F 1113-15th St., N. W. Washington, D. C.

FOOT PAINS Ended IN 10 MINUTES—or costs you nothing

RECENT scientific findings show 94% of all foot pains result from weakened muscles. Now a way is discovered to assist and strengthen these muscles. Results are almost immediate. That burning, aching, tired feeling in the feet and legs—cramps in toes, foot calluses, pains in the toes, instep, ball or heel—dull ache in the ankle, calf or knee—shooting pains from back of toes, spreading of the feet, or that broken-down feeling—all can now be quickly ended. Pain stops in 10 minutes when an amazing band is used, called the Jung Arch Brace. It is highly elastic and amazingly light and thin, yet strong and durable. You slip it on, that is all.

Pain stops like magic. Stand, run or dance with delight—wear stylish shoes comfortably. The secret is in the tension and stretch of the band. Nothing stiff to further weaken and cause discomfort. Nothing to mis-shape shoe. Results are permanent. Soon band may be discarded. Feet are well to stay. Nearly 2,000,000 now in use. Specialists urge it widely.

Test it 10 days, if not amazed and delighted your money returned. Go to druggist, shoe store or chiropodist. If they can't supply you use coupon below and pay postman. Write for free book on foot troubles.

1 Trouble starts in weakened muscles. Tiny bones of forward arch are displaced. Pain follows.

2 A super-elastic band assists and strengthens weakened muscles, replaces bones. Pain stops instantly.

3 You walk, stand, dance with ease. Wear stylish shoes in comfort. Feet get permanently well.

JUNG'S The "Original" ARCH BRACES

FREE if it fails

Jung Arch Brace Co., 112 Jung Building, Cincinnati, Ohio
Send one pair of braces marked below:
(Persons over 145 lbs. require long braces)

FOR SEVERE CASES —with cushion lift	FOR MILD CASES —without cushion lift
☐ BANNER (medium) $2	☐ WONDER (medium) $1
☐ VICTOR (long) $2.50	☐ MIRACLE (long) $1.50

☐ Money enclosed. ☐ Send C. O. D. plus postage.
Shoe Size..... Shoe Width.....
Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....
Canada: M. L. C. Bldg., Montreal. Add 25c to above prices.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Clear

up bloodshot eyes quickly and safely

When eyes become bloodshot from wind, dust, over-use, crying or lack of sleep, apply a few drops of harmless Murine. Soon they will be clear again and will feel refreshed and vigorous.

Many persons use Murine each night and morning to keep their eyes always clear and bright. A month's supply of this long-trusted lotion costs but 60c.

MURINE FOR YOUR EYES

Free Mail this coupon to Murine Co., Dept. 103, 9 E. Ohio St., Chicago, for book checked: ☐ "Eye Beauty" ☐ "Eye Care"

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Please PRINT your name and address in PENCIL

If I were traveling

I'd choose a companion that would serve as a faithful bodyguard—a good flashlight. I'd pack it in the grip for every trip, and park it alongside my bed at the hotel.

To make sure that it would deliver the goods when I pressed the button, I'd see that it was loaded with genuine Eveready Batteries—the kind that gives the brightest light for the longest time. Because they're built to do just that!

Get the flashlight habit. It's good travel-insurance.

Cut Loose, and Give Your Personality a Chance

(Continued from page 43)

obligation to make them effective in the community, and the only way to make them effective is to express one's ideas, and then be prepared to take the consequences. The manner of expressing them will be guided by one's own good taste and feeling, but it is essential that they be expressed. The lecture was taken to heart. The man overcame his diffidence by force of will, and rose rapidly to the position of importance and influence in his business that his brains and character deserved.

Here is another type of personality which I hope I can adequately describe, because it is the most remarkable I have ever seen. I know a woman who absolutely dominates the small group in which she moves, made up chiefly of a large family of children and grandchildren and numerous relatives. She is the most retiring member of the group. She has the least to say. And yet what she does say has more influence than the words of all the others put together. I need hardly explain that she is elderly, because the ideas that underlie her personality are very old-fashioned. Her personality is expressed—vividly and powerfully—by few words and many acts.

She married young, with a small stock of simple ideas about human conduct and human relations, but with an extraordinary firmness of character in putting those ideas into practice.

SHE believed first of all in duty, what Wordsworth called, "Stern Daughter of the Voice of God." She believed that her first duty in life was to be the best mother that she could possibly be. She believed that love is the first law of God, and to live a life of love the first duty of man. But her idea of love had no sentimental weakness about it, for she believed that love is based upon respect—that respect comes first and love follows as a consequence. Therefore she "feared" God first and loved him next.

She did everything in the world to make her husband love her, but she always saw to it that he respected her. She did everything in the world to make her children love her, but she always saw to it that they obeyed her. She never trusted love that was not grounded in respect. And she gave others the respect she demanded for herself—the respect due to her husband for his headship of the family (old fashioned, sure enough!)—even though she could laugh with delighted appreciation when someone quoted to her the saying that "a normal woman will look up to her husband even if she has to sit down to do it."

She respected her children—their individuality, their dignity, their opinions. Discipline, law, order, obedience, these she exacted with quiet but relentless firmness. Those obtained, she gave everything. She always consulted other people's convenience, not her own. She asked other people's opinions, she did not offer hers. She delighted in self-sacrifice—of comfort, pleasure, time—and got happiness out of giving it.

You might think that this subordination of self would result in obliteration of personality. On the contrary, it has made her morally dominant over her entire connection, who idolize her. "He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city" has been prophetic of her experience, for it has proved that he that ruleth himself shall rule others—by the moral authority which such rocklike self-control exercises upon those about her.

To-day she is far older than the allotted threescore years and ten, physically and mentally vigorous, and shy and retiring as ever; but the emanations of her powerful personality still impress themselves vividly upon scores of people whom she seldom sees, in a dozen different states. She is a perfect example of one way to build up so rich a personality that it cannot fail to find outward expression.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S life illustrates very clearly another way by which personality can be developed. He had a lot more personality at forty-five than he had at twenty-five. In other words, personality is not just a "gift," but is largely the creation of the person who exhibits it. Roosevelt was intensely interesting to other people, very largely because he was so intensely interested in them. He liked to know what they were doing, and how and why they did it.

When someone around him "did a good job," Roosevelt not only exclaimed over it himself, but he also called in others to tell them about it, and had them praise it too. Roosevelt enlarged his stature in the eyes of others by enlarging their stature in their own eyes. He made people around him feel that they were more important and useful than they had thought themselves to be, and, consequently, he himself took on a fresh importance and interest in their eyes.

The point about Roosevelt's example is that anybody can do what he did. Not, perhaps, to the same degree, but certainly to a considerable degree. Roosevelt was not just a political "glad-hander;" if that were the case, his amazing personality would be duplicated in every precinct by small-minded politicians who are. Roosevelt did do a certain amount of what he did for sheer political effect. But most of it was large-minded and big-hearted unselfishness.

He was big enough, and sure enough of his own worth and ability, to be immensely thoughtful of others, to consider their feelings first and his own afterward, to be willing to put aside selfish calculation a large part of the time and see things from the other fellow's point of view and try to help him enjoy life and succeed in it. And these things—outward expressions of an inner generous spirit—made him beloved and admired.

Roosevelt did another thing that anybody else can do, each in his own degree. He widened, to the limits of his time and for beauty, economy, and permanent value. If you are building, specify Oak for all principal rooms. If you live in a home with worn floors, lay Oak over the old floors, modernizing the rooms as no other single improvement will do.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Floor with OAK

OAK lends beauty and dignity, harmonizing with furnishings of whatever period.

OAK makes a permanent floor, and the surface is easily kept in perfect condition, promoting health and saving housework.

Oak floors add value to property for rental or sale, at a negligible expense compared with temporary perishable floor coverings.

WRITE FOR THIS BOOKLET —containing modern color finishes with suggestions for treatment of various rooms.

OAK FLOORING BUREAU
1270 Builders' Bldg. CHICAGO

DANDRUFF

A Sure Way to End It

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store, and a four ounce bottle is all you will need.

This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

energy, the variety of his interests in life. He was forever studying something new, and was widely read in history, in travel, in poetry and fiction, and in special fields, like hunting and fishing.

These gave him something much more important than subjects to talk about. They give him subjects to listen about. So much has been said of Roosevelt's interesting conversation, that it is often overlooked that he was also a wonderful listener. He was a good listener for two reasons: first of all, he was usually well informed on what the other fellow was talking about, so that he listened intelligently. And, secondly—and even more important—he wanted to give the other fellow the pleasure of being allowed to talk about it.

Nothing delights the soul of man more than the chance to tell somebody else something he knows, and nothing gives that man a higher opinion of your intelligence than your willingness to listen to him. Roosevelt not only knew this fact about human nature, but he was so full of intellectual curiosity that he actually enjoyed acting upon it.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S personality rested upon essentially the same qualities as Theodore Roosevelt's. Strange, but true! Lincoln, no less than Roosevelt, was an ambitious politician, as well as a high-minded patriot and devoted servant of his country. And Lincoln, like Roosevelt, was an essentially generous man. He asked much of his fellow men, but he gave more than he asked. He had that largeness of mind that made him know that he who gives, gets. And he had that largeness of heart that made him like to give.

Lincoln did not believe that force was the best weapon to use to get things done. He did not shrink from using it where he had to, but he would try everything else first. Consequently, he developed the art of persuasiveness more highly than any other figure in our history has done. The practice of this art went far to create the unique personality we associate with his name. Its three essentials were patience, humor, and a third device that I will come to in a moment.

Consider Lincoln's patience first. It often infuriated his enemies and irritated his friends. It puzzled both. But in the end it gave him a mastery over both. Why? Because, again, the patient man is the man who is absolutely in control of his own spirit. The patient man is master of himself, and when people realize that they are dealing with a man who can master his own unruly soul, they come to have the same respect for him that they have for other fixed and inexorably sure forces.

Lincoln's humor—of course it is an old saying, but it is still as true as ever, that humor is a sense of proportion.

The man with a sense of humor is simply a man who has thoughtfully considered the relative values of things, and has appraised how much each is worth. When the life of the nation was at stake, Lincoln correctly appraised the value of an argument over who should be postmaster of some little town, when he told the clamorous friends of the two applicants to put their little petitions on a pair of scales and give the job to the man whose papers weighed the more. That was a truly humorous decision—and as wise as

Learn Piano JAZZ Quickly by Ear

Beginners and advanced students learn quickly at home—in spare time. Wonderful Niagara Method clearly shows you how. Complete course 20 lessons. 10 years successful teaching.

By R. C. JAMES

How I used to wish that I could sit down at the piano and pour out the golden syncopation of American melody, like the jazz piano players I had heard. How I used to wish that I could be the popular one in every crowd. But I could not play a note.

Niagara Method Showed Me The Way

Then somewhere—just as you are reading this—I read of the Niagara Method which makes piano playing wonderfully simple. I sent for Director Wright's book "The Niagara Secret." I read the book, and I knew it was right.

I followed Director Wright's principles, and in no time I had caught on to his ideas.

So Simple—So Easy—So Delightful

And the best part of it all is that there is nothing hard about the Niagara Method. In a short time, by following Director Wright's principles and by devoting a part of my spare time to the practical application of his course, I soon learned to play.

No tiresome scales—no arpeggios to learn—no weary hours of practice—no do-re-mi—no meaningless exercises. If you know the Niagara Method, you can sit down and reel off any popular song which the high-priced orchestra leaders play in cabarets, clubs, hotels, dance halls, or theatre.

Clip Coupon Now—Play In Few Months

If you have never played a note, or if you do play—no matter how well—you too may become a master of jazz and melody by learning the simple, wonderful Niagara Method.

FREE BOOK

Don't wait another day. Send the coupon now for the "Niagara Secret." This book is yours absolutely FREE. If 10c (coin or stamps) is enclosed you also receive wonderful booklet "How to Entertain at Piano"

Ronald G. Wright, Director
Niagara School of Music
252 Cleveland Ave., Niagara Falls, N. Y.

CLIP THIS COUPON NOW!

NIAGARA SCHOOL OF MUSIC, 252 Cleveland Avenue
Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Without obligation mail me your book "The Niagara Secret." I enclose 10c for book "How to Entertain at Piano"

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Big Profits MADE CANDIES!

Your Kitchen Can Be Your Candy Shop

SUCCESSFUL manufacturer teaches you secrets of candy-making in your spare time. The candy business is the only business where the little fellow has the big fellow at a disadvantage. You can start in your own kitchen—earn big money from the very beginning. We furnish tools and show how to quickly sell your candy at a big profit. Many now wealthy started with practically no capital—YOU CAN DO THE SAME! Write for fascinating FREE book which gives full details.

Capitol Candy School
DEPT. U-329, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I can't afford sore throat"

"I am a salesman. Discomfort, raspiness in my throat—is a handicap that shows in my record—costs me money. Coughing doesn't add to my welcome, either . . . That's why now I don't neglect my doctor, and why I always carry my bottle of Formamint."

The germ-killing agent in Formamint is one your doctor relies on. Unlike gargles, Formamint can be taken anywhere. One every hour to treat sore throat; as a preventive, one every two hours. Test Formamint yourself. All druggists. Send coupon today.

Formamint
THE GERM-KILLING THROAT TABLET

FREE OFFER

Bauer Chemical Co., Dept. J-7, 113 W. 18th St., N. Y. C.
Send me, free, sample bottle of Formamint.

Name_____

Address_____

LEARN "The GENTLE ANNIE"

It is a blind that lets the sunlightin... like a bath...

Add to quart of sweet cider cup Martini & Rossi non alcoholic Vermouth (Ital. or Ex. Dry). Add juice one lemon and two oranges. Few drops Amargo Bitters. Mix gently. Chill on ice. Pour in glasses, garnish with Maraschino cherries.

Send for "Happy Days Recipes"
to W. A. Taylor & Co., 94C Pine Street, New York City

MARTINI & ROSSI
Vermouth

Solomon's judgment. And it expressed a vivid and original personality.

The third art of Lincoln's personality is a little harder to explain. Another wise man was once asked to what he attributed his success. His reply was, "My ability to change the subject." That was a profound observation about human nature. Lincoln was past master of the art of applying it.

When a subject is under discussion, we tend to "take sides," and quite unconsciously we tend to oppose whatever view has been expressed by somebody else, precisely because he expressed it first, and because he did not say it exactly the way we had it in mind to say it. Before we know it, discussion turns to argument, and argument into a stubborn wrestling of wills. We close our minds to the merits of the question, in our earnestness to master this opposition. Action is paralyzed by the emotion of dissension.

There are only two ways to break a deadlock like this: One is for the one side to give way; and this seldom occurs, and never with good grace.

He that complies against his will
Is of his own opinion still.

The other way is for something to happen suddenly that so changes the atmosphere of the discussion that both parties relax their wills for a moment, when the subject can be reopened to open minds. Lincoln consciously caused that "something" to happen, and his method almost invariably was to say, "That reminds me," and then tell a funny story. "That reminds me," became inseparably identified with the personality of Lincoln, as did also his telling of funny stories. But he was never merely an idle teller of yarns. He had a serious and important purpose in being amusing. In the intense emotions aroused by discussion of the vital political issues of his day, Lincoln was able many times to "clear the air" by provoking a laugh and thereby getting people around him to return to rational thinking after a bitter argument. And by the practice of this art, Lincoln added a unique touch to his personality.

The art of "changing the subject" can be practiced in as many ways as there are people to practice it. I know a man of very original and striking personality who, when a lull in conversation threatens to become irksome, will inquire genially, "What is your opinion of rats?"

The other person will look first startled and then puzzled, and finally will begin to chuckle and then will start talking freely about some subject that interests him, just because the obvious absurdity of the question shows that the questioner is ready to listen to ideas about any subject on earth, and is also a person of original and interested mind. If you will develop your own way of "changing the subject," you will find that it automatically develops a new way of revealing your personality to others.

PERHAPS you may object to my talking so much about "practicing the art" of this or that. People of sensitive nature often feel that there is something not quite honest about the use of conscious art in their human relationships. So there is, if the art is mean, or if the purpose is underhand or self-seeking. But I have failed to

LAW—for Success in BUSINESS

To the man who would rise to a commanding position in business, a sound and practical knowledge of Law is exceedingly valuable. Among the larger business enterprises, the law-trained man is often preferred for the higher executive positions. Many great corporations—the U. S. Steel Corp., for example, the C. B. & Q. R. R., the International Paper Co., the National Biscuit Co., the Mutual Life Insurance Co., the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, the Packard Motor Car Co., the American Sugar Refining Co.—are headed by men of legal training. In the smaller corporations or in one's own business, a knowledge of law spells larger success. For the whole intricate structure of business is based on LAW.

Fit Yourself for Bigger Success

"In looking over the field," writes a prominent Eastern manufacturer, "I find that nearly all the positions commanding a salary of $10,000 or more are filled by men who have studied law." Fit yourself at home, in your spare time, for larger success in business. Full law course leading to degree of LL. B., or shorter Business Law course. LaSalle will guide you step by step. We furnish all text material, including fourteen-volume Law Library. Low cost, easy terms. Get our valuable 108-page "Law Guide" and "Evidence" books free. Send for them NOW.

LaSalle Extension University, Dept 233-L, Chicago
The World's Largest Business Training Institution

EARN PROMOTION AND COLLEGE CREDIT
through the
HOME-STUDY COURSES
in 40 different subjects given by
The University of Chicago
215 Ellis Hall, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

SHORT STORY WRITING

Particulars of Dr. Esenwein's famous forty-lesson course in writing and marketing of the Short-Story and sample copy of THE WRITER'S MONTHLY free. Write today.
THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
Dept. 50 Springfield, Mass.

Become a Foot Correctionist A new profession, not medical nor chiropody. All the trade you can attend to; many are making $3,000 to $10,000 yearly, easy terms for training by mail, no further capital needed or goods to buy, no agency or soliciting. Address
Stephenson Laboratory, 16 Back Bay, Boston, Mass.

Open a Tea Room of Your Own

Fortunes are being made in Tea Rooms, Motor Inns and Coffee Shops everywhere. You can open one in your own home—and make money hand over fist, or manage one already going. Big salaries paid to trained managers, shortage acute. We teach you entire business in your spare time. Write for Free Book "Pouring Tea For Profit."
Lewis Tea Room Institute, Dept. AR-1414, Washington, D. C.

YOU CAN OIL PAINT

Amazing new method teaches men or women to earn after first lesson. OIL PAINT photos—portraits, landscapes or art subjects. Earn $18 to $100 and more a week. Oil Paint Outfit given. Send now for free illustrated book. Pictorial Art Studios Inc., Dept. A-A, 2926 Broadway, Chicago, Ill.

BOYS WANTED!

I'm looking for ambitious boys who wish to earn spending money and win free prizes in their spare time. Write me now for full information.
Jim Thayer, Dept. A3, The Crowell Publishing Co. Springfield, Ohio.

Give 5 Minutes A Day—Look Years Younger

Book sent FREE tells you how Kathryn Murray's Five-Minute-A-Day Facial Exercises regain and retain the lovely skin texture and roundness of youth for thousands of delighted women. Young looks depend on thousands of tiny muscles just beneath the skin surface. Wrinkles, crow's feet, hollows, loose sagging skin, sluggish circulation, sallow complexion occur when lack of exercise causes underskin muscles to become weak, flabby, droopy.

KATHRYN MURRAY'S FIVE-MINUTE-A-DAY FACIAL EXERCISES

Thousands of women have turned to Kathryn Murray's Facial Exercises with amazing results. Nothing extra needed. Just your natural beauty and Five-Minutes-A-Day.

RESULTS ASSURED

Send for FREE book TODAY! Regain or retain the glorious complexion rightfully yours.
KATHRYN MURRAY, Inc.
Suite 238 5 So. Wabash Chicago, Illinois

Scientific Facts About Diet

A CONDENSED book on diet entitled "Eating for Health and Efficiency" has been published for free distribution by the Health Extension Bureau of Battle Creek, Mich. Contains set of health rules, many of which may be easily followed right at home or while traveling. You will find in this book a wealth of information about food elements and their relation to physical welfare.

This book is for those who wish to keep physically fit and maintain normal weight. Not intended as a guide for chronic invalids as all such cases require the care of a competent physician. Name and address on card will bring it without cost or obligation.

HEALTH EXTENSION BUREAU
SUITE J-218 GOOD HEALTH BLDG.
BATTLE CREEK, MICHIGAN

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Young outdoor men wanted

Interesting, vigorous outdoor work in a growing organization where merit wins advancement. Good starting wages. Permanent positions and a real future for men who make good. Our present field force of Davey Tree Experts cannot meet the increasing demand. So we are selecting now, to enter our employ, a few sturdy, clean young men, thorough Americans, single, between 20 and 30 years old, free to travel, industrious, with good practical education, and able to give good references. Write for qualification blank to serve in place of personal interview. The Davey Tree Expert Co., Inc., 859 Federal Bldg., Kent, Ohio

We Pay Freight

$796 Buy Direct

Save $200 to $1500

Beautiful 6-room home with porch

Mrs. Coombs saved $1000. B. A. Anderson saved $500. F. E. Davis saved between $1000 and $1500 by building the Liberty way. You can do as well. No waste. No worry. 40% less labor. Substantial, permanent homes. Write today for full information.

FREE Beautiful Book of Liberty Homes

Pictures wonderful homes from $379 to $1483. Price includes all lumber cut-to-fit, millwork, roofing, lath, hardware, paints, nails. Materials fully guaranteed. Plans FREE. Freight paid east of Mississippi River and north of Mason-Dixon line, also Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri.
Costs Nothing to Find Out; Write For Catalog Now.
LEWIS MFG. CO., Dept. 4-B, Bay City, Mich.

Too Fat? You Can Reduce

"I reduced from 48 inches to 38 inches in 35 days," says R. E. Johnson, of Akron, O., "just by wearing a Director Belt. Stomach now firm, doesn't sag and I feel fine."

The Director Belt gets at the cause of fat and quickly removes it by its gentle, kneading, massaging action on the abdomen, which causes the fat to be dissolved and absorbed. Thousands have proved it and doctors recommend it as the natural way to reduce. Stop drugs, exercises and dieting. Try this easy way.

Sent on Trial

Let us prove our claims. We'll send a Director for trial. If you don't get results you owe nothing. You don't risk a penny. Write for trial offer, doctors' endorsements and letters from users. Mail the coupon NOW!

LANDON & WARNER
Dept. 2-B, 332 S. La Salle St., Chicago
Gentlemen: Without cost or obligation on my part please send me details of your trial offer.

Name.....

Address

make my purpose plain if I have not by now clearly indicated that the expressions of personality I have been describing are all rooted in thoughtfulness of others. Every personality that anybody would care to imitate or rival is a pleasing personality, and the wish to please is at least half for the purpose of giving others pleasure as well as ourselves.

Living is an art, and it can be practiced artistically with as high sincerity as Michael Angelo practiced the art of sculpture.

To wish to carve out of the shapeless—perhaps misshapen—mass of our own natures a personality attractive to others is certainly no less worthy an ambition than the wish of the sculptor to carve out of the shapeless marble an arresting and noble figure. And it requires no less of conscious art to do it.

Therefore, when a person studies what are the things within himself that will be interesting and pleasing to others, and when he practices the arts of revealing them, he is doing something not only altogether unobjectionable but something that is really his duty to do. The world would be a sorry place to live in if all of us stayed bottled up in ourselves. And as we are compelled to reveal ourselves to others, anyway, by the very fact that we have to meet them, it is only decent that we should try to show them our best selves.

IT SHOULD, then, be accepted as a duty we owe to others as well as to ourselves, to show that "outward and visible evidence" of that "inner and spiritual grace." Be yourself—enlarge by study and good feeling the riches of your inner life. Act yourself—study the arts of giving outward expression to those riches. And you will find that most of the difficulties in the way of expressing them will disappear if you will develop the habit of thinking about the other fellow instead of thinking about yourself—of asking yourself, "What will interest him?" "What will please him?" "What will be useful to him, or make him feel more comfortable or happier?"

Self-consciousness will be swallowed up as your mind becomes absorbed in him instead of in yourself. Diffidence will disappear. That "muscle-bound" feeling in your own spirit will relax as you forget yourself. And you will automatically "act naturally," because you will not have your mind on yourself, or what you are doing, at all. And when you act naturally, the real you is showing itself outside, and your real personality appears to the eyes of others.

"THE GREATEST WAR OF ALL TIME—War Against the Insects," vividly describes, next month, the terrible encroachments that the insects are making in this country. It is estimated that their annual depredations amount to about two billion dollars. The story of the campaigns that are being waged against the steadily advancing battalions, marching millions strong, despoiling crops, and ruining trees and fruit, is wonderful reading. The insects are out to oust us from this planet. Will they succeed?

"I'm going to raise his salary"

"I've had my eye on him for some time and I know he can handle bigger work.

"He studies those I. C. S. textbooks every chance he gets, and I want to tell you it has made him a valuable man for this business.

"I'm going to raise his salary and give him that new job we were talking about. I wish we had more men like him."

How do you stand when your employer checks up his men for promotion? Does he pass you by as just a routine worker, or does he think of you as a man who is ambitious to get ahead? Won't you be far more likely to get the promotion if he knows you are studying at home and are really preparing yourself to handle bigger work?

Think it over. Then act. It takes only a moment to mark and mail the coupon and find what the International Correspondence Schools can do for you, yet that one simple little step may be the means of changing your whole life. "Do it now."

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 7486-E, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation on my part, please send me a copy of your 48-page booklet "Who Wins and Why" and tell me how I can qualify for the position or in the subject before which I have marked an X:

BUSINESS TRAINING COURSES

☐ Business Management
☐ Industrial Management
☐ Personnel Organization
☐ Traffic Management
☐ Business Law
☐ Banking and Banking Law
☐ Accountancy (including C.P.A.)
☐ Nicholson Cost Accounting
☐ Bookkeeping
☐ Private Secretary
☐ Spanish ☐ French
☐ Salesmanship
☐ Advertising
☐ Better Letters
☐ Show Card Lettering
☐ Stenography and Typing
☐ Business English
☐ Civil Service
☐ Railway Mail Clerk
☐ Common School Subjects
☐ High School Subjects
☐ Illustrating

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL COURSES

☐ Electrical Engineering
☐ Electric Lighting
☐ Mechanical Engineer
☐ Mechanical Draftsman
☐ Machine Shop Practice
☐ Railroad Positions
☐ Gas Engine Operating
☐ Civil Engineer
☐ Surveying and Mapping
☐ Metallurgy ☐ Mining
☐ Steam Engineering ☐ Radio
☐ Architect
☐ Architects' Blueprints
☐ Contractor and Builder
☐ Architectural Draftsman
☐ Concrete Builder
☐ Structural Engineer
☐ Chemistry ☐ Pharmacy
☐ Automobile Work
☐ Airplane Engines
☐ Agriculture and Poultry
☐ Mathematics

Name.....
Street Address..... 3-6-24
City..... State.....
Occupation.....

Persons residing in Canada should send this coupon to the International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Limited, Montreal, Canada.

Making the Old Home Young

A meaty booklet chock-full of Ideas for improving the Value and Beauty of your home by building porches, remodeling roof, cornice and gables, and making other inexpensive alterations. It tells you how and where to use Louisiana Red Cypress, "The Wood Eternal," in order to secure enduring, economical construction in everything you build.

Let us send you a copy—write today

LOUISIANA RED CYPRESS BUREAU
508 Carondelet St. New Orleans, La.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Start Now

Here's your chance to have a lot of fun winning prizes and earning money. A place is open for you in the Crowell Club of Junior Salesmen—the liveliest and peppiest bunch of boys in America.

Earn Money—Win Prizes

Crowell Junior Salesmen are boys, like yourself, who make good use of their spare time after school. They deliver three of the best known magazines to regular customers. When they started they had no experience. We taught them how to get their customers. They always have their own spending money jingling in their pockets and, also, win dandy prizes selected from our Big Book of Prizes containing over 300 articles.

Mail the Coupon

Just dig up your pencil stub and print your name and address on the coupon and mail it today. You will then be started in business for yourself, and made happy by cash profits as well as prizes. Membership in a great Organization is open to you. Join now!

Jim Thayer, Dept. A-2
The Crowell Publishing Co.,
Springfield, Ohio

Dear Jim: Show me the way to money and prizes.

Name .....

Address .....

Town ..... State .....

The Person I Know Who Gets the Most Fun Out of Life

FIRST PRIZE

My Boss Gets a Lot of Fun Doing for Others

IT MAY be because I see him every work-day, and know that he is happy every day of the year, that I think my boss gets more real, genuine fun out of life than anyone else I have met. He can tell the funniest stories, and make the most humorous speeches of anyone I know. He enjoys hunting, and fishing, and any kind of outdoor life to the fullest. But he gets his most fun out of life by doing things for folks.

Every time a circus or a big show comes to our town, he sees that all the orphan children are there. He arranges transportation, sees to it that peanuts, candy, pop, and favors are plentiful. Then he goes along with them, and helps them enjoy the show.

He gets a lot of fun out of helping a down-and-outer get a job. I remember one dear old crippled lady, with a small dependent grandson, who came to him for help. He secured pleasant work for her, and a paper route for her grandson. Accountants and stenographers often come to him for help. My boss not only tells them of a place where there may be a vacancy, but telephones the prospective employer for an appointment.

My boss gets a big kick out of helping his sixty-five employees keep out of debt. Naturally, some make unwise investments and get into debt. When my boss learns of this, he calls upon the debtor, and explains that Jim is not able to meet his obligations, but that he will repay what he owes by instalments. Backed by my boss, Jim always does.

At Christmas time my boss has more fun than at any other time of the year. He collects the Santa Claus letters that are mailed in the post office, makes investigations, and where there are poor children, he sees that Santa Claus brings them what they ask for. And the fun he has reading the letters!—but that joy is mingled with tears. C. P.

SECOND PRIZE

Being a Wife and Mother Gives Me a Kick

PERHAPS I am egotistical, but I think I get more fun out of life than anyone else I know. I love to wake early in the morning and feel the cool air on my face. I love to dress quickly and get a good hot breakfast for my family. I love to watch my husband starting to work, and the children going off to school, for it is a good school. I am sure they will make better citizens for having attended it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Alone, in the mornings I make beds, sweep floors, dust, mend clothes, sew on buttons, and darn stockings. Monotonous routine? It isn't monotonous to me. Because it's part of my job, I like it. I love to sew for the children. The colors seem gayer and the materials crisper each year. I love to wash. I love to see my clothes "zipping" on the line.

In the afternoons I call on my neighbors, or they call on me. I am guardian of a dozen Camp Fire Girls. We have jolly meetings, especially when we have picnics in the woods.

Our evenings at home are best of all. Dinner is always a leisurely meal. But I wash the dishes and get into the living-room in double-quick time. There I find my husband reading and the children studying or reading.

Sometimes I read too. Sometimes I write letters. Often I study my Sunday-school lesson, for I love my class of young girls, and want to be a good leader for them. But, "Sometimes I sit and think, and sometimes I just sit." And I enjoy every bit of it. C. B.

THIRD PRIZE

Little Dickie Bubbles Over With the Joy of Living

HIS name is Richard; but if you called him that he would hardly look up from his latest pastime of trying to tie the strings of a doll's bonnet under the chin of the cat. Try "Dickie"—he will immediately pause in his occupation and turn toward you a face crinkly with smiles.

Dickie lives on a farm. The animals which constitute the subjects of the tiny absolute monarchy are his unfailing delight. At his approach, the cows will pause in their grazing to contemplate him with soft, friendly eyes. If he advances close enough, a rough inquisitive tongue will be thrust against his sleeve. Between giggles he will inform me: "Bossie Cow tissed me! I yike Bossie Cow!"

When Grandpa gathers the milk buckets and starts for the barn, Dickie is breathless with eagerness. As soon as the massive door is rolled back, he hastens ahead. In the darkest corner he finds the milking stool. He lugs it forward, clasping it tightly against his breast. He says: "Here, Gandpa! I dot it for you!"

While the thin streams of milk find the bucket, Dickie watches the operation, fascinated. He crouches low at one side of the cow, so that he misses nothing of this evening chore. Lest he disturb the cow, he stifles his merriment behind a hand.

A brood of pigs has provided him with hours of entertainment. Fortunately for our peace of mind, he stands in some awe of the mother sow—so has never ventured over the rail fence which encloses them. But when he sees the sow flat on her side with the eager pigs wriggling over her, nosing for their dinner, his shouts and handclapping reach the house.

I do not think that I know of another who is getting as much fun out of life as three-year-old Dickie, who begins his day with singing, and ends it with a sleepy: "Dood night, Mama! Dood night, Papa! Dood night, Gandpa!" A. S. P.

The plate glass test—This glass was pressed against a Goodrich Silvertown till the tread flattened as it would flatten against the road. Note how the center grooves can close up, when the tire is under load.

See What Happens

when Goodrich Silvertowns meet the Road

Balloon tires are soft. They yield. Their tread flattens against the road. The center compresses, letting the "shoulders" of the tread come down to the ground.

Simple facts—but what a tremendous effect they have on mileage!

Suppose the center could not yield. Suppose it had bulky masses of rubber where it should be flexible. Then it would crowd the surrounding rubber out of shape. It would distort the shoulder rubber. And uneven, choppy, wasteful wear would be the result.

But Goodrich Silvertowns have the successful hinge-center tread design. Triple-grooved, easy-flexing center. Massive "shoulders." No crowding. No distortion. No "piling up" of rubber can cause premature wear.

You get the full service which correct design and skillful curing have put into Goodrich Silvertowns. They are bonded together by Water-Cured rubber—toughened to remarkable uniformity by application of heat from outside and inside both, instead of from outside only.

Added to this extra toughening process, there is the equalized strength of 5,000 stretch-matched cords. Three vital features combine to give you long and carefree mileage.

THE B. F. GOODRICH RUBBER COMPANY
Established 1870 Akron, Ohio
In Canada: Canadian Goodrich Co., Kitchener, Ont.

Goodrich Silvertowns

"BEST IN THE LONG RUN"

Listen In every Wednesday night, Goodrich Radio Hour 9:30 P. M. Eastern Standard Time, over WEAF and the Red Network.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Scattergood Causes a Snake to Bite

(Continued from page 33)

"Scattergood Baines," said Ovid.

Mr. Downs sucked in his breath. Scattergood Baines! That was fruit he never had even dreamed of picking.

"But," he objected, "Baines doesn't need to loot a bank."

"I wouldn't say he'd looted it," said Ovid. "But the's times he needs ready cash in his deals. If he's took anythin', he calc'lates to put it back 'fore the bank examiner gits around. I figger it he's jest borrowin' on the sly-like. But I can't take no chances. Suthin' might go wrong so he couldn't put back."

"It might indeed," said Downs. "What do you want me to do?"

"W-al, I kind of figgered like this: If I could git me a lawyer that knowed about bookkeepin' and what-not, and could look over them manip'lated books and checks and notes and sich, why, he could kind of represent me, and go to Mr. Baines and make him put back right off; and then I'd be safe."

"Yes," said Downs, warmly glowing with anticipation; "but Baines would know it if I went in to make an examination of the books."

"I don't figger you'd have to make no big examination. Wouldn't it be enough if you could jest find one note that was funny, or a couple of pieces of switchin' around? Jest enough to prove suthin' was wrong?"

"It would," said Mr. Downs. "It would be amply sufficient!"

"W-al," said Ovid, "I cal'clate I kin fix it so's you kin look around to see what's to be seen, and kin pick out what evidence you need. And him never know it a-tall. Gen'ally of a Tuesday he goes off to the city and doesn't come back till Wednesday noon. To-morrow's a Tuesday. He won't be in town to-morrow night."

"How does that help?"

"I GOT the keys to the bank, and the combination to the vault, hain't I?"

"Isn't it a time lock?"

"No. Jest an ordinary door."

"Yes; and then?"

"Why, nobuddy's up in Coldriver after twelve. And if anybody did happen to see a light and me workin', I could make out my balance was off a couple of cents and I was huntin' for it, couldn't I?"

"To be sure."

"Whilst you come in quiet by the side door, and worked back in the vault, where nobuddy ever could ketch sight of ye."

"I see. But why can't you find this evidence and bring it to me?"

"I hain't no lawyer. I dunno what to fetch. It's got to be a feller that knows his business. Now I tell ye what—so's you'n' me needn't to be seen together. I'll jest give ye the key to the side door, and you kin git a duplicate filed in the mornin'. And mail the real key right back to me. And I'll be there workin', and you kin come into town on the quiet, and jest let yourself in whenever it looks safe to ye."

Downs hesitated, but the opportunity was too tempting.

"To-morrow night?" he asked.

"Yes. . . . Here's the key."

Downs pocketed the little implement, discussed details for another ten minutes with Ovid, and drove back to Higgins Bridge well satisfied with a night's work which should lead to profits larger than he had ever hoped to win.

IT WAS well after darkness had fallen on Tuesday night when Lawyer Downs drove out of Higgins Bridge. He carried, as was his custom, a large leather brief case with his name printed on the flap in gold letters, and hoped to return to his office before morning with this receptacle well filled with evidence which none knew how to use more efficiently than he.

At the edge of Coldriver he parked his car in the woods, and walked into town by dark roads, keeping to the shadows, so that none might be able to testify that they had seen him in that place. His watch pointed to midnight before he emerged from a clump of lilacs beside the barber shop and slunk along the wall to the side door of the bank.

He paused before the door, hesitating even at the last minute, ready to draw back at the least warning of danger. The pause was but for an instant; he reached toward the keyhole with the key which he had procured; but did not insert it. Before he could do so, the door opened inwardly and an urbane voice said:

"Come in, Mr. Downs. Glad to see ye any hour of the day or night. Step right in. Ye didn't keep me waitin' a minute. I allus did admire prompt folks."

Even then Mr. Downs would have withdrawn, but Scattergood's friendly hand was on his arm, drawing him inside.

"Step right into the office," he said, "and we kin thrash things out together amiable. Rest your feet. Ye kin smoke up if ye got a mind.

"Now, le's see. You come over with suthin' in mind, didn't ye? Kind of got it into your head the' was suthin' wrong with the bank, didn't ye?"

Downs grunted.

"Figgered I was committin' some shenanigan to the detriment of the depositors. And you, bein' an upright man of the law, calc'lated to pertect the innocent. Yes, sir, you jest plumb aimed to git evidence and make me disgorge, didn't ye?"

"Yes," said Mr. Downs.

"I admire your enterprise," said Scattergood. "Near's I kin make out, you're one of the most enterprisin' fellers in this neck of the woods. You've done perty well fer yourself, hain't ye, Downs? Make a fair sight of money one way and another?"

"Yes," said Mr. Downs.

"Had a lot of experience, hain't ye?"

"I have."

"But the's one experience ye hain't never had yit. Know what it is?"

"No."

"It's bein' shot through the head with a rifle," said Scattergood.

"Are you threatening me?"

"Farthest thought from my mind. I calc'late to pertect ye. Now, I hain't so het up about your health, Mr. Downs. But I got a firm prejudice agin friends of mine soilin' their hands with blood. Savin' you is a kind of a by-product; savin' that friend of mine from shootin' off his gun is the main business of this here factory. . . Because he's this kind of a feller, that what he shoots at he hits."

"You mean somebody plans to murder me?"

"I don't calc'late he looks at it as murder. But then, him and the law might not agree exact. And you can't cure a wrong by committin' another one. . . . No, if he was jest contemplatin' hoss-whippin' ye within an inch of your life, I dunno's I'd interfere. I'd let nature take its course."

"Who wants to shoot me?"

"Feller by the name of Roth."

Mr. Downs uttered a peculiar and unpleasant sound.

"Know him, don't ye?"

"Yes."

"Figgered you did. . . . But let's you'n' me talk about you. And about appearances and things. Now, I could 'a' played a perty mean trick onto you, Downs, if I'd 'a' been a-mind to. Knowin' the kind of a feller you be, I could 'a' bamboozled ye suthin' scandalous. Look where ye be now! Kind of compromisin', hain't it? Prowlin' around a bank with a key you had made to the door? Folks might figger you wa'n't lookin' after their in'rests so much as you was lookin' after what was in the safe."

"Nonsense," said Mr. Downs.

"I contrived it," said Scattergood. "Knowin' your bent for discoverin' things about folks, I figgered you'd be tickled to death to find out suthin' about me. I got money and I could pay high to keep it quiet. Eh? Anyhow, you swallered all Ovid Nixon told ye, and you had a key made and all, and here you be. Them facts kin be proved, especial the key part.

"W-al, if I'd 'a' been a mean man like some, I'd 'a' let ye go ahead, instid of welcomin' ye at the door. I'd 'a' let ye start fumblin' at the safe, and then I'd 'a' walked in on ye with the sheriff—and where'd you be? You'd be guilty of breakin' and enterin' in the night time, and nothin' in the world 'ud 'a' saved ye from a term in the penitentiary. But I thought mebbe if I fetched ye over here we could settle things amiable. So I fetched ye, and I've showed ye what I could do to ye if I'd a mind. Got that clear?"

"Yes. But you can't frighten me."

"I CALC'LATE you're a brave man," said Scattergood approvingly. "Well, if you're as brave as all that, why, good night to ye. I seen Roth leave his house with his gun, and he's crouchin' some'eres waitin'. . . . Still, I don't want nothin' like that to happen. Not to Roth."

"What do you want?" Downs asked, somewhat uneasily.

"W-al, seems to me you didn't act jest fair and aboveboard, accordin' to the way a lawyer ought to act—not when ye enticed young Jim Roth to gamble down in your town. Especial, when you didn't play fair, and kep' on cheatin' the boy till he was owin' ye nine-ten hundred dollars."

"You can't prove it," said Downs.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Come into Drafting!

Men who can read blue-prints and draw plans are "sitting pretty" these days. No wonder, when you consider that every machine, every building, all industrial activities start on the Drafting table! Intensive production, record-breaking construction operations, have created a great demand for expert Draftsmen capable of designing and calculating original plans.

Expert Draftsmen Get BIG Pay Checks!

Get this point—that Drafting isn't just one line of work—it reaches out into the Electrical, Manufacturing, Building Construction, Automotive and Structural industries. That is why you'll find well-paid Drafting positions advertised in all industrial centers of the U. S. 70,000 vacancies reported in the past 12 months. And that is why I advise men to go into Drafting, particularly if handicapped by lack of high-school or college education. Today you are in competition with high-school and college graduates for the better-paid jobs. You must have specialized training to win.

The Entering Wedge to Success in all Building and Manufacturing Lines

I recommend Drafting, too, because it can be QUICKLY learned at home, in spare time—without quitting your job, without losing a day's time or a dollar in pay. Because you're sure there will be a good position waiting when you are ready for it. And because the work is so fascinating and offers better-than-ordinary chances for advancement. For the Draftsman is in close contact with important work and BIG MEN, and he is right in line for promotion to Superintendent and other executive positions.

3 Drafting Lessons! Actually FREE!

to prove you can learn at home, in your spare time!

You will never have a more serious personal problem than deciding your future life-work—so we merely urge you to LOOK INTO Drafting. See how you like it, see if you learn as readily as most men do, get the facts about the opportunities, the salaries paid, the jobs open, the chances for promotion. This is why, on receipt of your name, we will send you the first three lessons of our Drafting course without cost or obligation.

Home-training backed with an agreement to get you a DRAFTING JOB at a BIG RAISE —or money refunded

Now, at a cost you can afford, on terms of only $6 per month, you can actually BUY a fine Drafting position and a 50% increase in pay. A million-dollar institution contracts to give both—the training, then the employment. Under money-back penalty.

This agreement brings you your SECOND CHANCE. To repair a neglected education, to specialize, to change to a line where you can get ahead more rapidly. Read it, and investigate it!

The American School

Chartered 30 years as an EDUCATIONAL institution. We offer complete, thorough up-to-date instruction, built by 200 leading Educators, Engineers and Executives. A unique instruction, built to meet the specifications of well-paid jobs as laid down by employers themselves, yet simplified for ready understanding by men with only common schooling.

O. C. MILLER
Director Extension Work

And we are the first in the home study field to recognize the need of giving a COMPLETE SERVICE to ambitious men —training, plus employment. Which takes you as you are, supplies the equipment you lack, and lands you in the better job you seek. Without risk to you!

O. C. MILLER, Director Extension Work,
THE AMERICAN SCHOOL,
Dept. D-21, Drexel Ave. & 58th St.,
Chicago, Illinois

Please send without cost or obligation:

1. Three Drafting Lessons.
2. Facts about the opportunities in Drafting.
3. Your Guarantee to train and place me under money-back penalty.

Name.....

Address.....

Age..... Occupation.....

The American School

Dept. D-21, Drexel Ave. & 58th St., Chicago, Ill.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"I don't have to prove it," said Scattergood suavely. "I know it. . . . And then ye got him to sign his pa's name to a note. He didn't want to, did he? But you, Downs, says to him that it wa'n't no forgery, because you didn't calc'late ever to use the note, only for security. You says to him, says you, that he'd be mighty anxious to pay up and git that forged note back, and so you'd druther have it than one signed by him. . . . And you said you'd go to his pa if he didn't."

"You can't prove it!"

"Be ye sure?" asked Scattergood. "I'm a contrivin' feller. I kin prove a sight of things folks think I can't. I kin prove Roth's been a-payin' you blackmail ever since. You've dang nigh ruined him, and you've got him real desprit."

"Jim Roth forged that note."

"Not in intention," said Scattergood. "He jest done it to put himself in your power, so's you'd have better security for him payin' up. He never contemplated robbin' his father. . . . And so I calc'lated to toll ye over here like I done, so's we could have a kind of friendly talk."

"What do you want?"

"FUST off, I want back that there note ye been a-holdin' over Roth's head. And next I want back what money Roth's paid to ye—plus legal int'rest.

"And then, I want ye to go off some'eres a long ways from here. You're too dog-gone enterprisin' fer us simple folks. You got too much git-up-and-git. About as fur as Californy," Scattergood ended pleasantly. "What say?"

"No!"

"It's the middle of the night," said Scattergood, "and you hain't aware of anybody seein' you come here, be ye?"

"No."

"So nobody'd know you'n' me had this talk—but mebbe Ovid yonder. And you could move to Californy 'thout excitin' no comment. Jest a perty rich man goin' to a pleasant climate to spend his declinin' years. . . . It's a choice, Downs. Seems like you got three choices. That's one. Jest walkin' out and seein' what'll happen is two; and gittin' disbarred and sent to jail for doin' what a lawyer's got no business to do is the last. Which'll ye have?"

"None," said Mr. Downs belligerently. "You can't prove a thing!"

"Jim Roth is back," said Scattergood. "I found him and fetched him."

"I'll jail him," said Downs.

"Not by no means," said Scattergood. "I been a-lookin' into one-two transactions of yourn. Hey, Ovid, send in Mr. Sweers."

THE door opened and a well-dressed gentleman of middle age appeared. "Mr. Downs, this here is Mr. Sweers, from Boston. Don't look like one of these here detectives ye kin hire, does he?"

"I'm really a hardware salesman," said Mr. Sweers, with a meaning smile.

"Now, supposin'," said Scattergood, "Mr. Sweers had been probin' into your affairs, and had run onto how you bribed the jury in the Riddle case, and had got confessions out of three jurors. How about that? And what if he dug into the records, and found out how you handled them trust funds of the Webber estate, and sold 'em wuthless lands of your own through a third party! That's jest two items; both'll lead to disbarment, and nobody kin say what the Grand Jury'll do."

"If I were you," said Mr. Sweers, "I would consider carefully."

Mr. Downs looked uneasily at the window. It was black outside. He was in the enemy's country and in the enemy's hands—and guilt was on his conscience. What if Scattergood had unearthed the truth about that jury fixing, or about the Webber estate? And could prove it. . . . Courage is at lowest ebb just between midnight and morning.

"I calc'late we better call the sheriff," said Scattergood. "He's goin' to be obdurate."

"Wait," said Mr. Downs.

"I'm goin' to count up to ten," said Scattergood. "When I git to the end, the sheriff comes. . . . One . . . two . . . three . . . four . . ."

Mr. Downs held out until "six," but the pressure of events was too much for him. His courage broke. "What do you want?" he asked again.

"I tole ye once," said Scattergood. "Seven". . .

"You win!" said Downs.

"Where's the note—the Roth note?"

Downs took a wallet out of his pocket. "I pretended to keep it in my safe," he said; "but I've carried it with me."

Scattergood tore it to bits. "Now, I got principal and interest figgered. Jest make out a check fer the amount. I guarantee it's correct."

Mr. Downs signed, scowling.

"Now," said Scattergood, "I calc'late ye got to be kind of uncomfortable till mornin'. Till Roth kin cash this check. You might git it into your head to stop payment. So we'll have ye stay right here till he telephones he's got the money. . . . A couple of the boys'll see you don't go stirrin' around. . . . And then fer Californy. I hope you behave so's folks'll be fonder of ye there than they be here. . . . The boys is standin' outside, so don't git the idee of goin' away no'eres. . . . G'-by, Downs."

MR. SWEERS and Scattergood left the bank and walked up the street.

"I never said you was no detective, did I?" Scattergood asked.

"And I told him outright I was a hardware salesman," said Mr. Sweers, who had been selling stock to Scattergood for years.

"We didn't even tell him we investigated them cases," said Scattergood. "All we done was to say, 'What if he had?'"

"He was in a state of mind to draw conclusions," said Mr. Sweers.

"I'm obleeged to ye," said Scattergood. "Now, I'm a-goin' to roust out Martin Roth and tell him he kin go acrost and wake up Lucy and tell her they kin marry whenever they want to. I don't calc'late she'll object to bein' disturbed."

"She will not," said Mr. Sweers.

"Ever study snakes?" asked Scattergood.

"Not much. Why?"

"W-al, I reached the conclusions the best way to git rid of one was to make him bite himself. . . . Which Mr. Downs was accommodatin' enough to do . . . .G'-by, Mr. Sweers!"

More Letters to Louise

(Continued from page 29)

age, and asked her to come down to the bank and spend a few hours with him. He goes to work before she is out of bed in the morning, has lunch before she gets home from school, and frequently works at night.

I suspect she was bored at the bank, for he was busy much of the time; but I know that having her there within sight was a treat to him. How he loves that kid!

Do you know how many times I have had you to myself within the past six months? Just once. We were going to a show at the county seat, five of us, and I schemed and got my ducks in a row so we had the back seat all to ourselves. You did the talking and I listened, and I enjoyed every foot of the eighteen-mile ride as much as you enjoyed the show.

I am not writing this to ask that you make yourself unhappy in order to make me happy. I want no martyrs in this family.

But I want you to understand that any drifting apart that may occur is not of my doing. I want to be your port in time of storm and your squire when pleasure is afoot; and whenever you can spare a few hours from your studies and piano practice and skating and basketball and reading and sewing, I'm ready to drop this prosaic business of working for a living, and demonstrate just how well an old-timer can spread himself when he sets out to show a lady a good time.

Cultivate friends by the thousand if you can. It's easier now while you are young. Enjoy your kid world all you can.

But don't shut Dad out. I may not always understand, and at times I may seem too bossy to merit comradeship; but I'm a good hand to listen to troubles, and whatever happens I'll be on your side.

I seem to have been a long while in getting at the point, but what I mean is that I'd like to be a kind of buddy of yours if you think I'll do.

OLD LONELY DAD.

Letter Number 3

MY DEAR LOUISE: I think it high time to discuss with you the art of reading books. You have read a great deal, but you have read unfairly. You have cheated. And by cheating you have lost much.

You have browsed through the bookcases at will, devouring Stevenson, Mark Twain, Poe, Kipling, Wilde; and yet I suspect that I can open at random any volume you have read and find a word you cannot adequately define.

Doubtless, you got the meaning of the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Property Owners may Secure this Loss-prevention Service through Responsible Insurance Agents

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

word from the context as you read; but a word isn't yours until you can define and use it, and to skip the big words in reading is like skipping the work in an arithmetic problem and getting the answer out of the back of the book.

If reading offered no other profit than the entertainment to be got out of the story, your method would be wholly satisfactory. But the real profit consists in the knowledge you absorb, and the particular value of fiction lies in the fact that it wishes knowledge upon you when you don't realize that you are being instructed.

This painless method of getting knowledge—having ideas sneaked into your head while a story-teller keeps you off guard—is a very ancient business, and has been popular in all ages; but to get the full value of fiction, you must be fair to the author. You must know, or at once discover, the meaning of every word he uses, else you miss part of his tale.

I know people who skip all descriptions of weather and scenery and read only the conversation. They are but doing on a larger scale what you are doing when you skip big words.

I WISH I could make you understand how important words are and how urgently you need them. They aren't just collections of letters. They are the tools your brain uses to think with. No brain can think beyond the vocabulary it has on hand, and to brush aside a word your brain needs is like brushing aside food your body needs.

Every word in your dictionary was coined by some man to express an idea or a bit of knowledge, and you can't get the idea or absorb the knowledge until you understand the words.

Every word you learn makes you richer, broadens your horizon, equips your mind to reach out further. Don't skip words. Collect and treasure them.

A girl of thirteen is nobody's fool. You know what you enjoy and what you don't enjoy. If you read an unenjoyable book because somebody says you should read it, you get very little present profit and remember the book only as an unpleasant experience.

There are dishes you do not like, and it would be both unfair and unintelligent to force them on you.

I don't want your mind to be a dumping ground for other people's ideas. It is no mark of intelligence to read many books, and accept without question all that they contain. When you have read a book that tells one side of the story and almost persuades you to believe, I want you to be judicious enough to find a book that tells the other side, and then, to form your own opinion.

The portion of your anatomy that you inelegantly call your "bean" is intended to be a manufacturing plant, not a warehouse for second-hand goods.

Read those things that you can read with gusto and digest after reading, and leave other works to those who can appreciate them. That was Roosevelt's plan, and few men of his time had a wider range of knowledge than his or a culture more complete.

If you think a book is rot, say it is rot, though all the critics in the world exhaust their vocabularies to praise it.

Just be Louise, without shame or pretense. Any half-wit can be an echo.

Yours for individuality, DAD.

Letter Number 4

MY DEAR LOUISE: It isn't at all easy to write letters like this one, for pity persists in interfering with what I conceive to be duty.

Whenever I feel an urge to criticize you, I remember the morning they brought Miss Donnie home from the hospital. She lay with her head on a satin pillow, and you wanted to touch her face. I wouldn't let you, for I was afraid the memory of that coldness would make you afraid at night.

We walked out into the back yard, where the roses were budding and the dew on the grass was sparkling in the light of the newly-risen sun, and you leaned against the fence and looked at me dry-eyed.

It seemed so strange that you should be dry-eyed, for you were almost ten years old and you had loved Miss Donnie dearly. But you had known much bitter experience before I adopted you, and it had taught you to keep your feelings far beneath the surface.

You looked at me dry-eyed; but there was sorrow beyond measure in your voice when you said, "Oh, Daddy, I have had two mothers and both of them are dead!"

It is not an easy thing to be a parent when it is necessary to reprove.

The other night a boy little older than yourself brought you home from a party in his father's car. You had gone to the party at twilight, quite unattended, and I expected you to walk home with some of the little girls who live near.

There was no particular harm in what you did, for there was no particular harm in the boy; but it reminded me that a girl of thirteen is no longer an infant, and it gave me cause for some anxiety. I didn't scold you at the time, for I didn't know just what to say.

I want to talk with you about this boy business.

You're not in danger of making a ghastly idiot of yourself, for I have heard you express scorn of girls who, in your own language, have "boy on the brain."

I want you to have boy friends, for a girl who grows up without them is a one-sided girl, just as a boy who grows up without girl friends or sisters is a one-sided boy.

But you aren't going riding with boys at night—not even around the block, not now at the age of thirteen, or five years from now at the age of eighteen—not until you have finished high school; not ever, in fact, with my approval.

It may be that you think yourself a young lady and your dad an old crank. I can't blame you. When I was your age, my parents seemed enemies who were forever thwarting me and interfering with my plans, when I felt fully capable of deciding all matters without assistance. It is a youngster's nature.

You are in the eighth grade, and have learned to say "math" for "mathematics" and "dip" for "diploma," and that sounds very collegiate and sophisticated; but, honestly and truly, you don't know everything yet.

You and I know girls little older than yourself who ride about with the boys until all hours. Sometimes they tell their parents they are going to a party when there is no party. One of them, you remember, climbed out her bedroom window to go riding and sneaked in the same way after midnight.

There aren't many like that, but a few are too many. Have you noticed their faces? Yours is sweet, for a heart that is sweet and good keeps it that way. Theirs are heavily rouged and hard. They laugh loudly when there is nothing to laugh about, and when they are on the street they try very hard to attract attention.

Poor kids! I feel sorry for them, for I know what is in store. In just a little while the boys who take them riding now will despise them.

Don't misunderstand me. I am not afraid of your becoming like them. I remember the loud and brazen and silly young woman we saw a few weeks ago, and I remember the look of infinite disgust on your face. When you caught me looking at you, you laughed, and said, in a tone not wholly innocent of the Pharisee, "Daddy, if ever I get like that, please drown me."

I'm not worried, but I want this boy business settled once and for all.

In just a little while you'll be pairing off as the other youngsters do, for parties and picnics and things of that kind; and if you don't, you'll be left out and will have no fun at all.

All right. I paired off that way when I was in my early teens, and I came to no bad end. I want you to have a good time, all the good times there are in store for you. For that matter, I like to see a colt run free in a pasture, but not where there is barbed wire. I have seen colts cut on the barbs.

THE important business of our home for the next few years is to provide a pleasant setting for you. I want the right kind of boys and girls to feel at home in it.

But the boys who wish to enjoy your society must come to your home to enjoy it. The first one or the last one to stop a car in front of the house and honk for you will drive away all by himself—and if I happen not to be in a good humor, he will drive away with a bug in his ear.

My elder sister was fourteen when the first boy sought the privilege of taking her to a party. She wept and fled, and that was all the answer the poor astonished kid ever got.

You wouldn't do that. You would be embarrassed and act a goose, but you would be thrilled and you would come whooping into my room like a wild Indian to tell me the great news. How romantic you are! But it doesn't matter. I am grateful for your temper and your sense of personal dignity. And if ever a young whipper-snapper tries to kiss you, I hope your finger nails will be short enough not to do his face permanent injury.

Think old dad a crank if you must, but remember that he has a perfectly good houlder to cry on whenever you feel that way. Respectfully, DAD.

P. S. It seems odd to sign it "respectfully," but why shouldn't a dad respect his daughter?

✤ ✤ ✤ ✤ ✤

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Laundry-washed clothes are cleaner

. . . because the standards of cleanliness in the modern laundry are so exacting that they cannot possibly be equaled by even the most painstaking domestic methods ✤ No laundress, however willing—no home equipment, however elaborate—can duplicate the inviting freshness of sweet, spotless, laundry-washed clothes ✤ And here's why: When you wash at home it is impossible for you to give your clothes the beneficial effects of the rainsoft water that modern laundries use. . . You are physically unable to bathe and rinse your things in 600 gallons of cleansing water, as is regularly done in present-day laundries ✤ Home washing methods will never be able to compete successfully with the magnificent laundry equipment that so gently removes dirt from every fabric pore ✤ And you naturally lack the specialized knowledge so essential to the scientific preparation of the soaps, starches and mild clarifying agents that impart to laundry-washed clothes their inviting immaculateness ✤ As a result, there is a pronounced difference between professional and domestic laundering—a difference that strongly emphasizes the fact that laundry-washed clothes are cleaner, purer and longer-lasting.

The LAUNDRY does it best

The rich, dirt-dissolving suds that penetrates every fabric pore—a result of the water-softening process

Frequent testing of laundry water assures the degree of softness so essential to the cleaner washing of clothes

Why Laundry-washing is cleaner

Of the many laundry-features that assure superior cleanliness, none is more important than the filtered, softened water used in the modern laundry. Articles washed in this pure, rainsoft water are quickly cleansed with a minimum amount of soap and gentle bathing and rinsing. The soft-water process guards against the hard water scum that fills fabric pores and colors clothes grey. It eliminates the vigorous rubbing and home chemical treatment necessary to combat this scum. It cleans things clean.

© L.N.A.

Watch for $50,000 Prize Winners

Modern laundries offer a variety of services to suit every family need. All-ironed work, partially-ironed work, and work which returns clothes damp for ironing, are but a few of the many individualized services available at laundries today. Phone a modern laundry now—let them help you decide which service is best suited to your needs.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Investing Money Successfully

SUCCESS in investing money is really a very simple thing — the selection of safe securities, bought from a house of integrity, responsibility, and experience.

Most if not all of the losses of the American public in worthless securities—estimated at more than half a billion dollars a year — would be avoided if every one followed the rule of careful selection in investing money.

Careful selection of one's investment dealer—careful selection of the investment itself—these are the watchwords of safety. Inquire—analyze—investigate—before you invest.

S. W. STRAUS & CO. call the attention of prudent and cautious investors to their current offerings of sound bonds, yielding as high as 5½—6%, and invite thorough analysis of these securities. As a first step in your investigation, call or write for

BOOKLET B-1821

S.W. STRAUS & CO.

Investment Bonds Incorporated

STRAUS BUILDING
565 Fifth Avenue
at 46th St.
NEW YORK

STRAUS BUILDING
Michigan Ave.
at Jackson Blvd.
CHICAGO

STRAUS BUILDING
79 Post Street, SAN FRANCISCO

ESTABLISHED IN 1882

THE FAMILY'S PROBLEMS

I've Been a Different Woman Since I Got Myself a Job

SHOULD a wife, the mother of young children, work outside the home? We hear a great many arguments nowadays, both for and against. But I have noticed that most of those in favor base their arguments on financial grounds; that is, they argue that when the husband's pay check won't meet the family's needs it is well for the wife to add to their income. But working has meant much more to me than the mere money involved. I wonder if there are not many cases like my own.

Before my marriage I had been graduated from college. I resigned a good position to marry a man who drew a salary plenty big enough to support both of us. In the first six years of our married life, four baby girls arrived to brighten our home. The salary which had been more than enough for two dwindled and shrank alarmingly when forced to provide for six.

My husband had to appear at his place of business looking well-groomed and prosperous. Consequently, the economizing had to be done within the home. Outside help was dispensed with. Old garments were made over for the kiddies, and as for myself, when it came to clothes, ten dollars had to do the work of thirty.

MEN cannot seem to grasp the fact that it is impossible for women to look modish and attractive without the money to buy clothes and hats and accessories. Instead of being praised for my economy, I was usually met with remarks from my husband such as: "My sister certainly has the knack of buying clothes. She always looks suitably dressed. Somehow, your clothes never do look quite right."

Of course they never did—when I bought for durability and cheapness and without any regard to becomingness or style. But how useless to point out that his sister had more money at her disposal to dress herself with than I had for myself and all four of our children! My husband continued to be vaguely discontented. He seemed to think it was just a matter of "managing." He continued to speak of the charming costumes of his sister, or some of our more prosperous friends, and his tailor bills suffered no diminution.

After a time, although I'm sure my husband didn't admit even to himself that he was ashamed of his household drudge, he contrived never to be seen in public with her. Did we plan an outing? "All right," he would say, "you run along with the kiddies. Perhaps I can join you later." But somehow he was always detained at the office.

He stopped bringing his business acquaintances home to dinner. Instead, they stayed in town and dined at the hotel. And day by day I grew more and more bitter to think of my husband's ingratitude when I had given up everything for his sake.

But there is such a thing as misplaced unselfishness. I didn't try to look at his side of the question. I didn't realize that I could not be either companionable or stimulating. I had ceased to be an individual, and had become merely the mother of my husband's children—dowdy, run-down-at-heel, and mentally on a level with the laundress I couldn't afford. He could not feel the pride every husband has a right to feel in his wife.

JUST at this time, to make things pleasanter, my health began to give way. The worry and work had proved too much.

As it happened, this was my salvation. I had a couple of days of enforced leisure, lying flat on my back in bed. It gave me a chance to take stock of myself, and I decided then and there that I had been playing a pretty poor hand and was entitled to a new deal.

I got up out of that bed, and for the first time in years I visited a beauty parlor. A facial massage and a manicure were followed up by a becoming bob and a permanent wave. I walked out rejuvenated by at least five years.

Then I went to a smart dress shop and bought some clothes, pretty ones. I didn't buy them because they were so uninteresting that they had never been in—therefore could never get out of—style. I didn't buy them with an eye to making them over year after year on down through the ages. I selected them for two excellent reasons: because they were pretty and because they suited me. In that shop, I dropped another five years. Then, sweeping some more years' accumulation of cobwebs from my brain, I sallied forth into the world of business, and found an office position with a good salary attached.

I discovered a congenial, home-loving woman who needed a home, and was willing to look after the children and do the housework for a reasonable wage. I hired a laundress one day a week, and a cleaning woman by the day when we needed her.

I had been a square peg in a round hole, dissipating all my God-given energy in doing poorly the work which, under the new régime, was easily and well done by paid workers.

The household machinery runs much more smoothly now than when I was directing it. The children are well cared for, and happier than when they had a nagging mother irritated to death by the twenty-four-hours-a-day, seven-days-a-week contact. And their rejuvenated mother is a much more cheerful companion for evenings and week-ends than the tired, nervous, depleted woman of the olden days.

Did it pay? Does it pay the caterpillar to change into a butterfly? I am once more an individual, able to think of something besides rent, the price of fuel, the high cost of groceries. I no longer have to haggle and worry over prices before buying. I have regained health, confidence, and self-respect. Even friend husband is beginning to sit up and take notice!

A. B.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He had let the fat old Morgan haul the creaking buggy as she pleased, while his mind took a melancholy road of its own pa? I figured to find your pa here. Don't the old rip ever 'tend to business?"

Luther Brekke's son blotted the envelope before he turned to frown at the shapelessly comfortable shoes peeling dry mud onto the clean floor. "What can I do for you, Lem?"

Lem got a good hold on his resentment then. A little while back there'd have been a "Mr. Grow" tacked onto that question. "What! What's a-matter with your ears? I want your pa."

"What's the matter with your eyes? Can't you see Pa's out?"

SAM'S manner quickened the warning pulse, "Look out! Look out!" but Lem held to his resentment. "Lippy young squirt!" . . . "Ain't anything wrong with my eyes, Sammy, m'boy. And you'll be danged lucky if you can say as much when you get to be seventy-seven. You can just bet your bottom dollar you can! I can see your pa's out; but what I want to know is where's he out to?"

"Out of town." Sammy began to address another envelope.

"Well! When'll he be back?"

"Not till the nineteenth."

"The nineteenth!" Lem did not need to reckon up to that date. "Why, say! That's the day before the pageant. You don't mean he's staying away till the day before the pageant? How can he run the pageant and be away like that? That's a hot note! Here, I want to see—"

"He isn't running the pageant." Sammy lit a cigarette. "If you've come about that, talk to me. When Pa had to leave they made me chairman. I can give you a couple of minutes, I guess." Injured pride sharpened Sammy's voice.

This young squirt and his crowd running the pageant! That settled it. Despair gave heat to Lem's retort. "Two minutes 'r' just a minute and a half more'n I need, young fella, me lad. You can just bet your coat and pants on that! I only dropped in to tell your pa that if there was anything I could do to make this pageant a success, he only'd need to call me. And I'll tell you the same. And then I'm done."

Lem's head bobbed a proud, emphatic period to his statement. He had offered, but nobody could say he'd come a-begging a place in their danged show! They couldn't, by Gol! Again, though, the pride was only on the surface. Beneath was a sick despair. For Sam's smile made it plain that this present pageant was to be very different from the one with which Pilot Grove had celebrated its fiftieth birthday. The star performer of twenty-five years before was to be not merely reduced—he was to be shelved.

"I'll remember your offer," Sammy said, and reached for a third envelope. "Is that all?"

LEM marched back along the aisle. The whip was still at a debonair angle; the action of the roundish jaw was no less important; the stride no less bold. But under these the slow pulse was now beating out a mocking "Told you so! Told you so!"

Out of doors Lem got to his buggy, mounted into the seat, gave Dolly her head, and was drawn slowly up the street. His eyes, blurred by despondency, all but missed Matt Kahler, talking at the curb with a stranger, a young fellow with an inquisitive, good-natured face.

Even when they did pick him up, Lem wavered. Immediately it had come to him that Matt must have influence with the pageant committee. If he put it up to Matt, Matt would see he wasn't left out in the cold. But he was reluctant, and the approach he finally made was poor.

"'Lo, Matt!"

"'Lo, Lem!" Matt continued his talk with the stranger.

Later, Lem appreciated that the reply had been shaped by his own greeting. He had been casual. Matt was casual in turn. But the immediate result was to increase Lem's melancholy. He slapped the reins

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

upon Dolly's rump. It was, he told himself, high time that he moved along. When he'd come to be such a has-been that old-timers like Matt Kahler hadn't any more to say to him than, "Hello," it was time he went off and got himself a hole and crawled in and pulled the hole after him.

"Just a no-account, piddling old rooster. That's what they think I am." The confession brought a brisk ear jerk from Dolly, and that gave him back courage enough to add, "They can all go to hell in a hand basket; an' I'll buy 'em the basket!" They might think now that he wasn't worth bothering about. But, by Gol, there'd been a time . . . you bet there had!

AS DOLLY drew beyond the town's last house onto a graveled road stretching between endless fields of corn and of shocked grain, his mind turned back to that time, groping for the consolation which memory brings to the vanity of an old man who is being forgotten by a heedless world which once had marked admiringly his every arrival and departure.

By Gol! No matter how they acted now, once none of them had missed him when he came down the street. And they'd had reason. Right from the start they'd had reason. A twelve-year-old tike, with the nerve to bring a stage-coach twenty miles ahead of a bunch of half-breeds on the war path, was worth noticing. You bet your bottom dollar he was!

His pride came back as he relived that first of a series of triumphs which had made him a celebrity for so long that he had come to believe fame an irrevocable privilege: The wounded driver's halt at the Widow Grow's sod shanty. The family's frightened rush to the coach. The dismaying realization that the driver was no longer able to drive. The nervous, desperate attempt. Then the exhilarating discovery that twelve-year-old hands were adequate—and the wild flight over hills, across flats, and plowed fields, the coach rocking until its flanks scraped first this wheel, then that. And always behind, creeping nearer and nearer, the dozen Sioux come down from their reservation for a last, futile revenge against the whites who had broken their rebellion the year before. And finally the proud arrival in Pilot Grove.

"Handled 'em like an old-timer!" That had been the tribute of the wounded driver. "A real horseman!" That had been the tribute of the town.

The fame of the exploit was still bright at fourteen, when he became a stage-coach driver in earnest. The youngest stage-coach driver anywhere. More fame! For in those days the most ordinary of the dusty, swaggering, competent men who urged their four-horse hitches over the impossible roads with the necessities of a pioneer state was a personage.

EVEN after the stage-coach passed away, fame remained. Almost at once Pilot Grove began to point to its surviving driver as a colorful reminder of a glorious past. "See that old fellow? Stage-coach driver from the time he was a kid. Handled four horses when he wasn't hardly big enough to throw a harness over a horse's back. The last one around these parts. You ought to hear his stories. Wait a minute, and I'll call him over."

Danged well right, Lem reflected. One time and another he had, in his way, been as much somebody as Luther Brekke with his store, or Matt Kahler with his bank and racing horses. But now, he admitted to Dolly, he was—he was—plain nobody.

Just when it was that he had become nobody he found it hard to decide. Sometime after that other pageant, though; because in that he had reached the peak of his distinction.

"The whole danged show, that's what I was," he told Dolly; and she looked back with such a wise smirk that he thought she more than half understood. "But now!" He drooped in his seat.

Now nobody cared anything at all about him. Nobody stopped him any more to introduce some admiring visitor. A new generation had come up, and by this he was forgotten. Fresh young squirts like Sammy Brekke!

He came to the fair grounds. Turning in, he tied Dolly behind the grand-stand and went to harness Kahler's gelding. He hitched that sleek black horse to a sulky and drove onto the race track. His sigh, as the gelding's speed threw a breeze against his face, had pleasure in it. It was something to have a go now and then behind a good horse.

Next, he sighed for the good horses he had driven in the past. And some of his humbled pride rose up as he reflected that he had never, in all his days, lifted reins from the back of a poor horse. By Gol, he hadn't! A stage-coach driver had been only half a driver if he hooked up to poor horses. And that he had never done. There was deep satisfaction in the knowledge. He had never given people a chance to make fun, as Luman Bly had, when Lu took to hauling stuff with a pair of old scrubs. You bet he hadn't!

With the emphasized reiteration Lem thought thankfully of Dolly. A good driving horse was hard to find now that automobiles had ousted all but plow horses from the county. But Dolly was real Morgan stock; and she would do. She would do as long as he had need of a horse.

Melancholy returned as he thought of the little time he had left; and when he reached his farm it had a firm hold upon him. The quietness there strengthened the hold. He didn't want quietness.

"A nice little hullabaloo'd please me fine," he said to Dolly. "Right down to my toes. I ain't cut out to sit around like a bump on a log." Although, immediately, he agreed with Dolly's wise side glance that a man who had such a good chunk of land ought not to complain too much.

He surveyed the oblong little brown house, with the high porch which helped to give the effect of an old coach come to rest, and the surrounding fields with their stacks of alfalfa, brown underneath but green on top where the last cutting was still fresh.

"Anyway," he said, "we don't have to ask no favors of nobody, Dolly."

A man was safe from that when he owned an eighty with a good stand of alfalfa on it. Bet your coat and pants!

But as he followed Dolly, trotting with clink of buckles and slap of leather into the tiny barn built sensibly against the rear of the house, he was aware that security, alone, did not suffice. What good was money in the bank, he thought, as he tied Dolly into her stall, if you weren't anything but an old rooster nobody ever noticed?

The good-night slap on Dolly's rump lacked its usual cheery force, and that astute horse looked around. Lem, however, did not see. He was already through the door which led from the barn to the woodshed and through that into the kitchen.

THE woodshed, with its split fuel for the cook-stove on one side, and its quartered sections of logs for the heater on the other, had always before aroused satisfaction, because of the forehandedness it betokened. But now it left him dull and listless. The kitchen, too, had as little effect, although its easy bachelor disorder had been a great source of pleasure. He was wont to boast that he was a master-hand at housekeeping. He knew just when to pull up short and give the whole shebang a danged good cleaning.

His parlor-dining-room was in front of the kitchen; and west of the parlor was the tiny bedroom, where, in relaxed comfort, he could watch the changing lights of the cloak which floated back from the retreating shoulders of the sun, a cloak that was bright red and vermilion, then rose and mauve, then gray and purple.

"That bedroom of mine," he told people in the days when they stopped him for his stories, "is the best place in the whole danged world to watch sunsets. I'll kiss a pig if it ain't, mister. You can see 'em till ten o'clock some of these August nights."

There, too, he could watch a fragile moon break through woolly, stippled clouds and spread its light, like a shining breath, over the alfalfa fields. And there he could fall into a long, easy sleep after the bowl of bread and milk he had learned was all he required for supper.

"How do I keep so hearty? Why, dang it, mister, by using common sense. An old rooster ought to give his innards their bulk early. That's the rule I follow. Bet your coat and pants!"

He thought of the boasts he had made about that so admirably situated bedroom and about the rules he had preached, and he found himself mumbling, "Bet your coat and pants!"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

But there was no force in the sentence to-night. What was the use of saying it, of saying anything, when there wasn't anybody around to listen? His melancholy was deepened by a sense of sharp injustice. He rolled sleeplessly.

"It ain't as if I was going to be around to take up their time so danged long," he said. "It ain't as if any of 'em 'd be put out so blasted much." The corners of his stubborn old mouth fell.

As he dropped off to sleep, he told himself that perhaps if he were to go straight to Sammy and ask outright for a place in the pageant he'd get it. But he knew he never could do that. "Wouldn't ask a favor of that fresh, lippy young squirt for a forty-dollar cow." His eyes, almost shut, shot a spark out from their faded blue. "A hot pageant! Historic, my left hind foot!" That final condemnation, however, was no consolation either then or when he awoke.

Nor did he find it any in the days which followed. Instead, a mounting sense of worthlessness galled him, even in the erstwhile enjoyable task of tracking the gelding. This took full possession of him as the pageant approached its opening day. The pageant was making a wide ripple.

The Minneapolis newspaper, brought every morning by rural free delivery, always contained a story signed, "By Special Correspondent." And it seemed to Lem that every soul he talked with had some rôle in the affair.

"As if I wasn't good as any of them coots," he said to Dolly. And it was into her ear that, finally, he confided his decision to go no more to Pilot Grove until after the pageant. "Catch me going there," he told her, "and giving every loudmouth a chance to say, 'Hey, Lem! Why ain't you in the show?' Not me, old girl!"

He was certain that, even without the reminder of his presence, they were talking about him. "Poor old Lem!" he imagined them saying; "he's as good as buried, only he don't know it." And he imagined the younger generation looking his way with puzzled faces. "Who is that old codger?" Yes! In his own town, he was become merely a bunch of white whiskers that stirred up no more than, "Who's the old Grandpop?" Grandpop! The poor Its!

The town had sung a lot different tune when the other pageant was on the fire. Then it had been "Lem, this and that," and, "Mr. Grow, the other thing."

Then, too, every day someone had brought a visitor around to hear him tell, and retell, those stories which were so vivid in his mind. The wild race with the Sioux. The Younger Brothers' raid—robbery, pursuit, battle, capture and all. The blizzard of '73, when he had kept his passengers alive in a soddy, first by burning the coach and finally by the body heat of the horses squeezed in with them. The bear—of the time he'd driven over a sleeping bear.

"Biggest surprise of that bear's life, mister. Chased me more'n a mile. I wouldn't shoot because she had a cub. By Gol! You should of heard the lady from Boston holler!"

And of another blizzard, when he had stumbled upon a house with a sick man in it, and had saved the man after all but losing his own life (Continued on page 116)

"Aw, blooey!" Sammy lost his temper. "I've got something else to do besides hunting horses. It'll have to be that rig or nothing"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

An interview with the man who for fifty years has been fighting to save you from your most dangerous enemies

Adult male gipsy moth, much magnified. This moth is one of the most formidable insect scourges that this country has to fight

The Greatest War Of All Time—Man Against The Insects

By M. K. Wisehart

BACK in 1869, a French scientist, Trouvelot, was conducting a series of entomological experiments at his home in Medford, Massachusetts. In those days, the existence of American silkworms was threatened by a peculiar kind of plague; and Trouvelot's idea was that, by crossing the moths of the domestic silkworm with moths of other species, he might produce a new creature that would spin silk, yet be immune from disease.

For the purpose of his experiment, the scientist imported from the Old World a number of hardy moths, among these being one well known in Europe, England, and Japan. In color, the male of this particular species is a yellowish buff or brown, about the shade of a gipsy's face—hence the name, "gipsy moth"! Little did Trouvelot foresee the disaster that was to follow the importation of this species into the United States! The millions that have been spent to subdue it! The ceaseless vigilance required to check its ravages and spread!

The trouble began one day when a puff of wind blew from a window sill of Trouvelot's home a small pasteboard box containing a few score eggs of the gipsy moth. A veritable Pandora's box! And Trouvelot realized this. Chroniclers of the event tell different stories of his effort to recover the eggs. Some say that he ran frantically about in the search; others that he went at it with a scientist's zeal, hunting with a magnifying glass among the grass and pebbles for the tiny things

PHOTOGRAPHS COURTESY U. S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Photograph showing the fifteen-foot wheeled flame carriers recently developed to fight the European corn borer in this country

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

about the size of the dot over this i! Two facts about the search we definitely know: He did not recover all the eggs. He did inform officials of the state of Massachusetts of the possible consequences.

For the reason that insects and their ways were not so well understood then as now, no heed was paid to this warning. Ten apparently harmless years passed. Another five years, and entomological observers were noting the presence of strange caterpillars in the vicinity of Boston. A few years more and, in some sections, gipsy moth caterpillars appeared in such numbers that the trees were stripped bare of foliage!

Caterpillars by the billions! Villages were overrun! Sidewalks were slippery with their crushed bodies! They crawled into houses. They made their appearance at dinner tables!

Then war was declared!

And this war has been raging for thirty-five years. It must be continued for as many more, perhaps indefinitely. The determination of this European invader, now well entrenched in a favorable environment, is perfectly plain—to eat the leaves off all the trees in New England, and then push on and find more worlds to conquer. Since leaves are the lungs of trees, death follows in the wake of repeated defoliation. How far this voracious horde will get, and in what numbers it will go, depends upon the skill and scientific strategy of the defenders—the economic entomologists.

It is one of the greatest wars against a single insect that the world has ever known. Never before has man set himself to battle so vigorously with one species, training armies of scouts and quarantine inspectors, developing costly apparatus for applying poison sprays, spending millions a year on the contest, employing all the science at his command; importing, breeding, and encouraging other species to battle with the menacing moth!

What will the outcome be?

RECENTLY, in Washington, D. C., I was talking with an entomologist who told me many astonishing things about this battle with the gipsy moth, about the great anti-insect war which is going on in every section of the country, and throughout the world. "The insects," he said, "are man's rivals for possession of this planet. They are damaging us infinitely more to-day than at any time since civilization began."

Now, this scientist, Dr. L. O. Howard, at the time I interviewed him was chief of the Bureau of Entomology of the United States Department of Agriculture. For fifty years he has been in government service; for thirty-three he was chief entomologist, and now he has voluntarily resigned from the chiefship of his bureau, but will continue his work under the title of Senior Entomologist. He is known among newspaper men as "the St. Patrick of the insect realm." German and French scientists call him "the world leader of the economic entomologists."

As a boy, he began studying insects because they fascinated him. Soon, he began to see that most insects were a menace to the health, prosperity, and happiness of man. For forty-nine years he has been fighting them, and the outcome of this fight involves a nation's destiny. To-day, more than four hundred trained scientists are working under his leadership. The campaign against man's great enemy extends over scores of thousands of square miles, from New England to southern California, from the forest region of the Northwest to the orange groves of Florida! One of the first questions I asked Doctor Howard was: "How can I make clear to the average man the vast forces involved in this conflict, and the importance of it to all of us?"

"Well," he answered, "let us consider the situation that exists here in the United States: We have a very old assemblage of insect forms of infinite variety. Our remarkable variations in climate, in altitude, in rainfall, offer unique opportunities for the development of insect life, and the problem is complicated by our methods of agriculture. Nowhere else in the world are there such large contiguous areas given over to one crop, as in our corn, cotton, wheat, alfalfa, and fruit regions. Furthermore, it often happens that the way in which we grow our crops gives destructive insects a chance to multiply. In short, at no time in history have the insects had such unlimited opportunities for destruction (Continued on page 67)

(Above) Spraying woodland oaks eighty-five feet high for gipsy and brown-tailed moths. The hose used is a mile long and the stream rises one hundred feet before it breaks into spray. (In oval) Dr. Leland O. Howard, distinguished entomologist, until recently chief of the Bureau of Entomology of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, and known all over the world as an authority on insect life. Doctor Howard became a member of the staff of the Bureau of Entomology in 1878, and was made its chief in 1894. He resigned as chief voluntarily on reaching retirement age, but retained a place on the staff, so that he might continue his fight. He was born in Rockford, Illinois, in 1857

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

A Mighty Little Woman But She's All Grit!

By William S. Dutton

LESS than twelve miles from North Platte the new dirt road ended; it ended abruptly in the midst of the range. Beyond were only two parallel ruts, which quickly vanished into the knee-high grass and were lost there. The ruts, as crooked as a snail's path, made a trail no more distinct than farm wagons make after a week of hauling hay from a sandy field.

I stopped my little rented car in doubt. There was no house in sight, no directing board, no sign of a living soul. The silent sand hills rolled away as far as the eye could see, like giant waves in an endless ocean. On a distant knoll a group of dark specks suggested grazing cattle; a prairie chicken slipped into the coarse grass and was gone.

"Keep to the road!" had been my instructions, given by the garage man in North Platte.

I hesitated, then swung my car into the ruts. There was nowhere else to go. The ruts were the only road to Tryon.

It is thirty-five miles from the railroad at North Platte to Tryon, and a detour had added five miles more. My little car labored axle-deep in the sandy ruts, where twenty miles an hour was a reckless speed. The morning sun broiled down onto the range—treeless save where trees had been planted about ranch-houses by settlers. The ranch-houses stood alone, lonely—low, drab frame houses, rarely within sight of a neighbor.

Presently, cattle appeared ahead from out a depression between the sand hills, a milling and mooing herd ushered along by two mounted cowboys. With tossing heads and glistening horns they enveloped the machine, while the cowboys whistled soothingly. It was round-up time, and these beeves were bound for the yards at North Platte, thence eastward. As the herd milled by, one cowboy drew up his horse beside my car.

"Am I right for Tryon?" I asked.

He nodded. "We came through there, so you can follow our trail right in. It's about twenty miles."

"Do you know Doctor McGraw?" I asked.

"Sure do," he grinned. "The Doc's all right too, even if she is a woman."

I watched him disappear in the dust-cloud behind his herd. "Come on, dog," I bade my flivver, "stick your nose into those cow tracks and keep it there. We're going to visit a lady."

It was to a lady, yes, to a lady with the spirit of a Viking that the cow tracks led us as the sun blazed down at noon.

Tryon, a huddle of thirty-odd houses among the sand hills, a pin-prick on the map of the Great West, is the county seat of McPherson County, Nebraska. With its one hundred and twenty-five inhabitants, its brick courthouse and high school, it is the county's largest town. To me, there was a challenge in its name that was like a shout into space. "Try on!" Tryon could not belie its name, and still be.

In all of that county of 864 square miles and 1,700 people there is no railroad. There are no bus lines to the outer world, and no roads as we know roads to-day. A dirt road, not long built, links Tryon with Stapleton, twenty-eight miles distant in an adjoining county. There are the ruts over which I came in from North Platte, marking the route of a highway to be. The only other "roads" are trails, obliterated by the snow in winter, mere tracks through the grass of the sandy range in summer. Less than nine years ago McPherson County had no doctor. Even to-day it is without a drug store.

Doctors had come to Tryon, lingered for a few years, and gone. They had been men inured to the West and its hardship, and they had come with eyes open. But there is little money for a doctor in Tryon, and much sacrifice and work. The houses are scattered. There are times when blizzards sweep the range, and a doctor must be hero as well as physician. A doctor in the cow country daren't make mistakes, often. He must be able to stand alone, and to decide alone.

The men doctors had gone on, to concrete roads and electrically-lighted streets, and a more lucrative practice. During those doctorless years, McPherson County had to send out to Stapleton, or to North Platte, when it needed medical aid, and could afford it. Not always could it afford it. Accepted medical fees were one dollar for each mile of distance between the doctor and his patient, plus the cost of the medicine prescribed. The travel fee alone was often fifty dollars, payable in advance. Herbs were the medicines, and a neighbor woman was the doctor, more frequently than otherwise.

THEN one day, more than eight years ago, a woman came into Tryon—a mite of a woman who weighed less than one hundred pounds. The mail carrier brought her in from North Platte, into a land that was strange to her, and to a life and a people that were stranger. She was city-bred, and the mail carrier had confided to friends that, as dusk had fallen over the range, she had wanted to turn back, afraid.

"Said she was a doctor," he explained. "Looked to me as if she was the one who needed doctoring."

She did. A seventh attack of influenza in as many years had almost taken her life. The woman was pale and emaciated and far from well.

"Woman doctor, eh? I don't put much stock in women doctors," bluntly announced a rancher at the local store. The range is man's country. It tries the courage of strong men and quickly sifts out the weak for discard. What chance had a woman here, a weak woman weighing less than a hundred pounds, engaged in a profession that the range felt belonged to man? What chance had she with a Nebraska blizzard? With those trails?

"She won't last long," said the range.

But Doctor Harriet G. McGraw did last! She fought the battle for her own health, and won it. She fought the strangeness and the loneliness, and conquered. She faced prejudice, and wiped it out. She braved the worst storms the range could brew, when men turned back, and she traveled those trails at midnight, though her call for aid came from a shack, and from the penniless.

Doctor Harriet G. McGraw stayed in Tryon, the one physician and surgeon in more than eight hundred square miles—stayed to answer the ringing challenge of its name, and need. And to-day, ask any rancher or cowboy, or sand-hill farmer—men whose broken bones she has set, whose cuts she has sewed up by lamplight, whose wives and children she has doctored and nursed and saved—ask them of her. They will tell you with a whole-souled grin that, "the Doc's all right, even if she is a woman;" and more than one will add, with respectful emphasis, that she is "the best damned doctor in Nebraska."

"THAT nice white house right over there," I was told when I asked which of the thirty-odd houses in Tryon belonged to Doctor McGraw. And my informant added, "If she ain't at home, walk right in and make yourself comfortable. The door won't be locked."

The house was a tiny bungalow on the edge of town. At its back the range began, and kept going to the horizon. A couple of shade trees decorated the dooryard, with a nice grove of evergreens to the north, and in Tryon a tree is a luxury. On the door was nailed the doctor's "shingle."

Doctor McGraw lives here with her husband, Joseph A. McGraw. He is a lawyer—the county prosecutor, and only lawyer in the county. Unfortunately, on the day of my visit he was at Lincoln, the state capital. The doctor was home, in the kitchen preparing dinner. An ex-judge was present as a guest, and the daughter of a ranch owner, who, judging by her bobbed (Continued on page 72)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

OVER dusty cow trails, in summer; through great snowdrifts, into the teeth of howling prairie blizzards and over no trails at all, in winter, Dr. Harriet G. McGraw must make her way as she ministers to the sick in an area of more than eight hundred square miles. She is the only physician in McPherson County, Nebraska. There is no railroad in that county, no drug store, and before Doctor McGraw came, there was no doctor, though several had preceded her, only to give up the fight. The little house above is Doctor McGraw's home.

Photograph by Brown, North Platte, Neb.

A VIEW of Tryon, Nebraska, where Doctor McGraw lives. This town, with its population of one hundred and fifty, is the largest in McPherson County. As she is the only doctor thereabout, so is her husband the only lawyer.

(Above) Doctor McGraw's first office in Tryon. (Right) The doctor and a group of children she has just examined.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Apeda, N. Y.

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Photography

Ramon Novarro

RAMON NOVARRO, famous motion picture star, intended, as a boy, to become a monk. Circumstances changed his plans but not his interest in religion, as he is now more deeply religious than ever before. Novarro was born in Mexico, fourth from the top of fourteen children. He came to the United States and landed a job as an "extra" in the movies. He has since starred in "Ben Hur" and other famous pictures.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Ramon Novarro Gave Me The Surprise Of My Life!

By Mary B. Mullett

IT TOOK Ramon Novarro less than ten minutes to give me one of the greatest surprises I have ever received. And yet, if I really had listened to the people who knew him, I ought to have been prepared for what happened.

"Novarro," his friends assured me, "is not the typical movie star. You'll find him very different from the others."

But I confess that I didn't pay much attention to them. People who try to interest me in motion picture actors always insist that their particular candidate is "different" from the rest.

Consequently, before I met Ramon Novarro, I had only two definite ideas about him: The first, that he was undeniably a handsome young man—which didn't seem very important; for handsome young men, as you probably have discovered, are sometimes incredibly dull.

My second impression of Novarro had persisted ever since he appeared in "Ben Hur." I wonder if you remember certain scenes of this picture in which the young hero was called upon to express deep religious feeling.

It has been more than two years since I saw "Ben Hur;" but the thing I recall most vividly is not the frenzied rush of the chariot race! Not the tense face of the young man driving his plunging horses to victory! But, instead, the quiet scenes where that same young man somehow conveyed, to those who had eyes to see, a sense of inward spirituality.

I wondered, at the time, how he had managed to do this. I don't think I am unduly skeptical about human nature. Quite the contrary, in fact! But it really did not occur to me that these scenes were the result of anything except extraordinary good luck.

Not until I met Novarro himself! Then I realized my mistake; for inside of those first ten minutes I found that a strange thing was happening.

The "handsome young man" opposite me was not talking about his career; not about his struggles or his triumphs—and he has had both.

He was talking about "life, death, and the great hereafter!" As simply and as naturally as if he were speaking of the train which had brought him from California, he talked of how a man's spirit is carried in the arms of faith. He spoke of God, as the all-wise Director of human life. And God seemed no less real to him than the director of his latest picture.

Over the telephone, it had been arranged that we should have luncheon together; and luncheon is a rather important item in Novarro's day, since it is also his breakfast. Nevertheless, for half an hour we totally forgot about it! And, I can truthfully say, I never before had interviewed a movie star—or anybody else—who was so interested in talking about God that he forgot it was time to eat!

Our conversational detour into the realm of religion came when Novarro was telling me about his boyhood. His family name, by the way, is not Novarro, but Samaniego. He was born in Mexico, in the city of Durango, where his father was a dentist.

Trained in the United States and with the best American office equipment, Doctor Samaniego had an excellent practice. This is an important detail, because there were fourteen children in the family. And fourteen children, as every father will agree, take a lot of providing.

Eleven of the fourteen are still living; and to be the chief support of even that number is no small responsibility, as Ramon Novarro himself must have realized when circumstances made him the principal bread-winner for his family.

IN THIS long line of brothers and sisters Ramon was fourth from the top. When I asked him how old he was, I counted on the usual evasive answer. Almost always that question has a paralyzing effect on a movie star's memory, so I only half expected the truth.

"I was born February 6th, 1899," he replied without hesitation.

"That's what you want me to say?" I asked, rather cynically.

The cynicism was from force of habit; for he really looked only twenty-five, or even younger.

"Yes," he said; "because it is the truth. I have no desire to cheat about my years, for age seems to me a very beautiful and wonderful thing. I mean middle age; and even old age.

"The older I grow, the wider will be my experience. With wider experience, I shall have more understanding of life. And surely life is like other things, music, for instance. The more we understand it, the more capable we are of appreciating and enjoying it.

"My appreciation of things is immeasurably greater now than when I was nine, or nineteen. Isn't it plain common sense to believe that it will be still greater when I am thirty-nine, and forty-nine, and so on?"

This was so unlike the kind of talk one would expect from a popular movie hero that I wondered where he had got his philosophy of life. It didn't sound quite like a Hollywood product. So I asked him where he was educated.

"In Durango, until I was fifteen years old," he said. "Then we moved to Mexico City, where I entered college. My father opened an office there; but he was not satisfied, and decided to go back to his old home.

"I was in love with a girl in Durango," Novarro added, with a smile; "so this decision was eminently satisfactory to me.

"My father and mother went first, taking me with them. Then my mother returned to Mexico City, to bring the rest of the family. But the revolution broke out and it was impossible for them to reach Durango, or for us to get back to them. It was a whole year before they could join us.

"By that time I was sixteen years old. Only a boy—but I had read a good deal, thought a good deal, and had decided," again he smiled, "that I wanted to be a great saint! Ambition," he added humorously, "has been my failing.

"My two older sisters," he went on, "were about to enter a convent; and I determined to prepare myself to enter a monastery.

"The revolution may have been partly responsible for this decision. I saw people—some of them my own relatives—reduced from wealth to poverty. Others, who had been poor, became suddenly rich. That taught me the folly of depending for our happiness on money, or on the things that money can buy.

"I said to myself: 'Life, compared with eternity, is a mere speck of time. The only part of me that is permanent is my spirit. Why not begin now to live, as fully as I can, the life of the spirit?'

"Don't think, because I am a motion picture actor instead of a monk, that I have changed my ideas about the purpose of living. I am just as sure to-day as I was then that life is absolutely wasted if we make it only a material thing.

"THE reason why I changed my decision may sound egotistical, but it was an absolutely sincere one. I began to believe that I had the ability to accomplish something in the outside world; that I could make myself a real influence in other people's lives.

"You remember the parable in the Bible: the story of the three men who received talents and who were later called to give an account of what they had done with these gifts?

"One of them, you remember, buried his talent. He made no use of it and gained no profit from it. And this 'unprofitable servant' of the master was 'cast into outer darkness.'

"I compared myself with those three men. And I said to myself: 'I believe that God has given me a talent. If I bury it, how shall I answer Him when He asks me what I have done with His gift?'

"Finally, I went (Continued on page 84)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Hard As Nails

The story of a super-woman who found that her heart was just like other women's hearts

By

AGNES SLIGH TURNBULL

Illustrated by

HANSON BOOTH

Alex extended his hand. "Maybe this will be good-by. I don't know whether I'll be seeing you again or not"

JANE MACTAY closed her typewriter, arranged the scattered sheets on the desk with quick, skillful fingers and then, pencil in hand, read over rapidly what she had just finished. It was clever. She knew it. Probably the keenest, most scintillating, most unmerciful review she had ever written.

That review would be quoted, would start a controversy, would divide the critics into two camps as neatly as a call to arms. It was a masterly achievement and an honest one. For she had written, as always, only what she believed to be true.

But instead of rising from her desk in a state of elation, Jane MacTay, journalist, author, and critic, put her face in her hands and wept. Not just gentle April-shower tears, mind you, which women weep when they are comfortably sad. These tears came with great, shuddering sobs, wrung from a deep-buried misery.

After all, why shouldn't she give way for once? What was the use of all this self-control, when there was no living creature to see or know. Decla, her small maid, had left early, since there was no dinner to get; the apartment walls were sound-proof; and as for the city, thundering past beneath her windows, what did it care for anybody's tears!

The sobs came faster, more racking than before. Jane's dark head moved desperately back and forth upon her arms. For to the old hurt which she had defiantly hidden away for years, there had been added a new and terrible pain, which, in spite of all cold reason and sensible philosophy, grew worse instead of better.

The new pain had had its origin only a bare week ago, and in the most sudden manner possible. Hunter Thorne had called her up one morning to tell her he had a box that night for "Shadows."

"Old Mowry pressed it upon me, and who am I to refuse a little courtesy like that!" his crisp voice had informed her. "I'm rounding up a good bunch, and we'll go to Ivan's studio afterward for supper. You might order some eggs sent down there to-day. I'll be sure to forget them, and we'll be lucky if Ivan even has salt in the place when we get there. And, say, I've got a surprise for you! Six-feet-two in his socks and a child can play with him! Cousin of mine from Virginia. Gentleman farmer. Speak simple English to him, Jane. He doesn't know what it's all about up here. Not, of course, that any of us do," he added, with his cynical little laugh.

That night at eight, as she entered the box, she saw him. He rose awkwardly to be presented, tipping over the chair next him as he did so. He seemed a careless giant beside Hunter

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Thorne's slight, dapper figure, that appeared to have been born in evening clothes. He had a ruddy face and reddish blond hair, blue eyes and a bit of a mustache. He was probably forty. His hand felt enormous as it closed around hers, and somehow strangely warm and comfortable.

Hunter, with his usual wicked blandness, had assigned her to the newcomer for the evening. The twinkle in his eye made it evident that he thought the combination highly amusing.

"Jane, I give this pure, simple rustic into your care. The only blot on his character is that he's my cousin. And he couldn't help that. Alex, Jane's the hardest-boiled little feminist in New York. She carries a poisoned dagger in her garter for all the men who attempt to make love to her. So watch your step, my lad!"

WHEN the laugh was over, and she had thrown back the bright repartee expected, Jane settled in her place with a strange new sensation stealing over her. She felt suddenly relaxed, rested, as if she had come home.

She looked up, startled, into Alex Tillman's face. He was looking down at her with an expression of intense interest. Then he laughed.

"If Hunter wasn't such a liar he wouldn't be nearly so interesting, would he?" he inquired, in a rich drawl. "Now, one good look at you would tell me you're no feminist. You know, you make me feel somehow as if I'm back in Virginia."

The curtain went up at that moment and the play was on. It proved to be a piece of rather sordid realism. Jane had sat unmoved through many worse ones, but somehow to-night, with each uneasy shifting of the man beside her she felt less comfortable. In the middle of the second act he leaned over to her.

"Sha'n't we go? You don't want to see any more of this."

It was no question. It was quite a command. Jane knew she could make of this the evening's great joke. All she needed to do was to turn around and throw a sharply witty sentence to Hunter, and the thing was done. The idea of any man's leading her, Jane MacTay, whose name was a synonym for all brilliant sophistication, away from contamination, would be to all of them too incredibly funny. And it would place this man, this Alex Tillman, in the light of an amusing provincial, whom they would study as an entertaining new species.

But Jane did not turn around. She got up, and allowed herself to be guided to the door. There was a subdued whisper of questions around them. She paused a second beside Hunter.

"We're going on down to the studio to start the supper," she said. "See you later."

They were out, alone in the lobby. He was putting her cape about her gently, and she was having time to note that she came barely to his shoulder.

Then they were in a taxi and she had again that overpowering sense of having come home at last after long wanderings. She gave herself up to it for the moment, though she knew it couldn't last.

They said inconsequential things as they rode along, but they looked deeply into each other's eyes as they said them.

"IVAN never locks the studio," Jane remarked when they reached the house. "The man down-stairs will let us in and we'll go right up."

They climbed the long, dimly lighted stairs and finally gained the big promiscuous room on the fourth floor. Alex looked around him dubiously, while Jane hung her cape on a hook behind the door and fingered over a row of smocks gingerly to find the cleanest for her own use.

"Don't move about much for a minute, Mr. Tillman, till we've found the eggs," she called laughingly over her shoulder. "They're just as likely to be on the floor as not."

The eggs were located at last in a reasonably safe place on the long table, and the bacon found on the end of the mantel beside a Greek urn.

Jane led the way to the tiny kitchenette.

"It's really quite a good idea for us to come on down and get things started," she said. "Usually, when we come here, there's so much clearing up to do that we don't really begin the party till after midnight. I'll put the coffee on now and find

"I know I would love the country—love it—if I only had the chance to be in it" the rolls and butter. . . . Heavens, what a mess this gas stove is! . . . Then we'll attack the divan and the chairs, and hunt a place for the guests to sit."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Alex fetched and carried obediently, managing always to come back very soon to the kitchenette, though Jane assured him there were pictures about the studio worth seeing. As they finally began to tidy up the big room, Alex asked suddenly:

"Who are these people that will be here? Are they really important folks? Famous?"

"Well, I'm afraid, rather, though you wouldn't know it by their looks! Alice Masters is a poet. She's the dark girl. Joyce West is a novelist. She's the blonde. She's written two best sellers already. Jack Lawrence writes plays, and Hunter criticizes them. But of course you know all about Hunter. Ivan paints marvelously until he gets a little money ahead, then he gives a magnificent party, or rather a series of them, and, pouf! his money's all gone! He says he's happiest, though, when he's broke, for then his head and his conscience can agree on socialism. He's rather queer; but then so are we all, I guess."

"You're not. You're exactly as I think a woman should be! Tell me more of yourself. That's what I want most to hear."

His voice was compelling. Jane felt a queer thrill of joy.

AND then at that moment the others had trooped in, all exclaiming at once. There was no putting them off. Hunter was the most importunate of all.

"Now, little ones, we must have the truth. Why did you rudely rise up and leave the only box I may ever have all my own? Out with it now, Alex!" Under his lightness was a note of displeasure.

Alex was serious, but his face was flushed in embarrassment. Jane's nonsense, which she tried to hurl into the breach, did not avail.

"Miss MacTay was in my care for the evening," Alex said stiffly. "The play wasn't the kind I'd take a girl to see, so I suggested we leave, that's all."

It was out. And something within Jane hurt terribly. For the laughter came, as she had known it would. They screamed with it. The girls asked each other between gasps if they had really heard the thing right. And Hunter summed up all the scattered comments upon Jane's character by stating:

"Alex, my boy, you got this lady wrong. She's none of your tender, shrinking flowers! She's the keenest, hardest little journalist in the city. She's a bigger man than any of us. And she was probably about as much shocked at that play to-night as she would be at 'Little Red Riding Hood.' That right, Jane?"

"Oh, let's forget the play, and fry the bacon," Jane said sharply.

And the matter was allowed to drop, with only an occasional convulsion from one of the girls, checked by a glance at Alex.

But Jane's pride, never far beneath the surface, rose now overwhelmingly. She couldn't let them guess at the sudden tenderness of her heart toward this stranger from another world than their own. She dare not for an instant let them suspect the truth about herself. Her reaction was an instinctive clutch at her old impenetrable garment of cold brilliance.

She had never, it seemed, been in finer form than she was that evening. The talk drifted, as it always did, from the heaviest pronouncements on books and art to the lightest whimsy, or the most trifling gossip. Through all the mental chase Jane led the way with her usual intellectual dare-deviltry. Her cheeks were very hot, her eyes very bright. She was always conscious of Alex Tillman's face, puzzled, and painfully attentive on the edge of the group.

He did not come near her till the party was breaking up. Then he was suddenly beside her.

"Miss MacTay, I . . . I suppose I should apologize for dragging you away from the show to-night. I really thought—"

She interrupted him. "You were perfectly right, Mr. Tillman. I was glad to come."

She held her breath for a long second, waiting. But he said nothing more. No question as to when he might see her again. Not even a word about taking her home himself. He went off, with Hunter, and Jane jounced up the Avenue in a taxi with some of the others who were going her way.

Once inside her own apartment she told herself bitterly that she was a fool, and with her lips closed very tightly she prepared for bed. Then she lay, trying her best to forget the features of Alex Tillman's face. She planned a new article. She devised a new plot for a story. It didn't work.

Through it all she saw the stranger, with his big clumsy gentleness, his serious, puzzled eyes, his baffled embarrassment. And through it all she saw also the eager light in his eyes as he bent to hear her words in the theatre; she felt the startled tingle that had gone over her at the accidental touch of their hands as they sorted the débris in the studio.

And then with the coming of the early spring dawn, Jane had surrendered. It was no use to fight longer. She knew that the thing she had longed for and yet dreaded these many years had at last come to pass. At thirty-five she had fallen in love. Suddenly, terribly, and forever. For that was the way she was made.

If it had come gradually, that she might have defended herself against it! If there had been a long, slow-growing friendship, that she could have deflected into safe channels when she saw a hurt for herself in the distance!

But her fate had not been so kind to her. It had decreed that in one flaming moment she should give her heart to a man who, by every logical reason, should not have won from her even a passing interest. A man who would go back to his home, forgetting perhaps that he had even met her.

No, no! Oh, he could not do that! He must not! And yet, how could she help it? All very well to prate wisely of the modern attitude and equal sex rights, and the day of feminism, when it was somebody else who was involved. But now, since the dull, smoky mists of her own emotional life had changed swiftly to a glowing fire, she was like all other women. She was helpless in her love. Dependent upon the twist of a thread of circumstance. Waiting, in trembling impotence for the word of rapture, or the silence that meant despair.

Whatever she had spoken or written before to the contrary, she now knew that this was the truth.

She loved him, and she couldn't tell him so. She couldn't explain to him that while all Hunter Thorne had said of her was true, there was something deep underneath all that, which she had proudly hidden away from all eyes.

And yet, in the fullness of the new day, a perfectly irrational hope had leaped up. He would call her at the office. He would invite her for lunch or for tea. They would meet again, alone, of course, and begin at that breathless moment where they had been interrupted the night before.

BUT the day passed, and he did not call. Hope again raised its head faintly. There was still the evening left.

But the evening passed too. Seven, eight, nine. The apartment was so still. Jane moved about restlessly. The warm March air grew close. Spattering drops began to fall.

Jane threw on a storm coat and hat and started out. She would walk around the block and try to get some relief from this foolish oppression that had settled upon her.

She swung along, raising her face as she walked, to catch the light rain drops. They seemed to cool her hot spirit. Why, she pondered, had this volcanic thing come upon her, just when her life seemed settled into its interesting routine? Just when the old hurt was being buried deeper each year? Was it going to be her destiny to see this man for a few hours and then carry the longing for an impossible joy with her for the rest of her life?

Only a few months ago she had made one of her own heroines tell a man frankly she loved him. It had seemed so eminently sensible and natural as she had worked it out in her story. But as to doing it herself—

She turned the corner suddenly, in her third walk around the square. She bumped into a large figure, also swinging strongly from the opposite direction. For a second they both stared foolishly at each other, and then gasped simultaneously:

"Why—it's you!"

It was indeed Alex Tillman, towering above her, big and clean and strong.

"Miss MacTay! Are you out all alone?"

"Oh, just for a breath of air. It seemed so close indoors. I haven't walked far—just around the block."

"Why, I'd no idea I was near your apartment!" (Jane's first joyous thought that he had been on his way to her was checked by the unmistakable surprise in his voice.) "I got tired being indoors, too, and I've been walking for an hour. Well, of all the good luck! Think of meeting you! Do you care to walk some more?"

"Love it!" Jane answered warmly.

They started off together at a good pace. Her heart was beating fast.

"I was hoping I would see you again," she said bravely.

"Oh, so was I! But I didn't want to bother you. You see, I know now what a great person you are!"

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"But I'm not. You mustn't believe all Hunter says!"

"Oh, you can't fool me! I know all about you now. I made Hunter tell me last night when we got home. And to-day I've read a lot of your things for myself. They are wonderful, Miss MacTay. I . . . I congratulate you. I didn't know last night that you were so famous and clever and—and important. I thought you were just . . . just—"

"Just a woman?"

"Please understand what I'm trying so badly to say. I thought you were just a guest, not one of the crowd of celebrities. I was sure of it when Hunter gave you to me as my partner for the evening. I'm such a dub, you know, about all the literary stuff. I'm just explaining again why I made such a fool of myself."

"But you didn't. You were—"

"And you were so good to me. You tried to keep them from making such a joke of it. I'll never forget your kindness. It will be the brightest spot in my whole visit."

Jane's lips felt parched. Her alert mind seemed befogged. She, who never hesitated for a word, now felt dumb before him.

"Why . . . it was nothing," she stammered like the veriest schoolgirl.

They walked on in silence. Something had to be done.

"Don't you like walking in the rain?" Jane asked suddenly.

"I sure do. But riding is even better. Down home I've got a colt that just naturally takes to the rain. Every nice easy little shower I go out on her, and we ride through the woods. It's wonderful now in the spring. And in May, you know, it's like riding through heaven, when the wild thorn's in blossom."

"Oh," Jane breathed, "tell me more about it, about everything down there."

"My place, you mean? Why, that's mighty nice of you to be interested. It's nothing extraordinary. Just a big white house on a big farm. Too big now, for I can't get enough good labor. You-all up here would think it was terribly quiet, I reckon. We don't hurry much down there. There's always something good to do. And we just sort of take time to do it. I suppose we are lazy, compared to all these fellows rushing 'round up here. But maybe we get more of the flavor out of life than they do, for all that."

He stopped. Jane felt a choking catch in her throat. If she could somehow make him understand!

"I know I would love the country—love it—if I only had the chance to be in it." (She wondered if her voice sounded as queer as she imagined.) "I've always had to be in the city. It's been necessity. But I've dreamed, you know, of how the green fields must look every spring."

SHE felt her companion suddenly slow his steps. He seemed to come very close to her, to look searchingly down upon her for a second. It was as though a little blowing wind had paused for a moment, leaving a cool and waiting void. In the small hush Jane's heart listened for a sign.

But suddenly they were walking swiftly on again, and Alex's voice was saying seriously:

"Of course you city dwellers have a lot of advantages, though. And in your work you would miss all the stimulus and excitement of things, I reckon."

Then he added quickly, "But here I'm selfishly walking along. You must be tired. Why didn't you stop me? Shall we turn now?"

They turned. They walked slowly back, talking of indifferent things, Alex rather grave, Jane very, very bright and witty. She had tried, most unsuccessfully, to uncover one little corner of her heart. Very well, she would not repeat the experiment.

When they said good night, Alex extended his hand.

"Maybe this will be good-by. I don't know whether I'll be seeing you again or not."

"Oh, surely you're not going back so soon?"

(Continued on page 94)

Something within Jane hurt terribly. For the laughter came, as she had known it would

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Why I Travel The S. & N.

I AM the president of the principal bank in a small city. For fifteen years—I am now fifty-five—I have studied the financial affairs of many men and women, and in studying their financial affairs I have had many intimate glimpses into their lives. I know who travels the Straight and Narrow road.

Let me tell you that a man's check book is an autobiography that does not lie. Give me the chance to know where his money comes from, and where it goes to, and I will tell you what kind of man he is. There are secrets that pass under the eyes of us bankers which men suppose to be hidden from all the world.

But they are not hidden from us. Let us take Mr. X., for example, who is a rich and respected member of our community, and Mr. Y., who is known to be a crooked lawyer, a protector of evildoers, a friend of gamblers and bootleggers. Surely, there can be no connection between Mr. X. and Mr. Y., they would not even speak to each other on the street. Nevertheless, checks pass between them. Checks that are drawn upon this bank, and that filter through under my own eyes. For what goods or services are those checks a payment? Through what chain of circumstances did the evil Mr. Y. acquire his hold over the respected Mr. X.? In what subterranean enterprises are they associated? The secret has been well kept; no one in the city suspects. But the checks continue their telltale record. And I think that I can guess.

Who is the most generous man in our city and who is the meanest? You could hold an election on those questions and invite everyone to vote, and the vote would mean nothing. But if you ask me, I could tell you. There is a quiet little old man who lives in two rooms in a boarding-house. Nobody of importance ever hears about him. Nobody knows the things that he does. But I know. Twenty years ago his wife and two children were killed in an accident. The man had been thrifty. He had an income of about eleven thousand dollars a year.

For twenty years he has lived on less than a thousand dollars a year, and given the rest away. Robbed of his own loved ones, he has adopted the poor of the city as his wife and children. Nobody knows his charities; even the newspaper men, who think they are so wise, have never found him out. But his checks tell. For the meanest man—I could shake the social structure of the town if I were to publish his name. For he is very rich and very "generous." He makes large gifts in a very public way. But his giving is a petty fraction of his income. His servants hate him. And because his daughter married a poor man against his ambitious plans, she is struggling along in poverty in a little town Out West.

Who are the good husbands in the town, and who are the bad ones? Who are the young men who will be at the top of things in another twenty years? And who are the brilliant and glittering young men who think they will be at the top, and will be broken and bitter failures at forty-five? Who pays the rent on some of the cute little apartments in a secluded section of our town? Who are the men in fine houses, with automobiles and servants, who owe their butchers and bakers and candlestick makers, and—if they were to die to-morrow—would leave behind them nothing but debts and grief? And who are the wise young men—wise in their own conceit, as the Good Book says—who think they have found a way to get more happiness out of living than is provided in the regular program, by leading a "double life"? The check books know. And I know.

ONLY the other night one of those young men came to see me. It was a few minutes before six o'clock and the bank had been officially closed for three hours. I was alone in my office, and the young man chose the time because he knew that I would be alone. I had been thinking about that young man in a casual way for some time, and when the messenger brought in his card I kept him waiting until I had sent for his account and gone through it rather carefully. Then I let him come in.

He is a handsome and well-dressed young man, a college graduate, whose father left him a very good little manufacturing business. Our bank helped the father build that business. When the son inherited the business we continued to extend a line of credit, and for a while everything went well. But lately things have not gone so well. I had been expecting a visit from this young man.

HE HAS a striking personality and lots of self-confidence. He began in a very brisk fashion, as if to make me feel that the world was using him very well. I was not fooled; I waited. Presently he came to the point. He would like to arrange a temporary increase in his line of credit. He was planning some important extensions in the business, and there was a little let-down in orders which tied him up with more inventory than he needed at the moment. In the fall he would be in fine shape, but through the summer he would need help. Just to tide over the lull. Just to finance his new developments. It was merely temporary. He was sure I would understand.

My first remark took all the wind out of his sails.

"Why does a man who has a good business and a fine family want to fool around with another man's wife?" I asked.

He blushed and stammered. He said he couldn't see what such a question had to do with his business problem.

"I am an older man than you," I said. "I was your father's friend. I believed in him. His life was an open book. Everybody was welcome to read every word. Do you think he had a happy life?"

"Why, of course," the young man answered. "That is to say, I think it was happy according to his idea of happiness. He liked his business and his home and the church. I wouldn't say that he had much fun."

"You're having much more fun than he did, aren't you?" I asked.

"I hope so."

"He never had the stimulation of a couple of cocktails before dinner," I said. "He never got the thrill of betting a hundred dollars on a horse race. He

If You Want to Have a Good Time Stay Out of the Primrose Path

"MORE should be spoken and written about the pleasures of virtue," says the author of the accompanying article. "The old theology was very much at fault. It gave the impression that sin is very delightful, and that those who forgo it are giving up what is most thrilling in life. As a matter of fact, the pleasures of sin are overrated, and empty. The joy of sin is temporary—if that; then comes remorse, and remorse sucks all the satisfaction out of wrong-doing. But the joys of the Straight and Narrow increase in retrospect! A righteous act, a worthy achievement—these are the sources of real pleasure. If a young fellow starts out with the idea of having a fine time, he should head into the S. & N., for in no other road will he find real pleasure."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

had one rather shabby automobile. You have two new ones. He loved only one woman. You are living with two."

He sprang up, hot and blustering.

"I didn't come here to be insulted," he cried.

I continued as if I had not heard him:

"A sort of prosaic life your father led," I said. "No great thrills; but no special embarrassments either. No trips to this office to ask for accommodations that he knew he didn't deserve. You think your father had a poor time of it. I'll tell you that, when it comes to real downright pleasure, his life had yours beaten forty ways."

"Pleasure," sneered the young man, who was now thoroughly mad. "Pleasure. What does a dried-up old fogy like you know about pleasure? You, with your cold blood and your respectable fears, what do you know about youth, and joy? You never had a single extra heartbeat without stopping to ask yourself whether you could afford it."

I was very calm.

"You are sure that I am only talking out of the book?" I asked. "That I have never had any personal experience? That I have always been just what I seem to be now, and am therefore unqualified to decide what is really most worth-while in life?"

He said he was sure of it.

But I liked that young man. For his own sake, as well as for his father's sake I wanted to save him if I could.

When he went out of the office it was nearly eight o'clock. But regarding myself and himself, he had changed his mind.

IT IS one of the strange perversities of human nature that we have such distrust of professional counsels. When we have a cold, and a doctor prescribes for it, we take the prescription to the drug store without faith or hope. But if, on the way to the drug store, we meet a friend who says, "I see you have a cold; I'll tell you the best thing in the world for it," then we are immediately heartened. We rush home to try the remedy which he, a layman, has prescribed, and forget the prescription of the doctor.

If, being thrifty, we have saved up a thousand dollars, we may possibly ask the banker's advice about its investment. But we follow the advice reluctantly. After all, bankers are often wrong, we say; and they are so conservative. But if, on the way home from the bank, we happen to overhear two strangers talking in the street car, and one of them says, "I got a tip on G and W. It's good for ten points in the next ten days," then we rush away and put our thousand dollars on an untried stock, at the advice of a man whose name even we do not know.

As with health and money, so with morality. We are restive under the exhortations of the preacher. We say to ourselves, "Giving good advice is his job. He is paid for it. Of course he commends the straight and narrow path and warns against the evils of the broad highway. He is a prejudiced witness; he speaks with no personal knowledge."

But when a man of the world talks to us, out of his experiences, good and bad, then we listen. On this basis I may perhaps hope for a hearing, for, however much I fall short in other directions, I believe I can qualify as a man of the world.

Let me sketch my background briefly: I was the sixth child born to parents who might have supported two children with some reasonable degree of comfort. They were cultured, kindly people—rather impractical as regards money and always hard up.

Our household was distinctly religious. My father was superintendent of the Sunday-school and my mother taught a class of little girls in which were two of my sisters. On Sunday mornings we ate breakfast in the discomfort of clean clothes, and walked to church and sat bolt upright in pews that were certainly designed to discourage church (Continued on page 130)

If You Ask Me:

The man next door is a nuisance and a tyrant

I HAVE a mortal enemy. To the best of my belief he is the only man-size enemy I have. But he is worse than a whole cityful of ordinary foes.

My mortal enemy is The Man Next Door. There is no use in my trying to escape him by moving to another street or another state or another land. Wherever I may chance to make my abode, he is always The Man Next Door. I cannot elude him.

He has made me do innumerable mean and cowardly and despicable things. He has made me throw away, foolishly and needlessly, thousands of dollars which might far better have gone to support my family or into the savings bank. Again and again, he has made me false to the best that is in me.

He has made me wear clothes which were neither becoming nor comfortable to me; and to buy three times as many of them as I needed, and then to discard them before they were worn out. He has made me eat rich food I don't like and which disagrees with me. He has made me live in a style I could not afford, and model my life and my actions and my opinions and my expenditures according to his whim, and against my own best interests.

I am horribly afraid of him; even while I detest him. I dare not risk his displeasure; even though sanity tells me he has no power to crush me in case I should summon up pluck enough to defy him.

He has a score of other names. Some call him "Public Opinion." Some call him "Fashion." Some call him "What-Will-People-Say?"

But, whatever his name at the moment, he is still my tyrant; my merciless slave-driver; always forcing his will upon me; always waiting to launch his shafts of ridicule against me or to brand me as eccentric if I try to stray one inch from the path he has mapped out for me.

I dare not laugh at him or turn a deaf ear to his commands. (Neither do you. He lives next door to you, as well as to me, you know. It was he, for example, who shoved you into debt by making you buy that costly car you neither needed nor could afford; just because he had bought one like it. It was he who made you send your children to that too-expensive school, and made you rent the house or apartment which was so out of keeping with your income. He made you neglect your somewhat down-at-heel old friends for the sake of smart new folk who are traveling at a pace you have no financial right to follow.)

The Man Next Door brags that he is my benefactor, not my enemy. He says that, but for him, I might do dishonest things from which Public Opinion now deters me; that I might beat my wife, or might degenerate into a sloven or a brute. He lies. I wish I dared answer him by saying:

"Self-Respect would keep me from doing or being any of those rotten things. So I owe you nothing. Self-Respect would have made a worth-while man of me, if I had had the brains and the courage to listen to it, instead of letting myself be guided by you. You could not keep on living next door to me for one hour if I had the manhood to choose Self-Respect and Common Sense as my perpetual housemates. I should be freed from your abhorrent yoke, forever!"

The remedy is so ridiculously simple! Why haven't I and the rest of us the nerve to apply it?

Albert Payson Terhune

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Can you imagine falling into this seething furnace—even though protected by an asbestos suit—and coming out alive? The story of how "Tex" Thornton did it, with a 30-quart nitroglycerin shell in his arms, is told in the following article

This Is No Job For A Nervous Man!

By Magner White

TO THOUSANDS of people in the cities and towns and on the farms in the Texas Panhandle—that narrow strip running up between Oklahoma and New Mexico—Tex Thornton is the apotheosis of adventure and the archangel of daredeviltry. And to the production men in the oil fields of that section and, indeed, all over the South in other fields, and in many other states, he is known as one of the best oil-well "shooters," and one of the best oil-well fire-fighters in the country.

In the past five years he has put out more than three hundred oil-well fires. He is affiliated with the U. S. Torpedo Company, a government-sponsored firm interested in the conservation of oil and natural gas resources. The company supplies the high explosives used in "shooting" wells, and in putting out fires in wells.

"His work is interesting to the public principally because it is so spectacular; but Tex Thornton is really one of the most important economic factors in the oil-production business," a Texas oil commissioner told me. "In the past three or four years, just to give you some idea of his value to the industry, he has saved enough natural gas alone, not to mention oil, by fighting fires no one else would tackle, to run the city of New York more than a hundred years."

Tex is a man of charming simplicity. He loves the excitement of his work. A crowd is always on hand to watch him put out a fire. At such times he is extremely busy; but he often manages to give everybody a laugh along with the excitement. Sometimes he holds them breathless with his courage in the face of danger. I remember an instance that happened last summer:

He was standing at the edge of the cellar of a burning well. A cellar is the depression, about ten feet square, about the mouth of an oil well, dug down so that the numerous pipes, casing, lines, cables, and other paraphernalia can be handled better. Dressed in the asbestos suit he uses to fight such fires, Tex was inspecting the blaze, deciding where he would put the explosive to snuff it out. The cellar was full of water, and the water, naturally, was boiling. Suddenly, without warning, the bank caved off, and Tex slid into the steaming inferno. Quick as a cat, he reached up and grabbed a cable stretched across the cellar.

The cable let him down so that his feet were in the boiling water. His asbestos shoes quickly filled. The shock was enough to have caused any but a man with steel nerves and unbeatable courage to give up. But, hand-over-hand, Tex walked across that blazing, gas-filled hole. When he landed on the opposite side he walked about a hundred yards, then sat down and pulled off his asbestos shoes. That was the last time he walked for five weeks. He still limps from the wounds. The surgeons had to take skin from other portions of his body to replace the skin of his feet.

AN OIL-WELL fire is a real fire. Imagine a plume of flame and smoke shooting a hundred to two hundred feet in the air, hissing and roaring as if it had the force of ten thousand locomotive boilers behind it—a gigantic, deafening torch, drafting its fuel from the depths of the earth—and you have some idea of the kind of fires Tex Thornton fights.

His face has been roasted so often that it has acquired a permanent tan. He is only thirty-five years old, but if you didn't happen to notice the youthful, adventurous twinkle in his dark eyes, you might guess his age at considerably more.

"I've been seasoned up some," he said, with a grin. He rolled up one of his sleeves. His arm was mottled all the way up. He bared the other arm. That was mottled too. He opened the front of his shirt. Altogether, he can boast of more than four hundred scars.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

And, naturally, so hazardous is his work that no insurance company will write a policy on his life.

When he tackles a fire, Tex puts on an asbestos suit and sometimes a gas mask. Then the fight begins. He darts into the fire, placing cables on the remaining metal parts of the rigging—which the flames have reduced to twisted masses. The metal is then dragged away. Not a scrap of iron can be left near the fire, for the heat might again ignite the well after the fire has been blown out. The ground is wet down all around.

When the way is clear, a shell containing nitroglycerin is either taken in by Tex or pulled in on a line and pulley until it is about eight or ten feet above the mouth of the well. The fire generally burns that far from the top, blowing out as I've already said, like a gigantic gas torch. It's the inflammable gas that causes the fire in an oil well. The explosive is set off, and —"puff!" the fire is out, whiffed out much as you would blow out a candle flame with your mouth.

NITROGLYCERIN is one of the most powerful of explosives. A tap equivalent to a sudden pressure of twenty-eight pounds to the square inch, or exposure to fire for about three minutes, will set it off. It is a fluid, slightly yellowish in color. Three quarts of it would blow a five-room house into splinters.

Tex often uses from ten to sixty quarts of nitroglycerin in putting out a fire, and when he is "shooting" a well—an entirely different process which I will explain later—he sometimes uses as much as twelve hundred quarts!

"Nitroglycerin has given me many a thrill, but it is not so awfully deadly if you know how to use it," Tex drawled in his inimitable West Texas manner, as we sat on his front porch in Amarillo, Texas.

"No use in running from that stuff. If it's going to go off and you are near it, it'll get you, no matter how fast you run.

STUDIO PANHANDLE INN, PANHANDLE, TEXAS

"I recall one time when I was shooting a well over in Hutchinson County. I'd put down five shells. As I let the last one down, a lot of gas somehow worked loose down below. It blew all those shells back up, one by one; and they each had thirty quarts apiece in 'em, too!"

"What did you do?"

"I caught 'em!"

To understand what happened, we're going to have to digress a moment and get a few pointers on how a well is "shot" to make the oil flow, or, as they say in the oil fields, to "put it on production."

Before I talked with Tex, I thought that when the drill hit the oil, the fluid at once started bubbling up. But that is rarely the case. What is struck is the oil formation, the stratum of sand which holds the fluid, like a great underground sponge.

Now, down at the point where it taps the oil, a well is usually not more than six or eight inches in diameter. It tapers down to that measurement from twenty inches, which is the standard width at the top, the casing being graded down to a smaller size every few hundred feet. Obviously, a little six- or eight-inch hole isn't going to let much oil through. The well must be "shot" to make it bigger at the bottom.

(Above) Not an ostrich plume, but a three-hundred-foot torch from a burning gas well. (Right) "Tex" Thornton, daring oil-well fire-fighter and "shooter," in the asbestos suit which he wears while putting out oil- and gas-well fires. He is carrying his asbestos helmet in his left hand. The long objects under his right arm are the shells which he uses to drop nitroglycerin into burning wells. (Below) Fighting a serious fire in a Texas oil well

Shells containing nitroglycerin are let down into the hole by means of a winch and line, operated (Continued on page 125)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Illustrated by
T. D. Skidmore

Last Instalment

Big Matt

By Brand Whitlock

WHEN the newspapers announced that Matt Holt had been indicted by the Grand Jury, the prevailing wind of public sentiment was indicated by that infallible weather vane, Senator Morris, who, repairing to the Fathers of the Republic as a source of constant inspiration, paraphrased Patrick Henry, and said:

"Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles I had his Cromwell, and John Blake has his Matt Holt!"

It was Pedley who brought about the fall of Matt Holt. Pedley had failed of re-election, and had ascribed his defeat, not without reason, to Matt's machinations. And as Matt had never before taken any action in politics that did not have Blake's sympathy and approval, Pedley did not hesitate to hold Blake morally responsible for the conspiracy, and the irreparable disaster to the cause of reform.

Pedley employed the leisure with which Matt's efforts had provided him to bring about Matt's indictment, and he hoped, in the course of Matt's trial, to bring to light evidence that would involve Blake in other of Matt's activities even more reprehensible, if that were possible, than those that had brought about Pedley's defeat at the polls that autumn.

When Matt was brought to trial, toward the close of the January term, Blake followed the proceedings of the court in the newspapers, where they were reported under alarming headlines that displayed the words "Big Matt" in black letters and gave a new and sinister connotation to the old and familiar nickname.

Blake remembered a time when everybody called Matt "Big Matt" in affection; but now that Matt was in trouble and no longer had any friends, the old nickname, by

Blake ran his eye down the column, picking out the important parts from the mass of words

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

a subtle process of suggestion, was transformed into something ugly and invidious, and became the synonym of all that was mean, base, and corrupt in politics.

Day after day, as the trial moved remorselessly on, Blake pored over these reports. He heard the testimony commented upon, elucidated, and explained in the gossip that was brought to him, from the lobby of the Stanley and from the cloak-rooms of the House and Senate, by Squire and by friends in both Houses, but they could find small encouragement; things were looking pretty black for Big Matt.

This new prosecutor, Whateley, was smart as a steel trap, and hard as nails, and went pitilessly on, day after day, piling up his evidence, making his case.

And, what made it all the worse, every now and then in the reports of the testimony, Blake would come across his own name, standing out as in a very spotlight for conspicuousness for all the world to see: it was Governor Blake this and Governor Blake that all the way through.

Then, one morning, Squire came in with the grave and ominous face he always put on when he had some particularly bad news to tell.

"Calkins has been given an immunity bath, and told all he knows. He's to go in the witness box to-morrow morning."

Calkins? Who was Calkins? And what did he know? Calkins? Oh yes, he remembered, when Squire reminded him. Calkins was the old friend for whom Matt had got the job in the office of the Commissioner of Public Utilities.

Calkins testified the next morning, and Judge Wilkinson, for the defense, subjected him to a cross-examination—a gruelling cross-examination, as the reporters described it—that lasted the whole day; but Judge Wilkinson couldn't break him down. That evening, the State rested.

"But don't give up yet, Governor," said Squire. "Wait for the defense to put in their case; wait for Matt to testify. He'll make monkeys of 'em."

BLAKE waited. If Matt took the stand and testified in his own behalf, sentiment would swing the other way. He remembered what a good witness Matt had made before the Committee of the Senate; he could see Matt raise that large, bald face to Fenshard, and to Pedley, making monkeys of them. Matt could do it again. They couldn't bluff old Matt!

The next morning, when the defense should have begun to put in its case, Judge Wilkinson asked for a recess until afternoon, and the Court granted it. In the noon editions of the newspapers it was stated that there was a hitch somewhere; the line of defense was in dispute; Big Matt had had a row with his lawyer.

What did it all mean? Should he call up Wilkinson on the telephone? No, he didn't dare do that. He rang for Squire. But Squire could only shake his head, more gravely and despondently than ever.

When Court convened again in the afternoon, Judge Wilkinson rose and said:

"If the Court please, the defense rests!"

Old Fox brought in the noon editions of the newspapers and laid them on the table. Blake picked them up and glanced at the headlines, stretched across the first page: "Big Matt goes to the Pen."

Blake ran his eye down the column, picking out the important parts from the mass of words: "Holt, stand up." . . . "Holt, have you anything to say why the sentence of the Court should not be passed upon you?" . . . "No, Your Honor." . . . "Holt, you have been given a fair trial before an impartial jury of your peers, and found guilty." But what was the use of reading further? He let the paper fall to his table, and went over to the window and looked down into High Street.

IT WAS late in the afternoon before Matt appeared. Blake had dreaded the meeting, dreaded to see that change in Matt. But when Matt came, swinging into the room with his old manner, which for so long had seemed to sweep everything before it, he could see no great change in Matt—a little more grave perhaps, but himself once more, quite the same old Big Matt.

He sank into the chair, and glanced an instant about the room, then turned his face toward Blake.

Blake waited for Matt to begin; but when Matt gave no sign of opening the conversation, and the silence threatened to prolong itself and become embarrassing, Blake said:

"You know, Matt, how sorry I—"

"I know, Governor," Matt hastened to say.

And then, rasping his chin with the palm of his hand, Matt glanced out of the window and remarked: "Looks as if it might snow to-night."

"H'm, yes," Blake assented. And then impulsively he leant forward: "Tell me, Matt, why didn't you take the stand?"

"What was the use?"

"No, honestly," Blake insisted, "why didn't you?"

Matt rasped his palm over his chin again and replied:

"Well, you see, John, I didn't have Grant to deal with this time. I had this fellow Whateley, another proposition altogether."

"Matt," said Blake, "that wasn't the reason; you know it, and I know it. Tell me, frankly, what was it?"

Matt hesitated, waited a while, and then all at once he squared 'round in his chair to face Blake, and began, speaking out of the side of his mouth:

"Well, you see, John, it was pretty plain to me from the beginning that they were trying to drag you into this thing; all those questions, you know, bringing in your name whenever they could, and all that. I told you a good while ago, there at the first, when this thing broke—remember?—that they were after you.

"You see, when we came in—I mean when your administration came in—I thought things, politics, I mean, would be about what they had always been; I thought that was what we were here for. I was a fool, of course; I see it now. I saw it back there last summer, and afterward, especially when you made that last speech winding up your campaign.

"You showed me then, showed me where I was wrong, see? I saw that I had done you a lot of harm, thrown you down, practically. I didn't want to do you any more harm than I had, and I thought it was up to me to keep still, and take my medicine. It was all I could do. I don't regret it, and you mustn't feel sorry for me."

"But, Matt," said Blake, forcing himself to utter a thought that he would rather not have put into words, "if they are really after me—"

"Oh, don't worry; that's all over now. They've drawn blood, and they are satisfied. You've nothing to fear now."

Matt paused. It had grown almost dark in the room. Out through the window Blake could see the lights coming on in High Street. He felt that he ought to say something, but he didn't know just what to say, and before he could compose his thoughts and decide how best to recognize the sacrifice that Matt had made for him, he heard Matt's voice, a hoarse rumble in the still darkness of the room.

"If you could just feel, John," Matt said, "that I had squared myself!"

Just then old Fox entered and switched on the lights and laid the evening papers, those chronicles of disaster, on his desk. And on Fox's heels came Squire, and he said, in his most significant tone of warning: "The reporters are out there."

Matt rose to go, and they said good-by, Blake with a friendly hand on Matt's broad shoulder. And when Matt reached the outer chamber, where the reporters were, Blake heard one of them ask:

"What did you say to the Governor, Matt?"

And then came Matt's reply, prompt and incisive, delivered in his full, deep voice—he wasn't speaking out of the corner of his mouth that time:

"None of your damn business!"

Squire closed the door. Well, thought Blake, Matt might be going to the penitentiary, but he was free, at any rate; free now to say what he thought, and speak his mind, free of a thousand fears, and that was more than he ever could be, Governor though he was.

AS SOON as Matt's case had been taken on error to the upper courts and the judgment confirmed, and Matt had been imprisoned in the penitentiary, he was forgotten by the public; new sins in the meantime having provided new victims for the chase.

But Matt wasn't forgotten by Blake; Matt was in his thoughts more than ever, a preoccupation from which he was never to escape. Matt had been a source of constant anxiety during all that first term of office, and he was a source of even greater worry now. The thought of this old friend, the companion of his political adventures, shut up behind the gray walls of a prison, whilst he, Blake, was in the Executive Mansion, was intolerable.

There was nothing that he could do for Matt beyond hinting discreetly to Sam Wall, the warden of the penitentiary, to show Matt every favor (though he could have trusted Wall to do that without encouragement from him). And, even so, even though Matt were spared physical hardship and were not compelled to share the lot of a convict, Matt was ruined and disgraced, while Blake was successful and honored.

"Well, here we are," Matt used to say, at every step of their progress; they had come all the way together, thus far.

But there was, after all, one thing that Blake could do for Matt: he could pardon him. The idea had stolen upon his mind, or upon his conscience, gradually; it became a temptation, and before long an obsession.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

He knew what the result in his own case would be, if he were to pardon Matt; already, in an article in "The Star," describing with some exaggeration and a great deal of moral indignation, the exceptional treatment that Matt was receiving in the State's prison, he had had a foretaste of what the newspapers would say. And yet, the idea tempted him.

One hot August day, slowly passing through the dim, cool rotunda of the State House, leaning on his stick, he encountered Wiley, the secretary of the State Board of Pardons, an old friend and protégé of Matt's, and he could not forbear to sound him.

"By the way, Wiley," he asked casually, "has an application for pardon ever been filed by Matt Holt or any of his friends?"

"Lord, no, Governor!" exclaimed Wiley. "No one would think of such a thing. I doubt, indeed, if the Board would dare to consider it if it were presented."

"Oh, I just asked for information," said Blake, carelessly, and he walked on, thinking that Wiley's answer had not helped him to a solution; it had only told him what he might expect.

AND then, one morning in September, he went to the penitentiary to see Matt. His arrival, unostentatious as he could make it, caused the sensation that might be expected; he was recognized instantly, and two or three "trusties" sitting in the office flew to notify the guard, and in another moment there was the warden hastening to receive him.

"Why, Governor!" cried Wall. "Glad to see you! But why didn't you let me know, so I could have had you received properly?"

But Blake waved the warden's apologies aside, and they went into the private office.

"I came out, Sam," said Blake, "to see Matt. How is he?"

"He's well."

"Does he suffer much?"

"Suffer!" The warden laughed. "I should say not! I make it as easy for him as I can."

"Did you put him to work?"

"Why, Governor, he helps me. Fact is, he helps me to run the whole shebang; he's introduced a lot of new things. I'll show you before you go; I couldn't get along without him. Shall I have him brought in?"

"No. I'll go to him; I want to see him alone."

"Well, he's sitting out there in the yard, I guess."

Matt, in his shirt sleeves, was in the yard, sitting on a bench against the wall, outside the cell house, bent over, the warm September sun lying upon his broad back; he was smoking a cigar slowly and reading a newspaper, his glasses perched on his high nose. At sight of him, Blake stopped; Matt, bent over as he was, and absorbed in his newspaper, hadn't seen him as yet.

"Hullo, Matt," he said, holding out his hand.

Matt looked up, with incredulity in his blue eyes; he gaped at Blake for a moment, and then, straightening up and getting to his feet, exclaimed:

"John! . . . I mean, Governor! What in—?"

"I just came out to see you, Matt," said Blake. But he couldn't go on. A momentary confusion seized them; Matt, after his first glance at Blake, had looked away, across the grimy quadrangle and then, glancing down dubiously at the bench, he said:

"Rather go inside, Governor? Sam would let us have his office, I reckon, if you want to talk."

"No," said Blake, "let's sit down here, in the sun."

They sat down, side by side.

"Well, Matt," said Blake, and then he found that he couldn't go on. The phrases with which one engaged in conversations, even with old friends, seemed, in this place, more than banal and absurd; they seemed inappropriate, a kind of mockery. They sat there in silence, until finally, to Blake's relief, Matt spoke.

"Looks good to see you again," said Matt. "Feeling all right, aren't you?" He thought that Matt's blue eyes were fixed on him in concern, as if inspecting and studying him.

"Oh yes, I'm all right. Feel better than I have in a long time."

"Well, you want to take care of yourself; don't try to do too much."

Matt paused, and was silent; he turned away from Blake for a moment. Then, presently, he said:

"How's the family? Mrs. Blake, and Joyce, and Eddie?"

"They're well."

"Joyce like living in the city? I see her name now and then in the papers. How's Eddie?"

"Oh, about the same." The less said about Eddie the better; he didn't like to talk about Eddie.

Beginning Next Month

Zane Grey's New Novel "SUNSET PASS"

WHEREVER the English language is spoken, the name of Zane Grey is known. He has immortalized, as no other writer, the Pioneer West of our America. "Riders of the Purple Sage," "To the Last Man," "The Wanderer of the Wasteland," "The Call of the Canyon," "Desert Gold"—they are magic names. And they are the names of only a few of the long list of Zane Grey's novels.

In his pages live again the color, the lure, the glory of mountain and desert—a fitting background for these epics of love and courage and devotion to the cause of Civilization against the Wilderness. In "Nevada," which appeared recently in THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, Zane Grey reached his high-water mark of achievement up to that time. But in "Sunset Pass" he has given us a story even richer in its store of romance and of drama.

We have the same historic setting—the frontier towns, and the cattle ranges with their "rustlers," their gunmen and their heroes. But surely not even Zane Grey has given us before a group of characters so fascinating as those which move through the pages of "Sunset Pass." Trueman Rock, famous on many ranges for his prowess in riding, shooting, and love-making; "that strange, wild, lovely Thiry Preston," daughter of the mysterious Preston clan; Ash Preston, leader of that clan and terror of the country all about. These are the three leading figures in the strange drama that is played out against the background of the wild and gorgeous beauty of Sunset Pass.

If you are interested in a faithful re-creation of those eventful days of the Pioneer West, when an empire was in the making; if you like a story of love and adventure, which moves swiftly and cleanly to its goal; if you thrill to the beauty of nature in its wildest and grandest aspects, you cannot afford to miss "Sunset Pass."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

From time to time, Matt studiously examined the end of his almost finished cigar, turning it about in the tips of his fingers

"What's he doing now? In college, I suppose."

"No, he's working for an automobile concern."

He realized that Matt was trying to stave off the discussion that was inevitable and, scarcely knowing what to say himself, he allowed Matt to talk on, and was not surprised when, presently, Matt veered 'round to the old subject that was never long out of his thoughts, and said:

"And how's politics? I see here in the paper—"

And they talked politics, somewhat as they used to do in the old days, and Matt seemed to forget his own trouble in those reminiscences and speculations and predictions that had formed the staple of their conversation during all those long years of friendship. But when at last he did remember again, he looked up humbly, and said:

"And your prospects, John, for the nomination—tell me, did—my trouble—hurt them so much, do you think?"

"Oh, I don't think so," replied Blake, though he was not so sure as he allowed Matt to think he was.

"You don't know what a relief it is to me," said Matt, "to hear you say that. I've wondered, and worried a lot; I've talked to Sam about it; he said it hadn't, that you were as popular as ever; but in here it's hard for me to tell. I've only got the newspapers to go by, and you can't tell much from them, though from what I could judge your popularity hasn't been affected."

He didn't want to hear Matt speak of his popularity. He had something else on his mind just then.

"Matt," he said, "how long have you been here?"

"Five months and twenty-seven days," Matt replied promptly.

"And you have to serve how much longer?"

"Fifteen months and three days."

Blake was silent a moment; he sat on the bench in the sunlight, and looked off across the (Continued on page 149)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

When You Pay For Experience Be Sure To Keep Your Receipt!

"I don't mind meeting the cost of anything I must learn from experience," says Elmer G. Biechler, "but I've always made it a point never to pay twice for the same piece of information—The story of a man who shaped his life according to the golf maxim: Direction first—then distance

By William H. Crawford

IF YOU had been driving along the Cincinnati Pike a few miles south of Dayton, twenty years ago, you might have seen a sturdy youth of seventeen digging post holes, or shinning up a telephone pole with a roll of wire over one arm. And if you had guessed what I am going to tell you in a minute or so, you probably would have wanted to stop and ask that boy a lot of questions.

You would have wanted to know what there was about him, or in him, that was destined to make his story different from that of the other young fellows who, like him, were drawing down their fifteen dollars a week as linemen for the local telephone company. You would have been curious to find out whether this particular lad, with the fun-loving brown eyes and the serious mouth, had any idea how he was going to heft himself up into the world of big achievement by the time he was barely thirty-five. And you would have been surprised to discover how simple was the program he had mapped out for himself.

To-day, if you were driving along the same road and halted at the identical spot where you were tempted to stop before, a stone's throw away you would see the biggest one-story factory building in the world. If you crossed the road and made inquiries, you find that its roof covers thirty-five acres. That freight trains run into it, pulling fifty cars at a time to be loaded. That thousands of workmen labor beside its miles of conveyor belts. That the plant, together with another factory owned and operated in Dayton by the same company, has an output of more than one hundred million dollars' worth of products a year!

And if you were lucky enough to find the boss on the premises, you would have no difficulty in recognizing him. At thirty-seven, Elmer G. Biechler, president and general manager of the Delco-Light Company, still looks very much like the sturdy, fresh-cheeked youth who twenty years ago was digging post holes along the Cincinnati pikeway.

Now, from a post-hole digger to the head of a great corporation is quite a distance for a man to travel in seventeen years. But then there are few men who move as fast or as decisively as Elmer Biechler does.

Not long ago, I spent the greater part of a day with Mr. Biechler. Early in the morning, we left his office in Dayton for the factory, five miles out. It was luncheon time when we emerged from the plant. As we stood for a moment on the steps before starting back to town, I put a question to him.

"How did you get from there to here?" I asked, pointing to the road a stone's throw away.

"If you can stand the truth," he said a little grimly, "I'll tell you. I did it by main strength and awkwardness!"

"What do you mean by that?" I demanded, puzzled.

"Just this," he replied. "Like most young fellows in the world, I started out with a desire to be somebody; to get somewhere. And, like most other young fellows, I didn't know exactly where it was that I wanted to go. In short, I had my eye on no special goal. But the general direction in which I wanted to move was upward. I was mighty sure about that. Maybe that was one reason why I began my career by climbing telephone poles!

"The most valuable thing I learned at school did not come out of a book. I got it by watching the other youngsters in the classroom, on the playground, or in the street. It was this: It's not how much brains, or muscle, or knowledge you possess that hefts you upward; it's what you do with what you have.

"Make that statement to the first dozen men you meet, and the chances are that every one of them will say, 'Huh! Any fool knows that!' But any fool doesn't know it—not by a jugful! Of course a lot of folks know it with the surface part of their minds; but their knowledge fails to go deep enough to influence their actions. Deep down in his heart, the average man thinks that Bill Jones gets ahead because he has the gift of gab, or because his wife's cousin is on the board of directors, or because he has a way of kidding the boss along. Even Bill Jones's friends are likely to overlook the important fact that Bill plugs pretty steadily at the old job.

"LONG before I got as far along as digging post holes, I realized that I could never afford to leave any margin between my capacity and my output. No matter what the job, I threw into it every ounce of what I had to give. In short, I always fought like the very devil, even when I wasn't quite sure what I was fighting for! And when the smoke of battle cleared away, I usually found that I had inched up a bit.

"Of course, if I found myself barking up the wrong tree, or one that was too short to take me very far upward, I simply looked around for another tree more to my liking. It isn't fair to yourself or to your boss to stick to a job that doesn't hold a certain amount of challenge for you.

"I have worked with men, under men, and over men, but I have yet to find a man who could offer a satisfactory substitute for hard work. I have seen pull, luck, and even brains strike out when plain plugging would step up to bat and make a home run. Of course a lot of folks who work the hardest look anything but hard-worked. That is because they put so much fun into their jobs that they are bound to get some of it back.

"IT'S a tremendous advantage to possess a natural-born taste for work. I know, for I have it! Nothing puts a keener edge on my zest for life than the prospect of whipping a tough job into shape. But even if you don't like work naturally, you can cultivate a taste for it, just as you can cultivate a taste for olives or golf. And since most of us spend considerably more of our waking hours at work than we spend in playing golf or in eating olives, it seems to me that the moral is fairly obvious.

"One of the happiest and most successful men I know was a miserable failure at his job until he was nearly forty. In his middle twenties, he inherited a soap business from his father, and for the sake of a large family of minor brothers and sisters he had to carry on. Day after day, he drove himself to a job that he loathed. Then, after ten years of this, one fine morning he suddenly woke up to the fact that it wasn't making soap that he hated; it was the thought that he had to make soap. After that, both my friend and the soap business picked up amazingly.

"A lot of folks are like that. They don't actually mind work; it's the idea of work that they object to. And once they stop lugging around the perverse notion that work is a hardship, they find that they have twice as much energy to devote to the business in hand."

Elmer Biechler was born in Miamisburg, Ohio, a small town ten miles south of Dayton. He was the only child in the family; but he received none of the spoiling

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

which is the proverbial lot of the only child.

"My folks are Pennsylvania Dutch," he told me. "Dad made a comfortable living out of his insurance business, so I did not have the spur of poverty to urge me on. However, when I reached the fourth or fifth grade at school the family encouraged me in my notion of getting a vacation job. In fact, Dad offered me two dollars a week to run errands and act as general handy boy around his office. I turned him down flat. I was only ten years old, but I was crazy about machinery. No office job for me!

"One of my uncles managed an ice factory in Miamisburg. I boldly asked him for a job in the engine-room. He said he would give me a dollar and a half a week to keep the valves clean and the brass polished.

"'But,' he warned me soberly, 'you'll have to earn it. In business, blood's no thicker than water!'

"I understood what he meant all right, and I acted accordingly. To this day, I'm grateful to my uncle for that speech as well as for the scrupulous exactness with which he made me toe the mark that summer. His attitude taught me at the very outset to count on myself and on my own efforts, rather than on any possible friend at court.

"YEARS of close observation have taught me that 'pull' is about the worst thing a boy can have. He is apt to lean on it when he ought to be hustling to make good. Personally, the only credential I want from a man is his own record.

"And that reminds me of something else. You remember that I turned down a two-dollar job for a dollar-and-a-half one. It's funny, but every time in my life that I've switched jobs, of my own initiative I've gone from a higher salary to a lower one. This was not because I wanted less money, but because I wanted more job.

"If I have any advice to give to the young fellow who is just starting out, it is this: When you pick a job, look at the size of the man above you, not at the size of your pay envelope. If the 'higher-ups' are doing something you would like to do, take off your coat and wade in. Given average intelligence and health and a determination to leave no margin between your capacity and your output, there is only one direction in which you can move. And that's upward!"

The fact that young Biechler always had a job during vacation time does not mean that he had no time or inclination for play. The truth is, he was a ringleader in all the hardy outdoor sports of the village. That is how he came by the strong body that stands him in such good stead to-day. Indeed, it was in the world of play that Elmer first showed his genius for organization.

Miamisburg is surrounded by hills, which in winter are usually covered with snow for two or three months. Now, hills and snow make an ideal combination for tobogganing. When Elmer was twelve, he and his gang decided that they were big enough to join the older boys and girls in this delightful sport. But there was one slight drawback—they had no toboggans. Worse still, toboggans were "out of sight" that year, and the parents of the "gang" refused pointblank to furnish the wherewithal to buy them.

Here was a clear case of demand and no supply. With true business enterprise, young Biechler proceeded to organize a company to build toboggans!

The company was a close corporation, as the members of the gang were the only stockholders. There were, however, certain collateral non-participating investors. These were the fathers of the boys. One was a lumber merchant; another a blacksmith; while a third kept a paint shop.

UNDER the leadership of young Biechler, the members of the gang pooled their nickels and dimes and bought lumber at cost from the lumber merchant. They next persuaded the blacksmith to allow them to use his shop. In the smithy there was a huge old kettle. This, Elmer and a trusty lieutenant filled with water and put over the forge. They then put the hickory into the kettle and pumped the bellows vigorously until the water was boiling. The hickory was kept in the boiling water until the wood was pliable. It was then taken out and the runners given that upward curve which is essential to a good sled.

The next step was to buy some iron bolts from the blacksmith and rivet the runners firmly together. This feat accomplished with the help of the smithy, who by this time was almost as interested as the boys, hickory cross-bars were riveted to the frames and iron rods added, to serve as handholds.

A visit to the paint shop resulted in the purchase at wholesale prices of a large can of brilliant red paint and a small can of black enamel. The following day, a whole squadron of giant red toboggans elegantly banded in black appeared on the longest hill around Miamisburg.

And the joke of it was that the owners of those sleds sold them to their parents at twenty-five per cent less than the market price, and had still cleared a hundred per cent on their investment.

"Those sleds were worth what they cost our dads, too," Mr. Biechler told me proudly. "Mine is as good as new to-day. Fact is, my eight-year-old daughter wouldn't swap it for the most expensive new one in the shops."

There was a (Continued on page 155)

Elmer G. Biechler is president of the Delco-Light Company, which, with its affiliated plants, has an annual output of more than one hundred million dollars' worth of products. The main factory over which he presides stands by the side of a road where, twenty years ago, he worked as a post-hole digger. Mr. Biechler was born at Miamisburg, Ohio, thirty-seven years ago. His office is in Dayton

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The "Just-As-Soon-As" Habit

By Ellis Parker Butler

SEVERAL million of us in these United States have reached the age where we can turn around and see a whole parade of years strung out behind us. A handful of us may let loose three whoops of satisfaction, and say, "Oh, boy! There's a perfect job of construction work!" But my bet is that most of us don't.

When we started out, we were going to build a boulevard of years as straight and handsome and wide as Pennsylvania Avenue, lined with superb structures; but when we look back at the years we have built, the route resembles the tracks of the cow that laid out Boston, and most of the elegant edifices are not there.

I don't know that this is much to worry about. We have all got to where we are, somehow, and not many of us have dirty alleys tacked in between the clean cow paths and macadam stretches of our lives; but to a connoisseur of lives our jobs of life-building must look fair to middling ragged. Many things have mussed up our good intentions.

Take my own case: The other day I wrote a novel. It is the first out-and-out novel I ever wrote, and I am very happy about it, because, being a writer by profession, it has always been my intention to write a lot of novels.

The trouble with me has been that I have always been going to write a novel just as soon as I got something else done. I decided to be a novelist thirty-eight years ago, when I was in the wholesale grocery profession and busy selling beans. "I will write a novel," I said to myself, "just as soon as I have sold all the beans." I referred, of course, to the small white beans that are called navy beans because enough of them are produced every year to sink a navy.

I never did get all the navy beans sold. Every time I sold a bushel of beans some eager bean grower produced forty bushels. Charley Fuller, who was my best bean customer out there in Muscatine, used to buy two bushels of navy beans from me every week or so, and now and then I sold a bushel to Sam Gordon or Peter Whippelhauser.

But in those days navy beans came in carloads, and cargoes, and trainloads, and by the ton and if we left the north windows of the warehouse open at night a couple of blizzards of navy beans would blow in from Wisconsin, and when we opened the front door a landslide of beans would pour out and stop the street cars. At the end of eight years, after I had sold beans until I was blue in the face, there were more beans on hand than when I began, and the "Western Grocer Magazine" said, in the August number, "Beans, Navy: The indications are for a phenomenally large crop this year."

"All right!" I said firmly. "This is too much beans. Eight years is enough. If I wait until I sell all the beans I will never be a novelist. I'll go to New York, and write my novel just as soon as I am comfortably settled there."

The just-as-soon-as habit already had me in its clutches. And it has had me ever since. When I reached New York I said: "I will write a novel just as soon as I get accustomed to living in a boarding-house," and I spent most of my time writing letters to my sweetheart out in Iowa. Then I said: "I will go back and marry my girl just as soon as I get a safe job as editor." Well, for thirty years I kept right on just-as-sooning that novel into the future, and I would probably have no novel now if a do-it-now man had not crowded me into a corner some months ago, and made me write it.

THE chances are that the world has not broken its heart because I wrote no novel for thirty-eight years. It has, however, made a difference to me. Even an easy-going novelist turns out two novels a year, and if I had not been a just-as-sooner I would have had seventy-six novels to my credit by now. Instead of saying, "Butler? Butler? Isn't he the man who used to sell beans for the Fred Daut Company?" the folks out in Muscatine, Iowa, would be saying, "Butler, of course; but Thackeray and Dickens also wrote some pretty good novels."

If I had not got into the habit of telling my publisher that I would write a novel just as soon as I got my hair cut, or bought a new typewriter ribbon, or was elected Queen of the May, or did any one of a thousand other things the just-as-soon-as man always digs up as an excuse, millions of intelligent citizens of this great republic might consider my name a household word. They would not refer to me doubtfully, saying, "Butler?

(Continued on page 165)

The Thing I Hate Most To Do

Prize Contest Announcement

"MOST of us are procrastinators about some things," says Mr. Butler, "some of us are procrastinators about most things, and all of us have the putting-off habit about at least one thing. Now, I've found that the best way to get over a bad habit is, first of all, to look it in the face."

There is not much argument possible on that statement, especially on the last part of it, so THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE invites you in this contest to haul out into the light the thing you hate most to do—the task you always put off. Maybe it is washing the supper dishes, writing letters, calling on a newcomer in your neighborhood, getting a hair-cut, oiling the lawn mower, taking out the ashes—whatever it is, write us about it. There are a thousand little tasks in life, and there's one that, more than any other, you put off. Tell what it is, how you came to despise it so, and what your habit of putting it off has cost you in friendship, money, peace of mind, energy, or in some other way.

For the best letter of not more than four hundred words we offer the following prizes: $30, first prize; $20, second prize; $10, third prize. Competition closes March 20th. Winning letters will appear in the June, 1928, issue.

Address Procrastinator Contest Editor, THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE, 250 Park Avenue, New York City.

Contributions to this contest, and any enclosures, cannot be returned; so you must make a copy of your contest letter and of any enclosures, if you want to preserve them. Manuscripts and inquiries not connected with the contest must be sent under separate cover to the Editor of THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Photograph by D. Jay Culver

Ellis Parker Butler

"THE trouble with me," says Mr. Butler, "is that I never can do anything until I have done something else. I'm one of those 'just-as-soon-as' fellows, which explains why I planned for thirty-eight years to write a novel, before I ever got 'round to starting it. I set myself to write a story, but go out to rake the leaves off the lawn. Raking leaves suggests fixing the lawn mower, and fixing the lawn mower suggests washing the car, and washing the car suggests washing the dog, and washing the dog suggests taking a walk in the fresh air, and taking a walk suggests loafing down the street—and the first thing I know the day is done, and the story isn't even begun."

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Sumner Studio, Northfield, Minn.

OLE EDVART RÖLVAAG, fisherman, farm hand, teacher, and author of "Giants in the Earth," came to the United States from Norway. He finally was made professor of Norse Literature at St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minnesota, where he now lives. In the accompanying article, Lincoln Colcord, himself a former sailor, gives you the story of Rölvaag, the seaman, and the author.

© E. M. Newman, from Publishers Photo Service

AMID such scenes as these Rölvaag grew up. The picture above shows fish warehouses lining the canal at Trondhjem, Norway; the one to the right is a Lofoten Islands harbor scene.

Photograph from Ewing Galloway

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Rölvaag The Fisherman Shook His Fist At Fate

By Lincoln Colcord

THIRTY years ago, a young fisherman sat on a hillside far up on the north coast of Norway, gazing off across the Arctic Ocean and debating the hardest problem of his life. He was faced that day with a tremendous decision: Should he keep on with fishing, and live and die up under the Arctic Circle? Or should he go out alone into the world, to fulfill a vague but powerful impulse that was stirring within him?

Something had happened to bring this question to an issue. He sat there all the afternoon, fighting it out with himself step by step. It was the crisis of his life, and he met it bravely and confidently. Against the advice of family and friends, he decided to refuse the fine offer that had just come his way, turn his back on the only life he knew, and go to America.

To-day, that unknown fisherman is internationally famous as the author of "Giants in the Earth," a novel of the pioneer settlement of South Dakota which has been received by reviewers and critics everywhere as a new note in American literature. His name is Ole Edvart Rölvaag, and he is a teacher in St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minnesota, where he holds the chair of Norwegian Literature. Since coming to America, in 1896, he has acquired practically all of his education, earning his way through school and college at all kinds of jobs. He has been a member of the faculty of St. Olaf College since the fall of 1906; and, in addition, has found time to write six novels of Norwegian-American life, a volume of essays, and three volumes of reading for preparatory schools and colleges, besides taking an active part in various activities within his own racial group.

Rölvaag's own story reads like romantic fiction of the most extravagant quality: Born in a lonely fisherman's hamlet in conditions of extreme poverty, he left school at the age of fourteen to follow the sea as a fisherman for the next six years. At the age of twenty, he came to America, without a word of English in his vocabulary or a penny in his pocket. In spite of all this, the man of fifty-one stands well across the threshold of one of the world's literary reputations.

Nowadays, when he talks of his youthful decision to come to America, his face often wears a look of astonishment, as if he wonders where he could have found the courage and audacity to do what he did.

"I had been a full-fledged fisherman then for five years," he reminds you. "I had left school as a pupil who could not learn, at the age of fourteen, and buried all hopes of an education. At fifteen, I had taken my place in the fisheries. All my people for generations followed the sea; there was nothing else to do. In summer, we fished in small open boats, going out every day from our little harbor. In winter we went in large boats, carrying crews of five or six men, to the historic fishing grounds off the Lofoten Islands, over two hundred miles away. That was much like the trips of Gloucester fishermen to the Banks of Newfoundland. Only our craft were so much smaller.

"It was a hard life, and I went at it hard. I'd been a failure in school; well, I had to show that I was worth something in other directions. And I am proud to say that I became a good fisherman and an expert seaman. I fought for my life many times on the open North Atlantic, caught out in storms in the winter darkness. I learned how to handle a boat, how to be reckless and still use good judgment, and how to pit one's small strength against the elements. I learned how to measure men and life, and how to value both.

"BUT, all the while, I wasn't satisfied. There was something else I wanted in life, yet I couldn't put my finger on it. In 1893, the twenty-fifth of January, to be exact, I remember, the whole fishing fleet was caught out in a terrible storm. Many of my friends and boon companions were lost that day. The man I sailed with was an old Viking, the finest seaman I have ever known. He brought us through the storm by superhuman efforts. How I loved and admired him for this and other feats. Yet, thinking the experience over afterward, it struck me that my way of living was awfully futile. I couldn't bear to think of myself drifting around, with life over before it had hardly begun. Something inside me struggled for release. What it was I didn't exactly know, but it made me vastly unhappy.

"In fact, that storm changed my nature. I remembered it vividly—the awful darkness, the terrific wind, the lashing seas. I couldn't get away from it. I had realized that both boat and crew were in dire peril. As the seas broke over us and I believed that death was inescapable, I felt a resentment against Destiny. Why was my life to be snuffed out just as it was about to begin? Fear I had not; only a dull, aching resentment. I probably cursed a little that day. I was going to die, without a chance to express my real self, to (Continued on page 188)

For That Man Who Told Me He Had Never Had a Chance

"THE Island of Dönna where Rölvaag was born is a barren rock, covered with gorse and heather," says Mr. Colcord. "As a boy, Rölvaag would go with his mother to gather kelp from the rocks. They boiled it and fed it to their cattle. An opening between low ledges of granite marks the cove named Rölvaag, from which the author took his name. At the head of the cove, the houses of the settlement stand out stark and unprotected against the sky line. A gloomy, desolate scene—a perilous stronghold on the fringe of the Arctic night. All the men in this settlement were fishermen. It was a life full of hardship and danger, with sorrow and poverty standing close at hand. The midnight sun shone on them for a season; during the winter they had the long darkness. Here Rölvaag's forbears had lived, going out to the fisheries, since time immemorial. Here he grew up."

I THOUGHT of this description of Rölvaag's background when a man said to me recently, "I haven't had a real chance in life. My folks lived away off from civilization. A fellow can't learn when he's isolated."

Rölvaag's distinguished career is the best answer to anyone who holds such views about early handicaps, isolation, lack of schooling, and lack of association with new persons and new ideas.

THE EDITOR.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Her Husband's Son

A story

By Dorothy Sanburn Phillips

Illustrated by Frances Rogers

"MY MOTHER never hurries." Little Jim's voice was not accusing, or critical. It was dispassionate, merely stating an observation.

He stood in the kitchen door, a slim, wiry little figure in a brown corduroy suit, his dark eyes fixed upon his stepmother as she moved about the kitchen getting dinner.

At his words, she threw him a quick glance.

The short November twilight was over and dusk had fallen. Though the light was lit in the kitchen, Elizabeth McLaughlin had not drawn the shades. Outside, the lights of other kitchens gleamed across the small suburban back yards. A rising north wind moaned through the leafless trees.

But all Beth McLaughlin saw was that figure in the doorway, the son of her husband and another woman, who had been the wife of his youth, and who was still alive.

"Well, sometimes you have to hurry to get things done," she remarked pleasantly.

"My mother always gets things done," said little Jim.

Beth winced. She wanted to cry, "Yes, I know your mother gets things done. She does everything well. She's perfect, and I'm not; but I wish to heaven you'd shut up about her!"

But what she said aloud was, "There, I thought I heard your father's train whistle. You'd better run upstairs and wash your hands, and"—with emphasis—"your face."

After he had gone, she closed the kitchen door with a bang. Usually she left it open so she could hear big Jim when he came in, and could hurry to the hall to greet him.

She had married Jim McLaughlin three years before, and at that time she had known all about his former wife, and his son. In fact, long before they were engaged he had told her of his unhappy marriage. Her friends in New York had been skeptical of his attentions. "Don't waste your time on him, Beth. A divorced man with a son, and probably paying alimony—"

But Beth had loved him from the first—his big ungainly figure, his fair head, his blue eyes that seemed to be always searching, the little wistful curve to his lips as he smiled. And he had loved her.

"It will be something of a pull at first," he had said when they talked of marriage. "Jim lives with his mother, and she'll probably continue to keep him; but I pay the major share of his support."

During the first year Beth had kept on with her job. She was so used to working. And they had lived in New York, and saved systematically, painstakingly. Then they had had a chance to buy reasonably a house in the suburbs, a small house, it was true, but a real house with a yard and a garden and two apple trees, with a real kitchen, a real dining-room, and a room for a nursery. So they had moved out of town and Beth had given up her job.

How wonderful it had all been, almost too wonderful to be true, it seemed as she looked back on it. That year in New York—hurrying through breakfast, starting out to work together, coming home at night, lingering over dinner and talking of their jobs. Those first few months in their own house—the fun of fixing up a home—seed catalogues—materials for curtains—wall paper for the nursery, and plans for the baby that was coming in the spring.

But there had been no baby in the spring, and the nursery remained untenanted.

He came back a few moments later with a bulging bag

LATE one winter afternoon Beth had been rushed in an ambulance to the nearest hospital. There had followed forty-eight hours during which Jim walked the floor, and then—

"Well, I did my best for the race," she tried to smile at him from the pillow. "Better luck next time!"

The doctors were very insistent that many months must pass before the next time. She must regain her strength. It would be a slow process. And it was not until much later that they had told her that there would be no next time.

She had come home from the doctor's office that day, calmly got dinner, calmly

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"His other mother!" Those words echoed through Beth's mind. She stood there staring at him met Jim in the front hall. But he saw from her face that she knew.

He took her in his arms and held her tight.

"Babies are an awful nuisance," he whispered. "I'm not so keen about them—honestly. Of course, I wanted one, because you did; but I don't care as long as I have you!"

She smiled at his awkward, loving words. "Jim, you're a dear," she answered. "There's no one like you in the world! . . . I don't mind—much. Only—"

Strange that that woman who had never really loved him had given him a son, and she, who loved him so, could not!

Then had come the letter.

JIM had tossed it across the dinner table to her one August evening. She knew well that small, square handwriting. Every month she saw it, acknowledgments of Jim's check, and reports of little Jim—impersonal, yet rather vivid reports. Not that she had ever read them herself, but big Jim always told her what was in those letters.

This one he wanted her to read.

Little Jim's mother was to be married again; would big Jim mind taking the boy for a few weeks in September?

"Well?" Big Jim's eyes were upon her.

"Of course," she answered, smiling.

He was Jim's son.

It had been fun fixing up the room for him, planning for him; fun, too, to have him there, his footsteps on the stairs, his young, happy voice. He was a regular boy, lively, frank, interested in everything. But he had been well trained, Beth had to admit; for the most part, he minded well. Jim was very happy. At night, he went up-stairs and sat on the edge of his son's bed, and talked to him. On Saturday afternoons they played ball together in the back yard, and Beth, coming to the kitchen door, smiled, as she watched and listened to their joyous voices.

If only he had not talked quite so much about his mother! They could not tell him not to. He did it very naturally, taking it for granted they were interested, giving details of his past life, rather cluttered details—an apartment in Boston, his grandparents' farm, summer hotels, his mother's friends.

If only, too, he had looked like his father! It had taken Beth a little while to get over the shock of her first sight of him. She had pictured him as a miniature Jim, fair-haired, broad-shouldered. Instead, he was dark and slim. No one would have picked him out for Jim's son.

"Yes; looks like his mother," was Jim's laconic comment when she questioned him.

Up to that time she had never thought very much about the other woman in Jim's life. But now, with little Jim there, she could almost picture her: slim, dark eyes, her head held high, sure of herself, and her charm.

Then had come the second letter. Little Jim's mother's husband was an engineer. They were going to South America—no place for a boy—climate—would big Jim take the boy and keep him indefinitely?

Their eyes met over that letter.

"It will be nice to have a kid in that room," said big Jim.

And Beth smiled. She was thinking: "His mother has given him up; she's gone; he'll be our child now."

But he wasn't. He loved big Jim, she was sure of that, but herself—? She had tried hard, very hard to win his affection, to get close to him. She had listened to his talk about school, had asked him questions about his play and "the boys," but she had never got beyond that cool, calculating look in his brown eyes. To him, she was just the person who lived in the house with his father and himself, who cooked for them, and who, unfortunately, delivered commands as to the brushing of teeth, and washing of hands. And always, always—"My mother." . . . "My mother."

BETH gave a little cry and raised her shoulders as if to ward off a blow.

The door into the kitchen opened.

"Why, hullo, honey," big Jim's voice rang out. "What's up? The door closed? No wife to meet me at the door?"

She hurried over to kiss him, smiling quickly.

"I was just busy with dinner. I didn't hear you come in."

But he peered into her face.

"Everything all right? Kid been good to-day?"

"Oh, yes," she said quickly, desperately. "He's been fine."

For a moment big Jim said nothing, his eyes upon her, searching. Then gently he pushed her out of the kitchen.

"You go in there and finish setting the table. I'll cook the chops. You're tired, and it's close in this kitchen."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

That evening, while Jim was up-stairs with his boy, she sat in the living-room, trying to read. But their two voices came to her plainly through the open door of the bedroom, down the stairs and through the wide double doors from the hall into the living-room. She could hear big Jim's low rumbling voice, then little Jim's laughter. She felt shut out, and alien. Slowly her book dropped to her lap.

She took it up quickly when she heard big Jim close the boy's door. Smiling, he came running down the stairs.

As he entered the room, she looked up at him, smiling too. But there was something in her eyes that made his smile fade. Gently he took her book from her hand, sat down in the big chair and pulled her onto his lap.

"NOW," he said, "tell me all about it."

"Oh, Jim, it isn't anything, really. I just got a little tired to-day."

"Yes; it is something. I can tell by looking at you—something about the boy. What's he done? Please tell me, darling."

She looked down, playing with a button of his vest. "It really isn't anything—it's sort of foolish—but sometimes I just can't help wishing he wouldn't talk quite so much about her."

There was a little silence, then Jim spoke gently. "Well, she's his mother, dear. And he's knocked about quite a bit for an eight-year-old—she's always on the move; he's seen lots of people and lived different places, and I suppose he's come to cling to her, perhaps, more than some other children might. It's only natural."

"Oh, yes, I know it is!" she cried. "It isn't that so much. It's—it's—" She grasped the lapels of his coat convulsively. "I never used to think about her—and now, now—with him, talking and talking, I can't help thinking and remembering. She's his mother and he's your son! And when you go up-stairs at night with him, I feel so shut out—"

He held her tight. "Shut out? You from me? Darling—as if you ever could be! You mustn't brood about her. That's all over, long ago. She hasn't been anything to me for years, and you—you're everything—everything in life!" His voice rang out passionately. There was a silence before he went on, "As for Jim—he's seen me before; he feels as if he knew me. He's a rather reserved sort of kid. He likes you, but you're still a little strange. As soon as he gets to know you better— His Christmas vacation will be starting soon, and he'll be home more and you'll see more of him; and then there'll be Christmas—Christmas, darling, with a kid in the house!"

Beth smiled. Jim was so dear and understanding and patient. She must be patient too, and understanding too. She must remember how hard it would be for a little boy to be suddenly thrown into a new home with a new mother. She must be content to wait. Jim was probably right: when the boy knew her better he would come to love her, he would be her child, too.

Christmas, as Jim had said, seemed to bring them all closer. She and Jim had such fun sitting together in the evening and planning little Jim's presents and the tree. And little Jim consulted her about the present for his father, and when they went shopping together asked her advice about the cuff links. After they were bought, he insisted on her letting him go off by himself.

She waited, her heart light, by the door of the big department store until he returned, coming toward her through the crowd, a little important, self-conscious look on his face, clutching tight in his hand a small, square package. She smiled, thinking it was his present for her.

But it wasn't. The next day she came upon him, trying with painstaking but clumsy fingers to do up the parcel in wrapping paper. Eyes earnest, face flushed, he looked up at her:

"I can't seem to do it!"

His face was worried, appealing, and the impulse swept over her to put her arms around him and kiss his flushed cheeks. She had never made any display of affection toward him, always those cool eyes had repulsed her, but now— She took a step forward, then—

"It's for my mother," he said. "I want it to get there. It's beads. My mother likes beads."

Without a word she took the package, folded the paper, knotted the string. He gave a little sigh of relief and stood there close beside her, watching.

Christmas Day itself was a very joyful occasion. Big Jim was gay and laughing, and Beth smiled at his joy, smiled at little Jim's excitement, and smiled too at the bright-colored pincushion he had picked out for her.

"I thought you'd like it," he explained. "You can put it on your bureau."

Yet it seemed to her that he was most pleased over his present from his mother, an elaborate train of cars.

"Look at what my mother gave me!" he cried more than once. "All the way from South America! My mother always gives me grand presents."

DURING vacation Beth saw a lot of the boy. He was in and out of the house, and she talked to him about his school, his books, the comparative merits of "Treasure Island" and "Swiss Family Robinson."

The day the snow came she even went out in the afternoon, after the storm was over, and played snowballs with him. The sun came out from beneath the clouds and under its rays the snow glistened. Little Jim's cheeks were red, and he laughed, his eyes bright, warm. She laughed too, and chased him down the half-clear walk. Then he chased her, pelting her with snow.

"Gee!" he said, as he came alongside, "you can't run at all. Why, my mother—"

Beth's laughter died.

"And she can dance too. You ought to see her. Sometimes at the hotel she'd let me stay up a little while and watch."

Beth hardly heard. The sun had vanished behind the houses. The snow had lost its sparkle; it seemed a dead white pall. She turned away, shivering.

That was the way it went. Whenever it seemed as if she were getting close to little Jim, that mother would rise up between them. She was everywhere, everywhere—slim, dark, lovely, mocking. She even rose up to defend him from discipline, to ward off disagreeable duties.

"Jim, wash your face for supper, as well as your hands."

"But it'll just get dirty again. My mother never made me wash my face."

"Well, you don't want him to forget his mother, do you?" was big Jim's comment, when she told him how omnipresent was that mother.

"No, I don't," she answered. "But sometimes, Jim, I can't help thinking that he talks that way on purpose to annoy me."

"Oh, kids!" Big Jim shrugged his shoulders. "They say the first thing that comes into their minds. They don't mean anything. He'll get over it. I'll give him a talking-to."

"But he minds you without being talked to," she retorted. "He's all right when you're around. It's only me—"

Big Jim was silent, then he gave a little sigh:

"I wish you wouldn't take things quite so personally, dear. He's like all little boys. He doesn't mean anything. But you're so sensitive; you're reading things into what he says and does; you're just ready to be hurt."

"Well, I can't help it!" she flung back at him. "I am what I am, and I've done my best for your son—done everything I could."

"Oh, I know you have, dear," his arms went around her quickly. "It's been hard to have an eight-year-old kid just thrown at you like that, and you've done wonderfully. I was just thinking of you. I don't want you to get all worked up over things, and hurt." His eyes were worried and in his voice was a little weary note.

Her flare of anger died away.

"Oh, Jim," she cried, "I try not to. He's a dear boy, and I know he does not mean to hurt me."

After she was in bed that night, she lay awake thinking of that look in Jim's eyes, that note in his voice. A queer feeling of fear swept over her. She and Jim had been so happy, nothing had ever come between them before—would little Jim? . . . "No, no!" she cried in protest.

She tried to put the thought from her, but the next day it kept coming back.

"Don't be foolish, Beth," she told herself. "Of course nothing can happen. Naturally, it's sort of hard for Jim not to have you get along so well with his son. But he's right. It's all your fault. Little Jim doesn't mean anything. He's just a regular boy—a dear boy, and you love him."

Yes, she did love him. He came in for lunch, flushed, excited, his eyes bright, and as he sat across from her at the table he told her about the snow house that he and the other boys were making. And she smiled at him.

BUT the next day little Jim refused to come to lunch when she called him.

He and the other boys were still busy with their snow caves. She stood shivering on the edge of the sidewalk, her bare hands shoved into the cuffs of her coat. He did not pause in his shoveling.

"I don't want to come now," nonchalantly he threw the remark over his shoulder. She could see his bent, supple figure. "I'm not hungry. My mother doesn't make me eat when I'm not hungry."

Beth turned and walked away, back up the path and into the house. She was trembling, trembling with anger. Behind her she heard laughter, and she could almost feel the mocking voice of that slim, dark woman.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She watched the two figures trudging off together—father and son

That afternoon she would not let Jim go out to play. Calmly, coldly, she told him her reason. She took him down-town with her when she did her marketing, and many times during the walk she wished she had not tried to enforce discipline. At first he sulked; then he grew talkative, criticizing the food she was buying. It was as if he were bent on punishing her for punishing him.

"Well, naturally, he was mad about it," she told herself at home in the kitchen, getting dinner. "Naturally, he wanted to play with the boys."

But somehow she could not get away from the idea that there was an imp within him, spurring him on—a slim, dark-eyed woman imp. He seemed no longer a boy, Jim's son, but an enemy, an enemy bent on hurting her, an enemy whom she must conquer.

"Will you please get out of this kitchen." Her voice was crisp and cool and well-controlled. "I'm busy. Your father will be here soon. Go and wash your face and hands."

After he had gone, she stood in the middle of the kitchen floor: "I can't stand it! I can't!"

"Everything all right to-day?" asked big Jim as he came in the door.

"Oh, yes," she lied desperately, and her heart smote her at (Continued on page 170)

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

I Don't Know What Happened At These Séances

But something did and, even after thirty years of scientific study, I cannot explain the strange phenomena to my own satisfaction—I can only report, as I do in this article, what I have seen and heard

By Hamlin Garland

FOR more than seventy years the scientific method has been applied to the study of mediumistic phenomena, and learned men and societies are still debating whether such phenomena are wholly, or only partly, imaginary. Therefore I shall not begin by promising a solution to this problem. I shall only report, with as little prejudice as possible, the facts as they have met me in the course of a personal investigation extending over more than thirty years.

Part of my study of psychic phenomena has been as an officer of a psychical society, but for many years I have investigated as an individual, and (so far as possible) I have dealt with non-professional mediums. What I shall say here in no way involves the American Society for Psychical Research, although I am at the present time chairman of its Research Committee. This article reflects my personal opinion only.

I came into this field of investigation in 1890, when, as a man of thirty, I was invited by the directors of the American Society for Psychical Research, of Boston, to become one of their number. I was at once appointed to act with Amos E. Dolbeare, professor of physics at Tufts College (and author of several books on matter and motion), as a special committee to study the physical phenomena of mediumship.

One of the directors of the society told me that he had urged my election because I was a young man with a taste for scientific reading, and it remains to say that I went into the work with an open mind. I approached the problem gravely, but in no sense solemnly. I was not bereaved. It was not a religion. It was, with me, a problem of "unexplored biology." I was curious to know whether the human organism had unknown forces which could, at certain times and under certain conditions, upset all the known laws of the physical world. I wanted to know, as Dolbeare quaintly expressed it, "whether a particle of matter could be moved from A to B without a known push or pull. We'll stump the spirits or they'll stump us."

We were both "stumped" by a gentle little woman who offered herself to our tests with most praiseworthy confidence. "You may handcuff me or you may put me into an iron cage," she said quietly. "All I ask of you is that you follow the advice of my guides while I am in a trance."

This psychic (who had already mystified me by causing a closed piano to play while my hand was on the lid) readily consented to sit with us in Dolbeare's own library, with conditions entirely our own. We came to the test with keenest interest. At the sitting which I am about to describe, no other persons were present but Dolbeare, Mrs. Dolbeare, and myself.

With all our wits about us, we set to work to prevent any deception on the part of the psychic. In those days, women wore long sleeves tight at the wrist, and our first precaution was to nail the psychic's wrist bands to the oaken arm of her chair. I then passed around each sleeve a loop in the middle of a long tape, and Mrs. Dolbeare stitched it fast with strong thread. I put a long tack down through this doubled tape and the psychic's sleeve, and hammered it home. We then carried the end of the tape away from the chair and nailed it to the floor. Mrs. Dolbeare tied the ankles of the psychic with a similar tape, and the ends were carried to a point several feet behind her chair, and stoutly nailed to the floor.

NOT content with this, Dolbeare then suggested tacking the hem of the psychic's skirt to the floor. This we did, using ten or more tacks. To make still more improbable any undetected movement on the part of our prisoner, we ran a silk thread about her wrists and passed it under the arm of her chair. While Dolbeare held the spool of this thread, I took the other end and, looping it around my little finger, kept the tip of my first finger on the taut thread. It was absolutely impossible for the psychic to move without causing a tremor in the thread.

As a final indignity, Dolbeare pinned a spread newspaper over her knees, so that if she moved it would crackle. On a small table before the psychic we then placed a tin trumpet or cone, some pencils and paper. The windows were already darkened, and as we took our seats Dolbeare turned the light nearly out. Mrs. Dolbeare sat at the end of the table opposite to the medium; Dolbeare was at her left and I at her right. "Now," said Dolbeare grimly, "let things happen."

They did! First of all, after a period of moaning and sighing, the psychic apparently died. She made no slightest sound. In this profound silence, and while my thread remained without movement, the cone rocked on its base, rose in the air, and a man's voice came from it.

Thereafter, for three hours, we were in constant intercourse with two of the psychic "guides." One of these was a solemn professor, but the other, a younger man, was a good deal of a "cut-up." They both professed the greatest desire to coöperate with us in proving the genuineness of the mediumship, and readily responded to all of our requests.

In order to make it still plainer that the trumpet was not handled by the medium, I asked the guide to place the large end of it over my right ear, the ear entirely out of reach of the psychic. This was done. I then asked "it" to reverse the cone and to touch me on the right nostril with the small end of the trumpet. This was done with such precision that it was like a caressing touch. Dolbeare then held up his fist, and said, "Tap me on the knuckle." This was done without a moment's hesitation.

We heard a rustling along the bookshelves behind the psychic and, following that, two or more books were dropped on the table without disturbing the trumpet, which had been returned to its position. Several more books were brought. From my seat I could see hands dimly at work over the table, and at my request the "spirit" held up a book and thumbed it so that I could see his hands against the light. As a still more convincing test, he presented both his hands with the tips of the fingers toward the psychic. These hands were large and about three feet from the face of the psychic. During all this time, our threads remained undisturbed, although the table was shaken and moved toward Mrs. Dolbeare. No movement could be detected in the psychic's knees. The paper made no outcry, the thread remained unmoved.

IN THE midst of these baffling physical phenomena we held intelligent discourse with the elder "spirit" and listened to a series of jokes and stories by the younger one, who told us his name and where he had "passed out." He said, "I was a soldier in the Civil War." "On which side?" I asked. He laughed, and hesitated a little: "Reckon I'd better not tell you that." "Never mind; the war is over," I urged. He then told us his rank in the Confederate service, where he had served, and where he had been wounded.

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Meanwhile, the psychic remained as one dead, and Mrs. Dolbeare began to be alarmed about her. At last we turned on the light.

We found her exactly as we had left her. Not a tack was disturbed, and, in further proof, the thread was so deeply sunk in her wrists that we experienced some difficulty in getting a knife under it. She was in collapse. Her pulse was almost imperceptible, and her breathing so faint that I could feel it only when I put my ear close to her lips. She came back to life slowly. It was more than half an hour before she was recovered sufficiently to allow Mrs. Dolbeare to lead her from the room.

As I closed the door after her, I turned to Dolbeare and banteringly said, "Well, Professor, what are you going to say about that?"

He was busily examining the rings which he had chalked on the floor about the legs of the chair and table. The chair had not moved a hair line, but the table had been shoved away from the psychic a foot or more. Ten or twelve books lay piled upon the table and several messages had been written on the pad. We had not imagined that part of the performance.

Looking up at me with an expression of profound bewilderment, Dolbeare replied, "I don't know what to say about it. I guess I won't say anything about it for the present."

Nearly twenty years afterward, when my own psychic book, "The Shadow World" was being reviewed, he wrote to me to say, "I am just as much mystified now as I was then."

ONE of the facts which most strongly impressed both Dolbeare and myself in this (and in subsequent sittings) was the almost unerring precision manifested by the hands of the "guides." Through all similar experiments during many years this amazing power to "see" in deep darkness has been a never-failing puzzle. It does not clarify the situation to say that the psychic frees herself, for the swiftness and precision of the guide's movement is like that of an X-ray.

In many experiments in recent years, I have verified over and over again the power of the psychic guides to name small objects in the dark, to locate each member of the circle, and to indicate the position on the floor of the fallen trumpet or cone. Seemingly, darkness is no bar to their perception.

For example: one of the most inexplicable of all my experiences came in the midst of a series of sittings which I was having with a psychic in a Western city. I was being assisted by my friend, Henry B. Fuller, the novelist, and we were receiving "messages" on closed slates in our own hands, in a sunny room at about eleven o'clock in the morning—certain bars of music—which were being set down by the alleged spirit of a dead composer, a dear friend of mine.

The psychic, a woman still on the pleasant side of life, was sitting on the opposite side of the table with her hands folded in her lap. She didn't appear to be very much interested in our experiment. Her mouth was closed in a slightly smiling line and, so far as I could detect, her lips and throat were without motion—and yet a voice, apparently coming from a point above her head and a little to the right, was speaking to us—telling us what "it" wished done with the music "it" was putting on the closed slates. It was a whispered half-tone, but it had curious resemblance to my dead friend's manner of speech.

PHOTOGRAPH BY PIRIE MAC DONALD

Hamlin Garland, one of America's best known novelists and short-story writers, was born in Wisconsin in 1860. He spent his early years on the farm, but shortly after he was twenty he began to write. Since then he has written more than a score of books, including "Main Traveled Roads," "Her Mountain Lover," "The Captain of the Gray Horse Troop," and "A Son of the Middle Border." Mr. Garland's present home is in New York City

AT ONE point, this voice said: "Fuller, that is not right. The eighth note in that last bar should be a sixteenth note. Try again."

Closing the slates, which were of the flexible sort for school use, I placed them between Fuller and myself. The psychic sat at ease on the other side of the table. She seemed to consider this beyond her comprehension. She did not touch the slates at any time after we began to get the music.

Upon opening the slates, I found that a small white flag had been added to the stem of the note in question, changing it into a sixteenth note. The little flag had been put exactly on the right spot.

"Now draw a line below the staff," said the voice. We did so, and again I laid the folded slates in my own lap. In the same mysterious manner a needed note was placed exactly on this line. In this way, we received several bars of a very strange and lovely melody, which the composer repeatedly asked Fuller to try out upon the piano. Some of it was so technical that I, like the psychic, remained a mere onlooker. However, the precision of the process was within my powers of appreciation. It appeared that darkness and the closed slates were no barrier to the manifesting intelligence, and yet a very curious interruption took place:

While Fuller (Continued on page 142)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

High Water

By Archibald Rutledge

DRAWINGS BY LYNN BOGUE HUNT

ONE day I set out for a big hunt, my only companion being a negro woodsman with whom I've enjoyed a sporting comradeship since boyhood days. Our hunting ground was to be on the great delta of the Santee, in South Carolina. A high flood had inundated the country. A day of rare sport was promised us. But to cross the Santee in flood is to take a chance.

When we were half way across the stormy and treacherous river, I reached back for my gun, though I did not turn to look back. When one feels in a dangerous position, the eyes in the back of his head begin to function; at least, I felt sure that my good negro boatman needed help. And a man can do something with the stock of a gun, properly wielded as a paddle. But my weapon was not in its familiar place, along the gunwale. As the business of shifting my weight in the tippy craft was perilous, I sat still until the canoe finally slithered through the yellow marsh that fringed the farther side of the river. Here, beside a broad raft of dead sedge, drifted tight against a canebrake, we came to a halt. I then looked back at my boatman.

"The gun, Prince—where is it?" I asked. "I told you to put it in. You surely haven't forgotten it, have you?"

When a negro is guilty, his expression, instead of being one of contrition, is usually only one of amused bashfulness.

"I is fergit," he confessed.

Here, indeed, was a pretty situation! The wide Santee was in flood. Ten or fifteen square miles of delta country were submerged. The vast swamp to northward was deeply invaded by the stealing tide. Thousands of wi'd creatures, I knew, were marooned on the tiny islets, on the stumps, on the trash piles, in the swaying tops of drowning bushes. The ancient and inscrutable swamp had at last been forced to yield all its mysteries. A man with a gun paddling about in a boat could take choice toll of the hordes of fugitives. But the weapon had been left at home.

I had leaned my gun against a tree by the back door, and had told Prince to put it in the boat. He had promised; but his mind was somewhat distracted by the sickness of two of his younger children; as a result, we found ourselves weaponless on the wrong side of the river. The gun was at home, miles away, across a fairly desperate stretch of water. . . . Before us was the strange drowned delta country, always a fascinating region because of its almost prehistoric wildness—and now superbly so because of this primeval disaster to its inhabitants. The deluge had recurred. Such a catastrophe divulges blankly the creepers and the crawlers, the insidious crafty ones, the skulkers and the dodgers—not to mention myriads of less serpentine behavior.

THE river that we had just crossed looked entirely too threatening to recross for the sake of a gun. Not only was it menacing because of the affluent rupture of its powerful tides, ramping in barbarous abandon to the sea, but also because it was wildly freighted with huge snaggly trees, ponderous cypress—timbers, monster yellow-pine logs—runaways from lumber camps in the swamp to northward. A good ram from any one of these would make a canoe look as if somebody had spilled a box of matches.

But why, I wondered, shouldn't I take advantage of the situation to observe the distracted wild life without harming it? Why shouldn't Prince and I make a day of it, after all? How did these creatures really manage in such an urgent case? Were there among them genuine heroes and heroines, daring hearts, philosophers, cravens? Well, I shall try to tell you exactly what we saw on that wonderful day; and by recounting as simply and as clearly as I can what Prince and I observed of the conduct of these refugees from the flood, I hope to be able to share with you some of the vivid enjoyment of what was really my most exciting and unusual outing.

MY BOATMAN agreed to my suggestion: the sentiment of it had an appeal for him. The negro's understanding of animals is profound, almost occult; and my aid on this occasion was a man who, from the time when both of us were boys, had taught me many a lesson in wood lore.

The very first refugee we saw repaid us for our crossing of the dangerous river. The marvel of her really got me. That sounds romantic, I know. But of all wild mothers that have ever come under my observation, she was the finest and the ugliest. This fugitive from the flood was a full-blooded wild razorback—all bone and bristles and lean bacon. Her snout was so long and sharp that it gave her the appearance of smoking a pipe. Her sides were plainly slatted. Her ensemble was, for all her uncouthness, indescribably fierce. Her startling fringe of bristles was a sort of menacing triumph. Formidable indeed, she looked—morose and vindictive—standing gingerly there on a sodden log, wedged precariously by the freshet-tide into the low crotch of a water oak.

Brush and sedge and the tree's limbs had made a tremulous islet that swayed in the rushing waters. Behind her, under her, quaking in the shelter of her mighty flanks, were her little ones—nine of them. She could easily save herself. But she would not leave them to perish. I wondered much what would now happen. These hogs, you understand, were perfectly wild; therefore we approached behind a fringe of cypresses, in order to watch their natural behavior.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Knowing that the old mother could swim miles to safety, I made up my mind to save at least some of the pigs. They were only about two or three weeks old; and in their present situation they looked to me doomed. . . . But perhaps no living thing is doomed as long as it has a mother.

YOU really ought to have seen this one. The waters were fast rising. The old savage creature knew well that she and her trembling brood must soon be dislodged from their quaking, frail support. About a half-mile away, across a clear stretch of water, there was some high ground known as the Pine Ridge. I saw her looking at it. She was appraising the risk incurred to reach it. She had, I knew, determined to swim to the Ridge. But she wasn't going alone! Lowering her hideous, formidable head, she tenderly nuzzled the pigs, one by one. To them she grunted deep and placid reassurance. She kept nudging them until all of them were in a huddle.

Then suddenly I saw her plunge off the log into the stormy tide. About thirty feet she swam—fiercely and with head high, as a hog always swims; then she headed around, and in a few moments had returned to the log. She climbed it, streaming. As surely as I was watching her, I believe that she was instructing her babies as to how the thing was to be done; and she was showing them how easy it was. Again she took gentle counsel with her nursery.

Slowly now, and with infinite caution and patience, she herded them down toward the water. She was actually in it, among the stranded sedges, for a moment or two, before she was satisfied that all her brood were with her. Then, grunting easily, very slowly she began to swim. She didn't swim like a hog; for she was now the solicitous mother. All her tiny pigs were in the lee of her great flank. Seeing to it that they started on that side, she broke the current for them, and they swam as if they were in a backwater. She did not appear to be trying to save her own life, but theirs. It was a beautiful sight to watch—that grim old monster mothering her babies across that stormy tide! Self-preservation is said to be the first law of nature. But from the operation of that law shall we not have to make an exception of mothers?

An hour later Prince and I found our gallant old sea-going heroine on the Pine Ridge. She had every little pig safely with her. I looked with genuine admiration at the gaunt, grim creature; but Prince, remembering his empty smokehouse, regarded her with an economic, languishing glance.

A somewhat similar evidence of a wild mother's crafty solicitude I saw one day in the pinelands near home. I was on a deer-stand, and heard a great outcry in a small thicket near me. One member of the oncoming pack of deer hounds had encountered an old razorback sow; and within a few moments the traveling circus, heading my way, came into full view. The old mother had with her five tiny pigs. Close behind this semi-wild family the hound bawled—eager to close with his apparent game, yet seemingly wishing for his comrades to join him, so that the contest would not be too unequal. Deciding to interfere, I stepped forward and drove the hound back into the deer thicket. Then followed a very pretty and amusing sight.

THE razorback eyed me with hardly any less scornful apprehension than she had manifested toward the hound. She faced me truculently, champing her lantern jaws. But I knew that all her savagery was but the sword and shield of her heart's affection.

Quietly I withdrew, watching her. Feeling that she was fairly safe from her two enemies, she began to give a series of peculiar grunts. At the first of these, the tiny pigs behaved as if they had been acted upon by magic. They suddenly ranged themselves in single file in front of the mother; then, at another grunt, they broke into a full run. The five were in perfect line, about two feet apart; each had his tail screwed up tightly on his back; each behaved as if he had suddenly been wired for.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The strange part about it was the fact that these babies led, with amazing certainty and celerity, this elfin escape. The grim old mother, merely by trotting along, could keep up with her infants' flight. She kept up her admonitory grunts, and they got the full meaning of her message. She sent them ahead, of course, so that she could cover their flight. She was the rear guard.

A FLOOD makes strange bedfellows. However high a freshet may rise, there is always dry footing on the Pine Ridge of the delta. And the great community of the wild knows this. This long sandy elevation is almost bare, and it has a giant pine sentineling its northern end. Certain bushes give a sparse undergrowth; but this is kept severely down by the myriads of refugees that overrun it in time of high waters.

In order to get an idea of their heterogeneous character, and also to estimate the number, I had my negro put me off at the southern point, directing him to paddle to the Lone Pine, and then push the canoe along the edge, driving the fugitives before him. At this particular time the ridge was exposed for three hundred yards, and for some fifty yards across. I could see a confusion of creatures from my stand; and as Prince moved down alongside the ridge, these took shape and identity.

Of course the first thing to appear was a wild turkey. This great bird is supersensitive to inspection; and while raccoons snooze unconcernedly in the face of danger, and while deer pause curiously to look back, a wild turkey, exercising the occult art of shadowy avoidance, slips away. I once heard an old woodsman declare: "When a wild turkey says, 'Put! Put!' he's serving you notice that he's going to quit the world!" Surely, when it comes to a sleight-of-foot vanishing act, this splendid bird has no equal.

My turkey, coming down the ridge, was alarmed; therefore, he had drawn himself up very erect, and his form was slim and trim. His matchless eyes searched avidly for the slightest movement that would betray the presence of the enemy. I was standing against a black stump—which afforded me less effacement than it would have afforded a man of my paddler's complexion—and delicately toward me the wild bird came. His neck shed iridescent colors; and from his wings and back rippled and waved away a bronze sheen. He was far ahead of anything else on the Ridge. Silently, gorgeously, he came stealing along.

He was within thirty yards of me when I must have made a slight movement; a wild thing nearly always identifies a man by sound or scent or movement—seldom by recognition. Without the least hesitancy, the mighty bird, after a little run, took wing, rising until he was seventy or eighty feet above the yellow freshet-tide. He was heading for the far-off mainland, more than a mile away. His flight was so superb and swift that I knew he would be there in less than two minutes.

I have timed turkeys flying down a mountainside, and have found them "doing" a little better than a mile a minute. In straight flight, as nearly as I have been able to estimate, after a turkey gets fairly started, he does not go at a rate less than forty miles an hour. . . . But in making such a hazard, I always recall, by way of reservation, a wise saying of one of my old woodsmen-friends:

"How fast does a wild turkey fly?" he repeated, before answering my question. "That depends on what's after him, and how close to him it is."

BY THE time the wild turkey had disappeared, down the ridge came the razorback family already mentioned, and with them a mincing doe! Quaint troops of swamp-rabbits moved down the ridge—most of them employing the rabbit's peculiar method of sly advance. He will be crouched, let us say hunched up. Sedulously he will extend his forefeet to the limit of his reach, resting them gently on the ground; then, for all the world like a measuring-worm, he will draw his body up to his forefeet. I had often seen a rabbit perform this sort of maneuver, especially when stealing silently in or out of a thicket. But I had never seen the thing done in concert before; it seemed that a procession of accordions was approaching. The impression that it gave was very odd—as if some dim rite were being performed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

After the animals came birds—woodcock and Wilson snipe, flying and lighting down—king-rails walking. The woodcock behaved like proud little turkey-gobblers. I saw several of them strut, with wings lowered and fan tails spread.

When Prince came within sight, I motioned him away from the Ridge, as I didn't want the fugitives driven into the water. He fetched a semicircle and picked me up. But even while I was waiting for him to come, I saw approaching a visitor whose presence every refugee except two would dread—these two being the deer and the hog. This new voyager was a rattlesnake, an old inhabitant of the moldering swamp that was now flooded. Superbly he swam; indeed, there's hardly a more expert swimmer. I noticed that his sheaf of rattles was held high above the water—to keep the sinister chime dry, of course. I have never yet seen a rattlesnake swimming that he did not have his rattles out. His head, too, will be somewhat elevated.

An aquatic creature often behaves like a submarine, showing now the periscope, now the turret, now the back—now nothing. A land creature that is forced to swim always seems to elevate as much of himself as possible.

LEAVING the Ridge, we paddled up to a small bushy-headed cypress, among the limbs of which my paddler had located an acquaintance. Snoozing serenely among the branches, utterly oblivious to the world and the "thousand natural shocks that flesh is heir to" was an old raccoon. Early in life the 'coon becomes a philosopher; and he has a calm acceptance of things that reminds one of Kipling's requirement for a man:

If you can meet with Triumph and Disaster,
And treat those two impostors just the same . . .

Here, indeed, was ample cause for excitement, for haste, for frantic effort. But a raccoon prefers to amble, to snooze, to insinuate his indolent, genial way through the world.

As we approached them, most of the fugitives from this flood fixed upon us their beady black eyes, or their liquid, imploring ones. But this fellow was profoundly, absurdly asleep. I told Prince to lift him into the boat.

Holding a cypress limb with one hand, Prince took the sleeper by the scruff of the neck with the other. There was no wild struggle, no hectic awakening. The 'coon complained drowsily, and seemed intent upon maintaining that snuggly position into which he had been curled. The only thing which really appeared to perturb him was the fact that we were arresting his slumbers.

In the bottom of the canoe the raccoon curled himself, there to resume his dreamful ecstasy. What did he care about men and floods? When I touched him, he drawled amiably and luxuriously, for all the world like a boy who is an adept at pulling the covers (Continued on page 120)

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

That Tired Feeling And How To Get Rid Of It

An interview with Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, medical director of the famous Battle Creek Sanitarium

By Albert Edward Wiggam

MY DOCTOR says I need a tonic. It seems as if I cannot get over this tired feeling."

"I'm so tired. I feel as if I never would get rested again. I think I shall have to take a vacation."

"I wake up so tired. I simply can't start the day until I get my cup of coffee and a cigar."

It occurred to me recently that I had been hearing these plaintive exclamations for many years. I had heard them in offices, banks, boards of directors meetings, sales conventions, church conferences, women's clubs, department stores, in factories and machine shops, and even on farms. I had heard them from office workers, executives, lawyers, men and women of leisure, preachers, schoolteachers, and, strangest of all, from doctors.

What struck me suddenly one day was that some of these people work very hard, while others, who say they are equally tired, do not work at all. "Must be something besides work," I thought. "I wonder what it is."

After casting about in my mind among scientific men who might answer this question, I wired my friend, Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, medical director of the Battle Creek Sanitarium:

I want to interview you on why the tired business man and woman are tired.

At once he replied:

Come ahead. I think I can tell you. We have treated thousands of them. We have several hundred here now.

I found the doctor, at the age of seventy-five, making big plans, as usual, for the future. Before we began talking he showed me a new three-million-dollar wing which was being added to what was already the largest sanitarium in the world. He pointed out that they were equipping this building with the new glass which admits the ultra-violet ray, which is shut out by our ordinary window glass.

Then he took me for a short drive into the country, where he showed me a tract of several hundred acres of primitive forest land, which he had recently purchased for a wild-life preserve and bird sanctuary, to be used in connection with the biological department of Battle Creek College, of which the doctor is the chief promoter.

On returning from the drive, the doctor lay down on a comfortable sofa, and for six hours without interruption we talked about the causes of fatigue, chronic tired feeling, nervous exhaustion, and the like.

"I think better lying down," said Doctor Kellogg. "The prone position relieves tension and enables me to concentrate better. Besides, in the horizontal position the brain receives more blood than when standing. Since I work all the time when I am not asleep, I find it worth while to practice even small economies in energy conservation.

"You ask me to tell you what makes the tired business man tired. There are so many different kinds of tired business men, and women too, and there are so many things to cause fatigue in our complex life that it is difficult to know where to begin. We have treated nearly two hundred thousand persons here since I organized the Battle Creek Sanitarium, fifty-one years ago, and I should say one

PHOTOGRAPH BY CHAS. W. YOUNG

Dr. John Harvey Kellogg, head of the famous Battle Creek Sanitarium. Doctor Kellogg was graduated from Bellevue as a doctor in 1875. He is the inventor of many improved appliances for medical and surgical purposes, and has written extensively in the field of dietetics, his books including "New Dietetics" and "The Natural Diet of Man." Doctor Kellogg was born in Tyrone, Michigan, in 1852. When he was four years old his parents moved to Battle Creek, which has been his home ever since

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

fourth of them were tired business men and another fourth tired women. They range all the way from those fighting a tendency to lie down and surrender, to those suffering from so-called nervous and mental exhaustion.

"AFTER studying these tired people with great care for many years, I am convinced that these tired people are seldom tired through overwork.

"Oh, yes, they are really tired, and they think they are overworked. Work is a convenient and dignified alibi for our bad habits. But work usually has nothing whatsoever to do with the weariness of which these people complain. A man working eight or even ten hours a day, unless he expends his energy in a most violent manner, cannot possibly be permanently tired from that cause. Even football players are usually restored by a single night's rest. Woodchoppers, blacksmiths, and men doing other heavy manual labor go on year after year performing an enormous amount of work without this permanent exhaustion."

"But, Doctor Kellogg," I interjected, "the tired business man claims it is mental work."

"That is another alibi," replied the doctor. "The popular notion is that mental work is very exhausting. But observations made by Doctor Benedict, of the Carnegie Nutrition Laboratory, of Boston show that even in severe mental work the actual expenditure of energy is so small that it is difficult to measure it with the most exact scientific instruments.

"The real reason why so many business men think they are working hard is because they find it so difficult to work. They find concentration difficult; they cannot make decisions about important matters, large or small. Do you know why it is extremely hard to make up your mind firmly when you are tired? The reason is that your brain cells are intoxicated. Your memory cells are drugged with poisons. This intoxication of the brain cells is just as real as that produced by alcohol or any other drug."

"But once again, Doctor Kellogg," I remarked, "your tired business men or women say they are suffering from nervous exhaustion."

"Just another alibi," said the doctor. "'Nervous exhaustion' sounds so fine, so respectable, so important. Why, it is practically impossible to exhaust a nerve by work! Experiments have been tried of stimulating a nerve to react by electricity or other means, and after thousands of stimulations it is still almost as efficient as at first. But if you apply to it a solution of fatigue poisons, such as the products of food putrefaction, no amount of stimulation will make it react normally.

"This so-called nervous exhaustion, tired nerves, neurasthenia, or whatever you like to call it, is rarely real nerve exhaustion; it is nerve poisoning, auto-intoxication, or self-intoxication.

"Now, the first question for your tired man to ask himself is this: 'Is the fatigue with which I wake up in the morning, and which I carry around all day, really due to overwork or to some other cause?'

"There are two distinct kinds of tired feelings: First, normal, natural, healthy fatigue induced by actual work; and, second, abnormal, false, unhealthy fatigue that comes from wrong habits of living. You can easily tell which kind you have. If, say, two good nights and a day of rest—for example, from Saturday evening until Monday morning—do not make you feel fit and eager for work, you may be sure it is not honest work-fatigue that you have but false, toxic-fatigue.

"In the latter case a rest will do you little good. Indeed, by decreasing your already sluggish elimination of poisons, rest may make you worse. Nothing will effect a cure except a radical change in your habits.

"For securing this beneficial change, I can outline for you six helpful habits—six methods of fatigue control—which anybody, anywhere, can put into practice. And I know from thousands of successful cases that you can follow these methods of fatigue control with great assurance of complete cure.

"These six fatigue controls are as follows:

1. Maintaining the normal chemical balance
2. Avoiding an excess of protein
3. Promoting elimination
4. Changing the intestinal flora
5. Sunlight (natural and artificial)
6. Physical measures, including posture, exercise, bathing, sleeping, fresh air.

"It is difficult to treat these methods separately, since the body is a unit and they all overlap. But control number one, what is now called the 'chemical balance,' is something rather new in medical science. Everyone has heard, of course, about the need for a balanced diet. But recent laboratory researches have revealed the necessity for another sort of balancing, termed the chemical or acid-base balance. In some respects it is the most important of all.

"IN ORDER to understand what this means, we should first ask, What is fatigue? Why does a muscle get tired when exercised? It is because every movement of a muscle burns up the body fuel and leaves a residue, or ash. This residue is always acid, and causes discomfort, which is nature's warning to rest. The body is an engine; food is its fuel, and these fatigue acids constitute its smoke and ashes. The amount of acid produced in one day by all the external and internal bodily movements is considerable. For instance, a sprinter, running at top speed, produces nearly a half-pint of lactic acid in a minute.

"Unless these poisons are rapidly removed they cause exhaustion. In order to prevent the accumulation of acids, the blood and tissues are slightly alkaline. It is the function of the kidneys to remove acids, and thus maintain this constant alkalinity of the blood stream. The urine of a healthy person should be slightly acid; but I have met with many of these chronically tired persons whose urine was more than fifty times as acid as it should be. How could they help being tired?

"Now, the excess of alkali over acids in the blood is known as the alkaline reserve, and this margin, called the chemical balance, though very small, is of vital importance.

"When there is a normal alkaline reserve, the acid toxins from burned-up food are effectively neutralized; but when the reserve is diminished, we have fatigue, inefficiency, shortness of breath, and other symptoms of auto-intoxication. The chemical balance of chronically tired people is disturbed, and their tissues are full of acid. This condition is known as acidosis.

"Professor Henderson, a physiologist of Boston, has suggested a simple test for finding out for yourself whether acids are in excess. It is to hold your breath as long as you can. A person whose tissues are not poisoned from acids, whose chemical balance is normal, can easily hold his breath forty seconds; but a person whose tissues contain an excess of acids cannot hold his breath much more than twenty, or even less, without great effort; and he becomes short of breath when he exercises."

"WHAT can the tired man do to build up his chemical balance?" I inquired.

"He can do a number of things; but the main thing is careful regulation of his diet. In chemical literature, the alkalis are called bases, so that when we speak of a basic diet, we mean one rich in alkali, or one which will leave an alkaline residue in the blood. Strange to say, acid fruits afford one of the quickest ways to build up the alkali reserve. Most people imagine that in eating acid fruits they are likely to create acidosis. On the contrary, fruits are one of the best cures for this condition.

"The reason is this: There are in foods two kinds of acids: One class consists of acids such as citric, malic, and tartaric—the common acids of fruits. These soon disappear when the fruits are eaten, being oxidized, and thus destroyed, in the body. The other class is made up of inorganic acids which the body cannot oxidize, such as phosphoric, sulphuric and hydrochloric acids, and a few unoxidizable organic acids, such as benzoic, acetic, oxalic, and butyric.

"The acids found in fruits are in combination with the alkalis, soda and potash. When the acid portion is destroyed, the alkali is left, and so the ultimate effect of eating fruit is to increase the alkali of the blood and tissues.

"A good many years ago research work disclosed the fact that most of our vegetable foods, and particularly fruits, with the exception of prunes and cranberries, were powerful agents for lessening the acidity of the urine.

"Most ordinary foods have now been studied, and are classified as alkali-producing or acid-producing.

"If a person has high blood pressure or diseased kidneys, he should eat sparingly of foods with high acidity. And in passing, let me say that a non-acid diet is the best diet for people in middle life—it helps to hold old age at bay. Here is a partial list of acid-producing foods: in the order of their acid content.

Egg yolk	Codfish, salted
Oysters	Beefsteak, round, lean
Beef, round, free from fat	Chicken
	Turkey
Beef, dried	Flour, entire wheat
Oatmeal

"In the following list is found the most basic or alkaline foods in the order of their alkaline content which should be partaken of freely by persons who desire to maintain a (Continued on page 101)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

I USED to be awfully simple when it came to honesty. I actually used to take it for granted that everybody who didn't get sent to prison, was honest. Of course I meant this only in big matters. I've always known that in the smaller things, you had to allow yourself a little leeway. Why, take Mother, for instance; she'll hold up a story while she makes up her mind, for absolute certainty, whether it was Tuesday or Wednesday that it happened, and yet one of the earliest things I remember is her trying to sneak me in on the street car as under six when I was almost eight. Of course if the conductor asked her point-blank, she wouldn't tell a lie, but if he just passed me by she merely felt it was a blessing that I looked so young for my age.

As we all grew older, though, it got harder to draw the line, once you started noticing it at all. In our own young married crowd, for instance.

The Songola agency got out a marvelous new talking machine. The records played much louder, and yet without being the least bit blary, and you didn't have to stop the machine at the end of each one. The demonstrator wanted to give one to Rosie for a couple of days on trial. The new machine cost over three hundred dollars, and Rosie, who has four babies, told the man she'd be as likely to buy a private fire engine. He said that was quite all right, that if she would just let him leave the machine for two days and give her husband, and any of her friends who happened in, a chance to hear it, that would be all he'd ask.

"Of course he thinks once we've had it in the house for two days we won't be able to live without it," Rosie told me; "but it's not my fault that he can't tell I'm strong-minded, just by looking at me. All the time he was setting it up in our living-room, I kept telling him I'd never buy it, so my conscience is clear."

The one night she had it she had us all over and gave a dance. As a matter of fact, that was while young Mrs. Sam Porter was in Montrose, and she really did buy one of the machines from having heard it there at Rosie's, so the demonstrator was well pleased.

Now, this seemed all right; but I couldn't make myself feel that it was quite the same when, a month later, Mrs. Frank Kirsted decided to have a party, and called up the Songola agency and said she was thinking of getting one of their new machines and "would they send one up for a couple of days on trial?"

That started a perfect epidemic of getting things on demonstration. Ruth had a washing machine sent up on trial, and did all her spring blankets. Corinne's mother, who still has Miss Waters come a week, spring and fall, to do her dressmaking, had an electric sewing machine on trial for that week, and then decided that she didn't want it.

Dulcie and I were discussing this one day, and Dulcie said, while she didn't exactly approve of it, she thought it could be worse.

"Why, take Corinne, she's worse," she said. "When

I am positive that a couple from Detroit decided it when the twins happened to be quarreling over

"... Loved I Not

A Dot and

By FANNIE

Illustrated by

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

against the bungalow just because they looked at the cap of a ginger ale bottle and were raising the roof

Honor More"

Will story

KILBOURNE

T. K. Hanna

Corinne was unpacking that dinner set that she sent to Chicago for, the baby knocked two of the cups off the table and broke them. And Corinne sent the pieces right back to the Chicago store with a complaint of the packing. Of course they immediately sent her two new cups. And Corinne was actually proud of herself for being so resourceful. She told everybody about it.

"I'm sure," Dulcie finished disapprovingly, "that if I'd done such a thing I'd at least have been honest enough not to tell anybody."

Then there was Mrs. Long and her brown bread. Nobody in Montrose could make brown bread quite like Mrs. Long's. People always got her to make it for church fairs and the different society suppers and to sell at bazars. People always raved about it, and it gave Mrs. Long quite a little social standing. She would never give anybody her recipe.

A lot of people would have given a good deal to get hold of the recipe, and when they decided to get out the Water Street Church Cook Book, they knew that their chance had come. All the members gave their choicest recipes to be published in the book. The proceeds were to go to building a new church. Mrs. Long is one of the pillars of the Water Street Church, and she wouldn't dare refuse any recipe to the Lord. I was on the recipe committee and Mrs. Long was in my district.

I SHALL never forget her face when I told her that we wanted her brown-bread recipe for the cook book. Honestly, she looked like a trapped animal. Of course she tried to get out of it by offering me a recipe for sour cream cake, but, mercy, everybody's got a good recipe for sour cream cake, and I was very firm.

"Why, Mrs. Long, we expect to sell an extra hundred copies of this book, just on your brown-bread recipe alone," I said, thinking, of course, that this would flatter her.

But she looked about as flattered as though a cannibal chief had told her that he expected an extra hundred people to come eat her for dinner. Honestly, I felt sorry for her; but I didn't dare go back to the committee without that recipe, so I held as firm as Gibraltar.

After a while, she gave in, saying bitterly that some of those women in the Water Street Church would take the pennies off a dead man's eyes. As she walked across to her desk to write down the recipe she looked like a broken woman.

Suddenly, on her way across the room, it was as though she had an inspiration. Her shoulders straightened, her step got lighter and quicker, and she seemed to have taken ten years off her life. She wrote down the recipe almost gayly, humming under her breath as she wrote. She came back and handed it to me with a smile.

I took the piece of paper with a very peculiar, uneasy feeling. Her smile was a little bit like the smile of the cat that has just eaten the canary. I had an odd sense of premonition that people who used that recipe never would have good luck with it.

The cook book was a huge success. It made over a hundred

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

dollars for the new building fund. And practically every woman who bought a copy went home and made brown bread the first of all. But nobody's tasted anything like Mrs. Long's. It was good enough brown bread, but just like anybody else's. The women were so disappointed, and they all tried again, thinking they hadn't followed the recipe closely enough. But the closer they followed it, the less the bread tasted like Mrs. Long's.

Lots of them spoke to her about it; but she said she couldn't imagine why they should have the least difficulty. Were they sure they had caramelized the sugar? When they said they certainly were, she just shook her head as though completely baffled.

"IT'S a funny thing," she said, complacently, "I always did seem to have a certain twist of the wrist with my brown bread."

"Twist of the wrist, her grandmother!" said Mother Horton, who is very suspicious. "She can't tell me. She's left something out of that recipe!"

"Oh, I don't see how she could close her eyes in sleep," said gentle old Mrs. Westerley, who is very conscientious, "if she really had done such a thing as that, and to the church of all people!"

And yet dear old Mrs. Westerley will swear that black is white, to keep from hurting somebody's feelings.

And that's the way it goes. Actually, it used to seem to me that nobody in Montrose was entirely honest, except Will. About Will's complete and utter honesty, I had never had a single doubt. That is why the affair with R. T. Moffatt nearly killed me. Honest—why, I'd always thought Will was too honest for his own good.

He would do and say the most tactless things, and seem to think that if they were true that was all there was to it. If I ever tried to put on the least bit of dog when we had company, for instance, I could depend upon Will to spoil it all. Like the time Mrs. Curtis was calling late in the afternoon and, her husband being out of town, I asked her to stay for supper.

The Curtises live beautifully, and I fairly broke my neck getting that supper—it's not so easy with twins to give bread and milk to and get to bed at the same time. If I do say it myself, I achieved quite a result, too. Just the combination I wanted of simple elegance and casualness. Especially, casualness. Of all things, I wanted to give Mrs. Curtis the impression that I hadn't done a thing differently on account of her being there.

Fortunately, I had made a gelatin salad that morning—which always looks elegant way beyond its cost—and I added little hot crackers with butter and paprika, and fixed my sweet potatoes with a marshmallow meringue, and put little puffs of whipped cream on the tomato soup, and added ripe olives and coffee, served in the living-room afterward—all the little touches.

Mrs. Curtis was so sweet and appreciative.

"I'll tell you, Mr. Horton, I don't often have such a supper as this," she said, beaming on Will.

And if he didn't grin and say:

"Neither do we."

And then, with the pleased look of making everything smooth and pleasant, he added:

"But Dot never minds—she just loves fussing for company."

Honestly, I could have killed him where he stood! After I'd fairly burst a blood vessel to give the very impression of not "fussing for company!" Oh, as every married woman knows, a perfectly honest husband isn't all beer and skittles.

But at least I had got to taking Will's being honest as the merest matter of course. Almost, as you might say, like one of his faults. If anybody had warned me ahead about the affair with R. T. Moffat, I'd have said it simply couldn't happen.

R. T. Moffat is one of the richest men in Montrose; but someway nobody ever mentions him along with the Burrises and the Scogginses. All the Burrises and Scogginses have wonderful reputations and, for all his money, Mr. Moffat hasn't exactly. Neither, though, has he what you could exactly call a bad reputation. Maybe if you're rich enough, you don't get a bad reputation—only that kind which Father calls Mr. Moffat's, neither black nor white, a sort of taupe.

"You know," said Will, "Moffat realizes that himself. He practically admitted it, to-day, when he asked me to handle the Pike property for him. He said he'd got a wonderful, straight, clean proposition out there that he wanted presented to the right people. And his coming to me was as good as admitting that he couldn't put over a perfectly straight proposition himself.

"That's the trouble," Will went on, interestedly, "with having one of those taupe reputations. When you strike something that you want to be absolutely straight about, people are afraid of you. You've got to tie up with somebody whose standing is A 1."

WILL was proud of having Mr. Moffat come to him at such a time, and well he might be. Father Horton had at last really pulled out of the business—he and Mother Horton had gone to Los Angeles for the winter—and the other real estate dealers in Montrose, and Verblen, and Dawson, were all older men than Will. "Horton, Real Estate and Insurance," had always had a good standing; but you can't support a family on standing alone, and some of Father Horton's clients had thought Will was too young, and had taken their business elsewhere. A real plum like this Pike property couldn't have come at a better time for us.

Along with scads of other property, Mr. Moffat owned about five hundred acres in a narrow strip along the Pike, the other side of Verblen. It was mostly woodland and not worth much. The Pike, from Verblen on, wasn't paved and most of the traffic went by the Sawmill River Road.

And now, suddenly it had been decided that the new Three State Parkway was going to take over the old Pike all the way from Dawson to the state line. This would mean, of course, that it would be made into a beautiful, wide, paved road.

"I ought to have seen that coming myself," Will said to me, half disgustedly. "It's the obvious route. If they went through Millertown, as they first planned, they'd have to blast or else go 'way 'round those old quarries. This way is shorter. It takes in the lake drive. Why, the old Pike is the only way for the Parkway to go."

Mr. Moffat showed Will letters from the State Road Commissioner and the head of the Parkway Commission, saying that it had been decided to use the Pike for the new boulevard, from Dawson to the state line. This would make that woodland strip of Mr. Moffat's, that had been practically worthless, into really good property, and Mr. Moffat told Will that if he wanted to push the proposition, he would let him handle it exclusively.

It was really very flattering. I didn't wonder that Will was pleased.

AND by the end of the third week, I was even more pleased. That land sold like ice-cream cones on a hot day. Mr. Moffat hiked the price a little, but, even so, people could see that for property right on the Three State Parkway, it was a bargain. After the way Will had had to work to sell a single lot in Montrose, this was almost like finding money. He said honestly he felt as though his commissions were being handed to him.

"I believe," he said suddenly one evening, "that this is the psychological moment for us to buy a new house."

I dropped my magazine in excitement. Of course, we had planned to get a new house some day, for our bungalow wouldn't be big enough after the twins had to have separate rooms; but we had never mentioned this except as some pleasant pipe dream a million years away. But Will's suggestion sounded very definite and immediate.

"I don't believe in running up your overhead just because you happen to be making some extra money," Will explained; "but this isn't. We can afford to swing a little bigger place now, once it's paid for. And by the time I've finished up Moffat's property, the commissions will pay for it. How would you like to cast the old eye about a little and see what we can see in the way of bigger places?"

How would I like to! Ask any woman that. Will, of course, knew about every house in Montrose that was on the market or, so to speak, even half on.

We hadn't been out two times before we knew the house we wanted. It was a lovely little English-type house in the block beyond Rosemary's. It had been built only four years and was in fine condition. The owner was with the J. D. Harvester Company, and had been transferred to the Chicago office, which was why he wanted to get rid of it.

Will said the home was a real bargain. It wasn't much bigger than our house, but just enough so. There were two small rooms across the back with a bathroom between that would be perfect for the twins. There is a certain undeniable air about a house that has two bathrooms. There were bookcases built in on each side of the fireplace in the living-room; and it had the sweetest up-stairs porch, and the most stunning electric light fixtures were in every room.

Will nearly died at the things I looked for in going over the house.

"You'd buy an automobile without even looking at the engine," he declared, "if you liked the color of the upholstery or thought it had a cute-sounding horn."

"Well, all you look at in a house," I

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

retorted, "is the condition of the sills—whatever they are—and the property values in the neighborhood. You're just thinking about putting over a real estate deal; but I'm considering buying a home. And I don't care if a house is the best buy in Custer County, if it hasn't got windows two ways in the kitchen and a linen closet, I don't want it."

However, we didn't have to have any row, because the English house absolutely suited us both. Nobody else was considering it right then, so we felt we could take our time a little. However, Will started right in trying to sell our bungalow.

No human being who hasn't gone through living in a house that is for sale, knows what it is. I never had just got both the twins in the bathtub, with the kitchen full of dirty dishes and our beds still unmade, that Will didn't arrive with somebody to go through the house. And while he insisted that nobody looked at things like that when they were looking at a house to buy, I knew better. The men might be merely concerned with the condition of the plumbing and so on, but, believe me, I'd see the women casting their eyes about at other details.

I TRIED to explain to Will that these things have a subtle effect. I am positive that a couple from Detroit decided against the bungalow just because they looked at it when the twins happened to be quarreling over the cap of a ginger ale bottle and were raising the roof. The man told Will afterward that his wife thought it would be a noisy neighborhood. She never had sense enough to figure that when we moved out, so would the noise.

But the worst of having your house for sale is the way it begins to look to you. Why, I'd lived in our bungalow for four years and thought it was lovely. Our friends always said such pleasant things about it—"What a lovely living-room!" and, "Isn't that a cunning little bedroom!" and, "I simply adore your kitchen; I never saw dish cupboards painted Chinese red before." And I'd have to pretend to be modest about it, say that the red cupboards were just a little idea I'd picked up out of a magazine, and be pleasantly deprecating when they raved about the porch or the dining-room. I'd got to taking it comfortably for granted that we had an unusually perfect little place.

But, believe me, you don't have to show a house to strangers who are considering buying it very long to have the conceit taken out of you. You find out every little thing that's wrong with your perfect little place in short order.

"This is the living-room?" they'll say. "M-mm." And, "What a small bedroom!" And, out in the kitchen, "Why, I never saw dish cupboards painted red before." And they say this in a tone very different from the pleased surprise of your friends. They (Continued on page 183)

"I—just don't see how I can bear it," I said, my voice breaking

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Isn't That A Funny Business For A Woman To Be In!"

Mrs. Astrid Rosing Sawyer deals in sewer pipe, brick, tile, sand, gravel, and other heavy construction materials—She organized and is the active head of her own company, a big one; and she also finds time to run a happy home for her husband and child

By Neil M. Clark

THIS starts out to be the amazing story of Astrid Rosing, a slip of a red-headed Danish girl who established herself in this country in a business so lacking in feminine appeal that women readers will wonder, "How did she do it?" and men will marvel that she could persuade hard-headed business men to buy from her.

Then, later on, it changes into the still more amazing story of Astrid Rosing Sawyer, a woman who successfully combined her business career with the duties of a wife and mother.

It is an inspiring and unusual story. If it were a man's it would be reckoned a career of stern obstacles overcome, of a skimped education, of an alien tongue, of the severest competition, of poverty, of a physique none too strong. But as a woman doing a man's work, she encountered twice the obstacles any man would have met. She founded, built, and heads her own company, dealing in clay products and heavy construction materials, a business in which probably no other woman ever started a company or made a notable record.

Among the products on Astrid Rosing Sawyer's price list are hollow building tile, drain tile, fire brick and clay, face brick, vitrified sewer pipe, fire-clay flue lining, wall coping, sand, and gravel. Would you think a woman, good-looking, auburn-haired, and young, would engage deliberately in such a business, with all the world to choose from? Astrid Rosing (she had not tacked on the "Sawyer" then) not only made that choice, and managed to keep her business bark afloat, but actually made her company one of the largest—if not the very largest—firms of the kind in Chicago, capitalized at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and doing an annual business of between one and two millions. She sells as far east as the Hudson River, as far west as Wyoming. She has supplied materials for great buildings and construction undertakings, including the Chicago Tribune Tower, Grant Park, and any number of factories, office buildings, motion-picture theatres, stores, hotels, and warehouses.

It is a little hard to believe, but you can't get around facts. And when you listen to Astrid Sawyer's story as told by herself; when you hear about not only the competition but the antagonism she was up against, you begin to realize that a woman, in order to do as well as a man, has to expend just about twice the amount of effort.

Meeting Mrs. Sawyer for the first time, you would never cast her for the part of a building-supplies contractor. Rather slight, with rapid movements, it is through her features and manner that she reveals herself. Her hair has turned an early iron-gray. Her facial line from forehead to chin is strong. Her manner is reserved, questioning, wholly business-like; yet her speech is shot with quick, appropriate humor. Feminine? Most assuredly. She has been known to burst into tears upon not getting something her heart was set on! But there is a quiet determination and courage about her that makes you feel you are meeting a real personality.

Astrid Rosing was born in Copenhagen, Denmark. I do not know the year, since it is considered impolite to ask a woman her age; but, hazarding a guess, I should say she is in her early forties. (May she forgive me if I've guessed wrong!)

HER father was an inventor in the old country, but, although he was keenly intelligent in his profession, in the management of his private affairs he was far from practical. The consequence was that when he died, as he did before Astrid reached her teens, the family was left in straitened circumstances. Fortunately, since there were eight children to bring up, the mother was strong, forceful, and thoroughly practical.

"Being a very self-reliant woman," said Mrs. Sawyer, "Mother expected us children, too, to rely on ourselves. Whenever we lost anything, she would never tell us where it was, even if she knew, nor would she help us hunt for it.

"'Look for it,' she'd say, or 'Stand in the middle of the floor and call to it. Maybe it'll walk up and bite you!'

"Perhaps such methods made us children, at the time, think her rather harsh. But I know now her way was kindest; it made us take care of ourselves."

About the time Astrid's father died, a close friend of the family left Denmark for the United States to establish a store in Chicago. It was his letters to his family that first gave Mrs. Rosing the idea of bringing her own family to America.

"Since Mother had to make her own way," said Mrs. Sawyer, "she thought the opportunities would be greater for her and for us in a new country. Our friends, however, were horrified at the thought.

"But we came, just the same, and headed for Chicago, since that was the only city we knew anything about. Mother opened a dressmaking establishment, and I was sent to school."

School in the new country proved anything but simple and easy for Astrid. In Copenhagen, she had attended excellent private schools, and in the regular curriculum had studied French and German—but no English. In Chicago, because of her lack of English, she entered public school with grades no higher than the fourth. Even when she at last could speak the language the teachers would not accept her in a higher grade than the fifth, because her promotion card was from the fourth.

So she plodded along, far behind others of her age. A stranger seeing her then might easily have thought her a dullard. The feeling that others had this opinion of her helped to make her shy and self-conscious, traits already encouraged by the fact that her mother, dreading swelled heads in her children, kept them under with a strict hand.

After three years of plodding, Astrid gave up the public schools, having advanced only to the sixth grade. At the age of fifteen, her mother sent her to a business college to learn shorthand and typewriting.

"It is still a mystery to me," said Mrs. Sawyer, "how my mother discovered that was the thing to do, for she knew almost nothing about business in this country. You would hardly credit it, but when I took up stenography I didn't know what it was for. I was told to learn funny, curlicue marks, and to operate a strange machine; and having been trained to be obedient I did what I was told!"

ASTRID finished the course at business college without making much impression on her teachers. It was in the contract that they would secure her a position upon graduation.

"I'm quite sure," remarked Mrs. Sawyer, with a reminiscent smile, "that the manager of the school thought me an awful dummy. He got me the cheapest sort of job, where I had nothing to do but

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

address envelopes. Perhaps I didn't know much, but something told me that I hadn't learned stenography merely to address envelopes. I quit after one week and got another job, lasting only a little longer in it.

"Looking back, I realize I must have been terrible. If you have ever hired an ignorant, incompetent stenographer, you know exactly what I was like. I knew nothing about business English, so it was nearly impossible for me to write letters correctly. Moreover, my spelling and punctuation left much to be desired. My second employer had reason enough to dismiss me, and soon did."

But Astrid was learning. Her mettle began to show itself.

"I hated to feel so ignorant," Mrs. Sawyer went on. "I wanted to be of some use in the world. So I made up my mind that I was going to read and study, and try to discover what I was good for—a habit, by the way, I've never sworn off! I formed another habit at that time that also stays with me: whenever I met a word I didn't know, or couldn't pronounce, I looked it up."

After losing her second position, Astrid busily set to work to find a third, and by letter and in person answered numerous advertisements. With the next job her fortunes changed.

"IN REPLY to one of my letters," she explained, "I was asked to come to the office of a certain dealer in building materials and construction supplies, to take a test, and see if I would do for a position he had. A curious thing happened. I didn't know about it till later, and I cannot explain it yet; in any event, it proved to be the turning point in my life.

"When I reached the office, several girls were waiting on the same errand as myself. My turn came, and I found in the inner office two elderly gentlemen, one of whom was the proprietor. The other, a friend from out of town, kept in the background.

"The proprietor dictated a letter. I transcribed it at a desk near by.

"At our business school, they provided various kinds of machines, but I learned on an old-fashioned contraption that had separate keyboards for the capitals and small letters, instead of a single keyboard with a shift key. As luck would have it, the machine in this office was modern, and I didn't know how to operate it. I pecked out periods instead of commas, and question marks where capital letters were intended. I'm positive my letter must have been the worst turned in by any applicant. 'I'm not used to that machine,' I explained. 'But,' I added, 'I could learn it pretty quick.'

"He glanced at the letter, smiled, thanked me for coming, and dismissed me, promising to let me know his decision in a few days.

"I never expected to hear from him. But to my great surprise I shortly received a card telling me to start to work on a certain day.

"From what I learned afterward, it was the proprietor's visitor, who sat in the background without saying anything, who picked me out of the bunch.

"And the curious part about it," said Mrs. Sawyer, with a smile, "I still don't know to this day why I was the chosen one."

I could have told her that the proprietor's visitor evidently had the gift of second sight, but I did not wish to interrupt her story.

"Another curious thing happened in that office," she continued. "When the bookkeeper handed me my first week's pay, he said:

"'Miss, I don't know how you managed it. The boss always claimed he couldn't afford to pay a stenographer more than ten dollars a week; and you're getting twelve!'

"I couldn't account for that, either. I had said I must have twelve dollars, because my father was dead and the family depended on me for what I could earn. I know now that it was a very poor argument to use. But the Lord takes care of fledglings! In a few weeks, without any urging on my part, I was raised from twelve to fourteen dollars a week."

Presumably, it was not merely the kindness of his heart that prompted Astrid's employer to do this. A girl who would look up each strange word in the dictionary was likely to do other unexpected things. And Astrid did. Her eagerness to thrust back the mist of ignorance that she felt enveloping her amounted almost to a passion. Ambition stirred within her, and the red-headed foreign-born girl, in her desire to make something of herself, reached out and undertook far more than her assigned duties in the office.

IT WAS a small office at first, with just three people inside: the proprietor, a bookkeeper, and Astrid. The girl found ways to finish her own work quickly, then she helped the bookkeeper with his. By posting occasional entries, checking bills, and doing other odd jobs, she soon had a superficial knowledge of bookkeeping.

One day the bookkeeper quit. Another man took his place. Astrid helped the new man too. Soon he quit. Then her boss said to Astrid:

"Young lady, do you think you could keep these books?"

"I'm sure of it," eagerly.

"All right, the job is yours—at the last man's pay."

"I couldn't believe my ears," Mrs. Sawyer told me, "for the bookkeeper had drawn a hundred dollars a month. For the rest of that day I just lived up in the clouds.

"But when I reported my good luck at home, I came down to earth with a bump. My brother, who had studied bookkeeping at a regular school, scolded me severely.

"'You can't accept that job,' he said. 'Why, when you keep books, you have to take off a trial balance every month. You don't know how.'

"'I guess I can learn!' I replied.

"I enrolled at (Continued on page 137)

PHOTOMAT

"When a woman enters a man's field, men act as if they were from Missouri," says Mrs. Astrid Rosing Sawyer. "They expect her to fail, which makes it harder for her to establish herself." But a woman can do as well as a man, as Mrs. Sawyer's record proves. She was born in Denmark, but came to America and after a fight founded the large construction materials company of which she is still the president

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The metropolis after dark as the author used to picture it

Who Says The Big Burgs Are Only Icebergs?

By H. I. Phillips

THERE is an almost unanimous idea that the heart of a great metropolis has the general proportions of a cold-storage egg, the temperature of a North Atlantic iceberg, and the soothing, rhythmic beat of a blackjack against an iron hat.

The spirit of the big town toward the stranger within its gates is almost universally pictured as that which might be encountered by the less expensive expedient of stepping into a meat market refrigerator in one's union suit.

There exists a notion throughout the country that getting off a train in any great city, particularly Chicago and New York, is much like stepping out of the peace and security of the moss-covered old homestead into a bewildering jungle operated on a coöperative basis by the Forty Thieves, the James Boys, the Wild Men of Borneo, the Head Hunters of Nigeria, the Cannibals of Polynesian islands and the survivors of the Whittemore bandit gang.

In the wide open spaces you will find that the prevailing idea of a typical New Yorker is that of a composite Bill Sykes, Shylock, Nero, Dick Turpin, Bluebeard, Jeremy Diddler, Billy the Kid, Beelzebub, Goliath, Jack Sheppard, Geronimo, Judas, and the villain in any of Owen Davis's early mellerdrammers.

Thousands of mothers and fathers in villages and towns believe that the only difference between a big city and the Bottomless Pit is that the latter doesn't play such up-to-date music, has fewer tall buildings, and doesn't have so many of its inhabitants injured in revolving doors. They regard Manhattan Island, for example, as very much like Hades, except that in Hades it is harder to get drugs, "hard likker," revolvers, sandbags, and large red motor cars. There are countless people in the far-away places who are convinced that in most skyscrapers in New York is to be found the sign, "No Opium Smoking in These Elevators," as reported by a famous Broadway "wise-cracker."

SO ACCEPTED are these notions that many an intelligent, successful business man, old enough to know better, never visits the big city without first providing himself with a money belt, or fastening his wad to an inside pocket with a safety pin. Probably a majority of these visitors still regard it as risky to ask or answer questions of strangers, expose a watch chain in public places, wear a diamond ring with the stone turned out, allow a taxicab driver to take any route through a dark street, or expose more than six dollars in bills openly anywhere on the island.

Up to the time I was twenty-five years old I sincerely believed that an overnight visitor to a big city was extremely lucky to escape without being held up by bandits, assaulted by taxicab drivers, fleeced by card sharps, robbed by pickpockets, lured to Chinatown by a bee-oo-ti-ful actress, drugged during the bird's-nest soup course, and then dropped through a trap door into the river.

I had been led to believe that Pa Knickerbocker's New York street corners were populated by pasty-faced, wasp-waisted men who could make you a drug addict, sell you a gold brick, and steal the gold out of your teeth while they apparently were merely asking you for the right time.

I used to get up courage enough to visit New York about twice a year; but I never boarded the train without grave misgivings. When the train got within twenty-five miles of New York I began to watch my day-coach companions furtively, and view with alarm any faces not impressively angelic. I always kept five rules uppermost in my mind from the moment I stepped off the rattler:

1. Always keep coat buttoned so watch chain doesn't show.
2. Don't forget to feel and see if wad is still where you put it when you started out.
3. Don't get into any conversation with strangers, no matter how honest they look.
4. Peer around every now and then, and make sure you are not being followed.
5. Under no circumstances look up at the tall buildings as if impressed.

I SUPPOSED that few passengers made a trip from the Battery to Times Square in the subway without having at least one pocket picked. I imagined that the bellhops in most of the hotels sneaked through all rooms during the night to ransack each guest's trousers, vest, and packages. I was certain all taxicab drivers were desperadoes who liked to slit passengers' throats to break the monotony of things.

I believed that Chinatown buses were really traps baited and set by Mott Street opium joint proprietors, to get fresh victims, and I was positive that the only two rooming places in New York that didn't make a practice of putting knockout drops in the soup were the Y. M. C. A. and the Martha Washington Hotel.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

I thought that crooks in organized bands kept tabs on new arrivals with heavy gold watch chains or alligator bags, that all hotel lobbies swarmed with pickpockets, that it was suicidal to wander within four blocks of either the East or Hudson rivers after sunset, that City Hall Park was always full of newspaper men who had succumbed to the swift pace of life in a great city, and that it was possible to stand on any busy corner, any hour of the day or night, and see a dozen taxicabs speed past carrying three or four "gorilla men," a quart of chloroform, and a "beautiful kidnapped heiress."

Nobody could tell me that Broadway wasn't the wickedest street in the world, that there were not two or three murders a night on any representative hotel roof, that there was not a continuous cross-fire between rival gangs of gunmen in the vicinity of Broadway and Forty-second Street, and that all lunch-rooms and cigar stores were not held up at least once a day by men who shot first and spoke afterward.

On the train for the big town, with rough company in the seat behind

I REMEMBER very well my first prolonged trip to New York about ten years ago. It lasted three (3) whole days. I had determined to visit the Hippodrome, see the new Strand Theatre, and "do" Coney Island. Realizing that this might entail a tremendous expenditure I had saved up $60, which was to cover everything, including the railroad fare, hotel room, and food.

How to protect this $60 against the pickpockets, bandits, and sneak thieves of a great city was my problem. I gave the matter much thought. Finally I decided to carry but $15 in my pockets and to stuff the remaining $45 (all in five-dollar bills) in the bottom of one of my shoes. Hiding money in a shoe when the shoe is off is an old trick; but I think that in deciding to secrete it in this manner while wearing the shoe, I must be credited with hitting upon an original if dumb idea. I placed the bills in the bottom of my right shoe before taking the train for New York in the forenoon. Arriving in New York I walked around town, took in a show, went to Coney Island in the evening, and got back to my hotel in Times Square feeling that I had outwitted the crooks as they had never been outwitted before.

Then came the shock. When I took off my shoe I found that constant tramping will wear away a five-dollar bill, in truth even nine five-dollar bills. The three top ones had been pretty well worn through, and the bottom ones had begun to show unmistakable signs of heavy travel. Another mile, and I would have been out fifteen dollars at least. It was with difficulty that I got a bank to give me new bills for them the next morning. That was the last time I ever tried carrying money in a shoe while the shoe was occupied.

During the rest of my time in New York I carried the money in a handkerchief in an inside pocket of my vest, and worried considerably because I could not find a bell small enough to attach to the handkerchief and yet big enough to ring when jostled.

"WELL," I thought after I had reached home safely, "the big city is all right for a little flying visit; but imagine having to make a living in a hard-boiled place like that, where everybody's out to rob the other fellow!"

Nothing used to annoy me more than the "big city feller" who blew into town regularly with his story of how much he liked the big burg, and how human it was. I joined in the community cry of "smart-alec!" and in the whispered comment that he was probably finding the big town the merciless place the folks all pictured it as being.

Whenever any home-town boy left for New York to seek his fortune it was the custom to wish him well, but shake our heads and predict that he would never be able to stand the gaff.

"Willie is a fine boy and a smart 'un, but he'll be back before long. Nobody can make good in the big city unless he's a hard-boiled egg with no sentiment and no regard for the other feller. It ain't no place for a good, honest lad."

The impulse to leave the home town and strike out in New York had often come to me, but it had always faded out in a total eclipse before the picture of a merciless, arrogant, swashbuckling, loud-mouthed community, whose slogan, handclasp, and lodge-grip were summarized in the battle cry of "Every man for himself and never give a stranger an even break!"

That a big city might be warm-hearted, generous, fair, considerate, and kindly never seemed to me to be possible. I had never doubted the home-town theory that only the ruthless, thick-skinned, and (Continued on page 158)

Off to the big city and its many perils

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Sixth Instalment

War Drums

A stirring romance of the early American wilderness

By HERBERT RAVENEL SASS

Illustrated by STOCKTON MULFORD

ALMAYNE, on Nunda the Moon-Face, rode in the lead. Behind him strode the Muskogee warrior, Little Mink, who, soon after the flight began, had stepped suddenly from behind a tree trunk and joined the fugitives. Jolie Stanwicke, on Selu, rode next, and Lachlan, on Tuti the Snowbird, brought up the rear.

They followed no trail. For some miles, after leaving the pack train, they had raced along the Great Path; then they had turned to the right into the forest.

In the woods their pace was slower. Almayne turned in his saddle to speak with Little Mink in the latter's tongue, and Jolie studied the tall hunter's thin, hawklike face, his deep-set gray-blue eyes gleaming above his white mustache. Suddenly it came to her that her first distaste for him had passed, that now she liked him profoundly, counted him her most trusted friend in this, her hour of trial.

She glanced momentarily at Lachlan, riding ten paces behind her, his long rifle cocked over his shoulder. He was like a fairy-tale, she reflected, this young Indian Prince.

Who in England would believe her if she told the story there: That in the wilderness of America there was a nation or group of nations—an empire in miniature, the Confederacy of the Muskogee—which an old Scotchman ruled as king, dwelling in barbaric splendor in his great house at Talasé, waited upon by his scores of slaves, teaching his copper-skinned subjects the arts of peace and war?

WHO would believe her if she told of the young man who was heir to this wilderness empire; this young Lachlan McDonald, who had in his veins the Indian blood of the Family of the Wind—the most exalted of the Muskogee clans—the stanch blood of Scotland, and the fiery blood of France; this young Indian Prince, whose speech and manners were those of an English gentleman, whose woodcraft was that of a red hunter and warrior, and whose swordcraft would do credit to any young gallant of the English Court?

Yes, they would laugh at her in England if she told them about Lachlan McDonald, Prince of the Muskogee Confederacy, Chief of the Family of the Wind. They would set it all down as mad romance. Yet he was there, riding behind her, in the flesh.

She felt his eyes upon her. She knew how he watched her, how he studied her when he thought himself unobserved. Well, she must not be too hard with him. He had ventured his life for her and had all but lost it. He had done her good service, and he was serving her still. He had named her the Lady Sanguilla, so Almayne had told her, after some sweet-voiced, beau-

She could not move, she could not cry out. Utter terror held her rigid, dumb

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Little Mink, stooping low, was examining the ground

tiful bird, and she liked the name and was somehow glad that he had so named her.

For an hour or more they rode steadily through the forest, while around them the panorama of the wilderness unfolded. Suddenly Almayne reined in, and held up his hand to halt the others. The hunter, bending forward in his saddle, was gazing intently at the bare sandy soil in front of his horse's fore feet, and Little Mink, stooping low, was also examining the ground. Lachlan rode forward past Jolie, dismounted and stooped beside the Muskoger.

Jolie waited curiously. The three men talked briefly together, and presently they came toward her. Lachlan was frowning; Almayne's thin face was grave.

"We think it well that you should know," Lachlan said to her. "In the sand yonder are the tracks of a great war party of Cherokees, perhaps three hundred braves. It can mean only one thing, that the Cherokees have begun their threatened war against the Province."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She nodded calmly, inviting him to go on.

"This war party," he continued, "was moving eastward. They left the Great Path to the northward and came through the forest to shorten the way. Probably they struck the Path again at about the point where we left the pack train."

"Our friends—Meg Pearson, Mr. O'Sullivan—they are in danger then?" asked Jolie quickly.

"We can't tell, Mistress," Almayne answered her. "The war party may have missed them. But the chance is slender."

"Little Mink will go back to warn them if they are still alive," said Lachlan. "We must think of ourselves. Almayne believes that we had best lie for some while in the swamp of the Santee, and decide later what we can do."

"Let us do what you and Almayne think best," Jolie answered. Turning in her saddle, she saw Little Mink striding through the ferns behind her, following the back trail. As she watched, his tall, copper-brown form faded amid the straight trunks of the pines.

FROM the spot where they had found the tracks of the war party the land sloped gradually until the trees thinned, and Jolie saw in front of her a rampart of tall, dense canes. For miles they threaded the narrow, winding game trails of a vast canebrake, emerging at last in the heart of the great Santee Swamp, where, just as the night was shutting down, they made camp on a dry, grassy knoll in the midst of a wilderness of lofty moss-bearded cypresses.

Next morning they breakfasted on cold venison, on certain roots, which Almayne prepared in the Indian fashion, and on corn cakes made from meal, of which both Lachlan and Almayne carried a supply. Almayne was telling her of the wild vegetables of the woods, and of the fine bass which they could kill in the lagoons with improvised cane arrows, when suddenly, in the middle of a sentence, he stopped.

He was listening to some sound which had caught his ear. Jolie saw the sudden light in his eyes, his quick glance at Lachlan, who also was listening, his black eyes bright, his thin lips compressed. Presently Lachlan turned toward her.

"That was a logcock calling yonder," he said, with a smile, "a logcock which was not really a logcock. It was Little Mink's signal. He is coming."

A few minutes passed; then Jolie saw an Indian emerge from the woods. Close behind him appeared a horseman, and a half-smothered cry burst from her. The man on horseback was Lance Falcon.

Lachlan and Almayne were on their feet. She heard the hunter's oath of amazement, saw Lachlan leap for his rifle, and halt midway. The Indian walking in front of Falcon had raised his hand above his head, palm outward. Jolie saw now that the Indian was the Muskogee, Little Mink; and now behind Falcon she saw another horseman, whose great shock of white hair told her at once that he was Mr. O'Sullivan. Behind O'Sullivan walked the other Muskogee, Striking Hawk.

They came on slowly. Almayne's face was still blank with amazement. Lachlan was frowning. Jolie stepped quickly to his side.

"Mr. McDonald," she said, "there is one thing which I wish you to remember. I fear Captain Falcon even more than I loathe him—and I loathe him as I have never loathed any other man!"

She was standing beside Lachlan when the four who had come out of the forest halted in front of them. It was O'Sullivan who spoke the first word.

"Thank God you are safe," he said soberly. "They attacked the pack train. Meg and Jock and four more are dead; the others are fled toward Charles Town."

He paused, and glanced at Falcon, sitting erect and self-contained on his big roan, his arrogant eyes fixed on Jolie Stanwicke's face.

Mr. O'Sullivan frowned.

"I owe my life to this man," he said shortly, nodding toward Falcon. "I ask you all to bear that fact in mind."

They listened breathlessly while Mr. O'Sullivan told them of all that had happened since they had left the pack train, of how Falcon and himself had fought, of how the Indians had attacked, of how Meg and Jock Pearson had been killed. When the story was finished, there were tears on Jolie's cheeks, Almayne was cursing softly, and Lachlan's black eyes were smoldering above lips that were tight and stern.

Almayne was the first to speak.

"Jock was my good friend," he said, "and Ugly Meg was worth a dozen ordinary women. But we can't help them now."

His eyes rested a moment on Falcon's face.

"Mr. O'Sullivan," said he briskly, "you tell us that this man Falcon saved your life. Maybe that's true; but he did it to save his own skin. If the Cherokees had seen you standing there, they'd have rushed you, and they'd have got his scalp as well as yours."

"I have already pointed that out to Mr. O'Sullivan," Falcon interposed quietly. "He owes me nothing."

"That's settled, then," continued Almayne, with evident satisfaction. "In that case, I shall ask Captain Falcon to let me have his sword, after which he can go for a walk in the woods with Striking Hawk and Little Mink!"

Jolie failed for an instant to catch the meaning of the hunter's words. Suddenly their grim significance came to her, and her breath quickened. She glanced at Almayne, saw the deadly purpose in his eyes. Hitherto she had not once looked at Falcon. Now her eyes, as though some irresistible fascination compelled them, sought his face.

His smile had faded. Perhaps from his tanned, florid cheeks a little of the blood had drained. The half-contemptuous, half-whimsical insolence was gone from his eyes. Yet even while she watched the smile came back and the dark eyes under their overhanging brows gleamed with sudden fire.

"I thank you, friend Almayne," he said dryly in his deep voice, "but I am not in the humor for a woodland ramble from which I should never return. You are five to one here. If you want my sword, come and take it!"

Mr. O'Sullivan opened his lips to speak, but a gesture from Lachlan checked him. Lachlan drew Almayne aside, spoke earnestly in his ear. Jolie studied the hunter's frowning face, heard his grumbled remonstrance, "We've got the rattlesnake under our heel. Why not mash his head? If we don't, we'll be sorry." She saw him spread his hands at last, in reluctant acquiescence. Lachlan stepped back into the circle and stood facing Falcon.

"Captain Falcon," he said, "we are six men and one woman in a country alive with enemies. I believe that I can count on you to do your part in defending that woman from the dangers that surround her. I shall expect you to obey my orders and those of Almayne, and at the first sign of disobedience or treachery we shall shoot you instantly."

The old insolence flared in Falcon's eyes again. He bowed low to Lachlan.

"Mr. Lachlan McDonald," his deep voice boomed, "there was a time not long since when you served me faithfully and well aboard my brig. I engage, upon the honor of a soldier, and for the sake of this sweet lady, to obey you as faithfully now as you obeyed me then!"

THEY remained for three days on their green knoll in the heart of Great Santee. On the evening of the third day they held a council of war. Almayne was for staying where they were, and then, when the way was safe, returning to Charles Town. Falcon seconded this policy. Lachlan and Mr. O'Sullivan were silent, because both had been watching Jolie's face while Almayne had been speaking. When the hunter had outlined their position as he saw it, and Falcon had supported his proposal, Jolie spoke to Almayne:

"If there were no woman with you," she asked quietly, "would you fear to push on through the inner country of the Cherokees to the place where Gilbert Barradell is held captive?"

The hunter pursed his lips.

"You may not understand, Mistress," he said gently, "the fate which would befall you if we were taken by the Indians."

"I do understand it." Her eyes looked straight into his. "But Gilbert's danger is greater than mine. I am not afraid."

For a long minute Almayne gazed at her intently. Suddenly light flashed in his deep-set eyes.

"By Zooks!" he exclaimed. "You are teaching me something about women! We will ride onward to-morrow."

At gray dawn they started. Almayne led them back to the inner edge of the great canebrake which bordered the river swamp. Into the brake they plunged, and day after day they followed the winding paths through the canes, seeing no sign of their foes. At last, among the foothills of the inner country, where the canebrake had narrowed to a mere strip of evergreen along a swift-flowing stream, they turned out of the brake and rode for hours through a stately forest of oak, hickory, and other broad-leafed trees.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

They were in the heart of the Cherokee country now, and there was danger everywhere, every moment. Again and again Almayne saw signs of their enemies—signs which were plain enough to Lachlan also—and slowly the conviction grew upon him that they were attempting the impossible.

In mid-afternoon of their second day among the foothills Almayne beckoned Lachlan to come to him, and the two talked earnestly together. Lachlan returned to Jolie presently, nodding to the others to draw near.

"Almayne believes," he told them, "that we cannot reach Fort Prince George now. There are enemies on every side. We must do what we did in Great Santee—find a safe place, and wait there for a time."

"And where, lad, shall we find a safe refuge?" Mr. O'Sullivan asked him.

"Almayne knows of one," Lachlan answered, "the peak of Sani'gilagi. He thinks we may gain it, and he thinks it is our best hope."

He turned to Jolie. "Can you ride all night?" he asked.

She smiled at him bravely.

"I think that I was never so strong or so well," she replied. "I think that this wilderness of yours is transmuting me into a man."

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed Mr. O'Sullivan fervently; and "Heaven forbid!" Lachlan echoed him, then flushed to the roots of his hair upon realizing that he had spoken the words aloud.

She flashed him a smile which was like a miracle. To the last of his days he was to remember her as she was at that moment—sitting at ease on Selu's back, her buckskin jacket open at the throat, her broad hat with its jaunty feather pushed back above her red-gold hair. Lachlan turned from her with a pounding in his ears and a mist swimming before his eyes.

Of their long ride from the foothills to the great mountain which the Cherokees called Sani'gilagi, Jolie knew little. All the rest of that day and all the night they pushed on through a forest which seemed to have no end. She did not know when at last they began the ascent of the mountain. By that time she was asleep on her horse's back, and Little Mink and Striking Hawk, walking on either side of her, held her in her saddle as Selu struggled up the steep slope.

It was noon of the next day when she awoke, to find herself lying under a shelter of bark and hemlock boughs above the brow of a vast precipice, while the men busied themselves in various ways some few yards behind her.

They did not observe that she had awakened. She moved presently as close to the edge of the precipice as she dared and looked down and out, but she could see only clouds and mist.

Lachlan McDonald, watching Lance Falcon keenly, saw that the man was drunk with the beauty of the girl

Lachlan and Almayne came hurrying toward her, and she learned from them that they were on the summit of Sani'gilagi, and were safe for a time. Then, because by now she knew Almayne's moods, she waited for him to tell her more.

The hunter stood silent, puffing at his pipe. Then he turned to Jolie with a short laugh.

(Cont'd on page 176)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

INTERESTING PEOPLE

He Finds Sermons in Stones, and Then Writes Them

THE first time I talked with Archibald Rutledge he asked me what kind of article THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE wanted.

"The kind," I answered, "that will make a man walk faster after he has read it, in his eagerness to get home and tell his family and friends about it."

"I think I understand," said Rutledge. And he did. He understood so well that he has made his articles talked about in hundreds of thousands of homes where THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE is on the reading table. Through these articles, he has taught people how to get more than exercise out of a walk, how to see the beauty, the mystery, the evidences of God that are everywhere. He has given them countless anecdotes about wild life, and about his own adventures in the woods, swamps, fields, and on the streams upon which he has paddled his homemade boats. He has done more than merely recount natural events—he has interpreted them; and that fact, coupled with his great ability as a story teller, accounts for his popularity as a writer. After each article appears, he is flooded with letters of appreciation, spontaneous letters, asking nothing of him except that he keep on writing. And he will keep on: THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE has now on hand many of his finest pieces of work, and others will come, a fact that this magazine takes pride in announcing.

"Who is this fellow Rutledge, anyway?" a delighted reader recently asked me. Many others have asked the same thing. They have been asking it regularly ever since his articles began to appear. But the answer to that question cannot be given in a sentence, for it is a many-sided answer. For one thing, Rutledge is a leading naturalist of the day. For another, he is the great-great-grandson of John Rutledge, once Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court; and a great-great-grandnephew of Edward Rutledge, signer of the Declaration of Independence. For another thing, he is the owner of "Hampton," the ancestral home of the Rutledges, near McClellanville, South Carolina—a magnificent old house that was built in 1730, that served as headquarters for General Francis Marion during the Revolution, and that sheltered President Washington on one of his visits to the South. For still another thing, Archibald Rutledge is the son of Colonel Henry Middleton Rutledge, a distinguished officer of the Confederate States Army, friend of General Robert E. Lee. To continue the delineation: Rutledge is, and has been, since 1904, a teacher of English literature at Mercersburg Academy, Mercersburg, Pennsylvania; he is a collector of Indian relics, and has in his home at Mercersburg some of the rarest and finest specimens of Indian sculptural art, all of which he and his sons have found in the woods and fields; he is, by avocation, a worker in wood, a hunter, fisherman, roamer of the hills and valleys about his home. and a poet of parts. He has given readings of his poems on many platforms. He was married, in 1907, to Florence Hart, of Winchester, Virginia, and they have three fine boys, two of whom are now in Princeton University. And, finally, he has lived this rich life, these twenty-odd years, on a school-teacher's salary, plus what he earned by writing in his spare time. The Rutledge wealth went down with the Confederacy.

Such is an outline of the man who writes those beautiful nature articles.

Rutledge was born in 1883, at McClellanville, South Carolina, a tiny seacoast town some forty miles north of Charleston. This town is ten mi'es from Hampton, where the family lived in the winters. After the fashion of large Southern planters, Colonel Rutledge had two homes, one on the plantation, another on a sand ridge or on the coast to escape the humid heat of the low farm lands.

"From the time I was a child," says Rutledge, "I had a consuming passion for the world of nature, and both on the coast and on the Santee River, which flows by Hampton, I had a great chance to indulge my favorite pastime. For five years, during my boyhood, I rode six miles to school through the woods every day, and six miles back home. These woods were original forests of yellow pine, cypress, sweet bay, tupelo and the other trees of the Southern low country. All the time I was growing up, I was acquiring two kinds of education: one in school, one in the woods; and I liked the forest education more than the other! My parents were sometimes distressed because, upon returning from school, I was more likely to relate something I had seen in the woods than something I had learned in the classroom. But I loved reading too, and on our remote plantation there was plenty of time for reading, as well as for hunting, fishing, loafing, looking, living. Dickens, Byron, Scott, Tennyson, and Thackeray were the favorites in my home. I learned much from them, and much from the negro boys with whom I roamed the woods."

Archibald Rutledge

Rutledge attended Porter Academy, in Charleston, and, later, Union College, from which he was graduated in 1904. For a few months he worked as a newspaper man in Washington, D. C., and then joined the Mercersburg Academy faculty, a position he has held ever since.

"But I always go home to Hampton on my vacations," he says. "I recently acquired full ownership on this ancestral place, and if I have a major aim in life it is to restore the old place, or, at the least, preserve it."

Hampton, like most other old

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

plantations of that section, brings no income to its owner. Many negro families live on the place; but they pay no rent for cabins or farm lands.

You have noticed in all of Rutledge's articles a distinctly religious note. This is characteristic of him, for he is a profoundly religious man. You have also noticed his love for simple things, and simple, elemental people. "You know," he said to me once, "of all people, I like those of elemental character best—mountaineers, farmers, sportsmen, negroes. I understand them. They seem to me closer to Truth than most other people. And the creatures of nature seem to me to point out fundamental Truth. 'Through nature to God' is a phrase I believe in, for, if taken aright, it may be the key that will unlock for humanity untold spiritual riches."

JAMES C. DERIEUX

This 90-Year-Old Quaker Woman Runs a Real-Estate Firm

DIRECTLY across the tree-shaded square from the mellowed brick building known to history as Independence Hall, a silver-haired woman who recently celebrated her ninetieth birthday, sits daily at her desk in the real estate and insurance office of S. W. Black and Sons, 522 Walnut Street, Philadelphia. This energetic ninety-year-old business executive has been directing the affairs of this long-established firm for the past twenty-two years in an able and successful manner.

THE NEWELL STUDIO, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mrs. Edward Black, of Philadelphia, took over her husband's real estate business when she was sixty-eight years old. Now, at ninety, she is still head of the firm of S. W. Black and Sons, and goes to work every day

At an age when most people retire from active duty and take to easy chairs, Mrs. Edward Black made her bow to the business world. Without any training for her new sphere, she showed remarkable courage and initiative when, at the death of her husband in 1905, she decided to take his place in the firm founded over eighty years ago by her father-in-law.

Mrs. Black placed her household affairs in order, and boarded a trolley for the commercial center of the city, an almost unknown land to her. Every day for years she rode ten miles each way to and from her home in Fox Chase. A tiring trip to people half her age, but a pleasant little jaunt to this mistress of the art of growing old gracefully and gallantly.

"I knew nothing about business when I first came to the office," she told me, as we sat in her spacious office; "but I wanted to keep my mind occupied. I think every woman who is left alone should try to find some sort of employment. It makes her forget her troubles.

"I felt timid about taking over my husband's business, for I thought perhaps the clients might feel that, because I was a woman, I wouldn't be good at buying and selling properties. But," and she smiled, "they seemed to have faith in me, for not one withdrew his account from the office. It made me very happy, and has encouraged me to keep on so long. I've always tried to take as good care of their affairs as I would want people to take of mine."

"If I couldn't come to my office now, I'd feel lost. It means more to me than anything—except my family, of course. I haven't any children, but I live now with my niece, Rebecca Ellis Harrop, at 1731 Oxford Street, and I am very happy with her. I ride in and out on the street cars, and never get tired seeing the sights of the city and the people passing by. Do I stay home when the weather is bad? Not unless the streets are very icy; I'd like to go out then, but I feel I should take some precautions. But when the wind blows hard, and it snows, nothing can keep me indoors! I'm rather imprudent at times, I suppose," and she smiled. "I always forget I'm an old lady."

Mrs. Black comes to her office at nine and stays until three. But she takes no time for lunch. Breaking into the day's routine by taking a noon recess, she believes, interrupts her schedule. She eats a hearty breakfast and enjoys a cup of tea when she reaches home in the afternoon.

To reach the scene of her daily duties she has to climb two steep flights of stairs to the third floor of the building. Close to the big desk, with its modern efficiency helps, stands a quaint rocker with a bright shawl thrown across its stout hickory back. Mrs. Black likes to rest occasionally from her strenuous activities.

"I love this old section of the city," she told me. "It is more like the Philadelphia I knew when I was a girl and drove in from my home across the Delaware."

Not only have old clients of the S. W. Black and Sons firm remained faithful to this veteran real-estate dealer, the oldest woman conducting such a business in the state and country, perhaps, but her conscientious and wise administration has attracted many new ones. Property holders who have removed from Philadelphia leave their affairs in her capable hands with perfect trust. Business is transacted in this office with clients scattered over the entire country, from California to Maine, including Oklahoma, Ohio, Florida, and many other states.

Although her assistant, Samuel J. T. Ware, takes charge of showing prospective patrons through new buildings and pointing out land sites, Mrs. Black interviews them all and learns the type of service they desire. It is her firmly written signature that concludes all deals made through this real-estate and fire-insurance office.

"No one has ever tried to take advantage of me since I came to the office," she says. "I hear a lot of criticism about modern business methods and sharp dealing, but I am glad to say I have always met with fair, courteous treatment."

Popularly known as "the city of homes," Philadelphia is gradually "going apartment." Although thousands of houses are built every year, Mrs. Black has noticed a tendency toward compressed living quarters More people come seeking apartments; contractors are kept busy building this type of structures, and turning old houses occupied formerly by one family into dwelling places for several families. The nationalities of her clients have changed considerably in the past twenty-two years, Mrs. Black told me: the foreigners make fine tenants, pay promptly and take care of the properties. Thrifty, too, they work hard to become owners instead of renters.

A typewriter forms part of the office equipment, but is used only by Mr. Ware. The cheery, ninety-year-young executive prefers to transact her affairs in longhand.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

She writes an old-fashioned gracefully legible script. The telephone, however, is one of the modern business helps that she heartily enjoys, and uses frequently during the day.

Mrs. Black was born on a farm near Bordentown, New Jersey, in 1837. She came to Philadelphia as a bride in 1863, and has lived most of her married life in Pennsylvania. A firm believer in woman suffrage, she has cast her vote regularly since it became effective. She is a member of the Society of Friends, and an elder in the Hicksite Meeting, and she worships at the meeting house at Seventeenth Street and Girard Avenue every "First Day" morning. She walks both ways, being an ardent advocate of this form of exercise. She delights in motoring, however, and feels fresh after a hundred-mile ride.

Happy as the head of the business, a prosperous and progressive one, Mrs. Black expects to continue coming to her office for many years. She possesses remarkably fine health, and can read without glasses unless the print is unusually small. The clock of Independence Hall, a square away, tells her the time of day. All her faculties are alert.

MARY THERESA COLLINS

Anthony Jawelak's Blindness Does Not Dim the Music in His Soul

BLIND almost from birth, Anthony Jawelak has, through persistent application, developed his talent for music to an astonishing degree. As an infant of two years, the piano was his favorite toy. He learned to play little tunes on it even at that early age. At fourteen, he was giving private recitals before talented musicians. Just a year later, he appeared in concerts as the assisting artist with two famous symphony orchestras.

That was fifteen years ago. To-day he is regarded by critics and musicians as one of the most skilled pianists in America. He plays the most difficult arrangements of the great composers of piano music with ease and abandon.

Anthony Jawelak was less than two years old when the Jawelaks got a piano. When he heard others play it, he used to try to reproduce what he had heard.

One day, Caspar P. Koch, a prominent Pittsburgh musician, visited the Jawelak home. He went to play an accompaniment for a song that the boy's father was preparing as a part of a choral program in which Koch was interested. The father and the musician repeated the number together several times, without thought of the two-year-old child lying on the floor in the room.

The practicing ceased, and the blind infant crawled over to the piano, climbed up on the stool, and began playing the accompaniment he had heard. From that moment, Koch, as teacher and adviser, has made it possible for Jawelak to get the best musical training available.

Until he was ten years old, however, the child was too frail and nervous to have formal lessons. Until then, he was his own teacher, reproducing whatever he heard that pleased him.

When Anthony was a boy of five or six years, a group of musicians and newspaper reporters visited him. One of the musicians played the minuet from Mozart's "Magic Flute" a few times. This piece was entirely new to the child.

"Now play what you have heard," he was told.

His little hands fluttered over the keys, and he sounded a few chords until he struck the proper keys. Then he played the composition through to the end, just as he had heard it.

When he had finished, the musicians took turns at sounding chords on the piano. The boy listened intently, then, stepping over to the instrument, and running his hands lightly over the keys, he reproduced those chords perfectly.

Jawelak's first recitals were given when he was a lad of fourteen. His programs at this age were made up of the compositions of Chopin, Liszt, and Beethoven. They were programs which would have taxed the abilities of the most seasoned concert artist.

Anthony Jawelak, blind pianist, made his first public appearance at the age of fifteen. Now, at thirty, he is one of this country's well-known concert performers

It is difficult to imagine a fifteen-year-old blind boy appearing in concerts with famous symphony orchestras. But that is what Jawelak did. In 1912, he appeared with both the Pittsburgh Festival Orchestra and with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, playing concertos from Grieg and Mendelssohn on these occasions.

Not only is Jawelak a pianist of first rank, but he is a composer of music for the piano as well. His compositions are extremely difficult. Of twenty-five or more numbers he has written since 1914, none has been published. Music publishers offer but one objection—the compositions are so difficult that none but perhaps a dozen of the most talented pianists in America would play them.

In his studio I found many instruments lying about, and he played several of them for me. Next to the piano, he likes the pipe organ. He often plays the organ for church services. Until he was sixteen, however, he had never touched an organ. One summer, his piano teacher, who was at that time playing cathedral services, wished to leave the city for a vacation. So he coached Jawelak on the organ for three weeks. The pupil progressed rapidly, learning to locate keys on the multiple keyboard, and manipulate the stops and pedals. With this brief period of instruction, he was able to carry on the work of his teacher.

This experience interested Jawelak in the organ. He wanted to learn more. For the next four years, he was a student in a school of music, giving his whole attention to the organ.

When he had finished this course, a recital was arranged, in which he was accompanied by a student symphony orchestra. From the rehearsals with the orchestra, Jawelak learned the part which every instrument was supposed to play, and its relation to the musical score for the organ. If a player in the orchestra made a mistake, Jawelak could point it out and tell just what the mistake was.

Many people think of a pianist as having slim, delicate fingers and rather a fragile hand, but Jawelak's hands are heavy and muscular, and so large that he can span twelve notes on the piano keyboard. He is one of the few living pianists who are able to play the compositions of the famous Liszt as the composer intended them to be played, for Liszt had just such hands.

Being sightless, Jawelak must carry his entire library of music in his memory. If he does not know a composition, all he requires to memorize it is three or four repetitions of the music by a competent pianist.

Jawelak's studio is arranged to suit his convenience, and he moves about in it at will, answering the telephone, tinkering with the radio, seating himself at the piano, playing the phonograph, or even tuning his piano.

GLEN U. CLEETON

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

SOUP

and the woman "from Missouri"

ALL PRAISE to this worthy housewife. Nothing but the best will do for her family. One can picture her working with relentless zeal, laboriously going through all the tedious and troublesome steps of making her soups in her own kitchen, just as her mother did before her. And you can be sure her soups are good—make no mistake about that.

BUT JUST across the street, or in the house next door, no doubt, is a neighbor with just as particular tastes and notions about the quality of food she puts on her table. Only she has had the wit to "try" those soups that are sold at the store. She knows that this is the age of the automobile, and not of buggy rides. To her delight, and often to her real astonishment, she has discovered that the Campbell's condensed soups are just as delicious, and often even more so, than she herself makes. For soup-making is only one of her many duties, while the makers of condensed soups equip enormous and spotless kitchens and they give their chefs a life-long training, all devoted to the fine art of soup-blending.

"OUR REPUTATION is in every can." The soup-maker who says that realizes how critically his soups will be judged. The tremendous, national success of condensed soups truly proves that they only doubt who have not tasted.

Add an equal quantity of water. Then bring to a boil. Simmer for a few minutes. And that is all. The soup is ready for your table. Twenty-one different soups—each a masterpiece—and the full list printed on every Campbell's label. Your grocer has, or will get for you, any Campbell's Soups you select. 12 cents a can.

That I am keen is plainly seen,
I've brain and muscle, too.
From Campbell's meal I get my zeal
And deeds of daring-do!

WITH THE MEAL OR AS A MEAL SOUP BELONGS IN THE DAILY DIET

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Youth and Health are priceless gifts

Protect them now by guarding

The Danger Line

To the modern woman, youth and health are priceless gifts. On them depends the vitality, the energy, the "aliveness" that can lift her out of the dull routine of life and fill her days to overflowing with gracious, joyous activity.

Are you one of these women who knows that it is health which must be guarded if youth and beauty are to be preserved?

Take mouth hygiene, for instance. Doctors and dentists both tell us that premature old age, lack of vitality, tiredness and dangerous diseases also, are developing as the result of decayed teeth and infected gums. But what do we do to guard against this danger? Give our teeth a brushing or two daily, perhaps with some ineffective toothpaste, and dismiss the matter.

Brushing is not enough! And here is the reason. Every time you eat, food particles lodge in the pits on your teeth and in the tiny V-shaped crevice around each tooth formed by the meeting of tooth and gum—The Danger Line. These particles ferment. Acids are formed. It is these acids which cause tooth decay and also irritate the gums, causing dangerous infections.

Guard against these acids

You cannot brush these acids out of the crevices at The Danger Line. So you must use a dentifrice that can neutralize them. So, countless men and women are turning to Squibb's Dental Cream because it is made with more than 50 per cent of Squibb's Milk of Magnesia—a safe, effective antacid. Particles of the Milk of Magnesia remain in the crevices along The Danger Line for a considerable period and neutralize dangerous acids as they form.

In addition, Squibb's Dental Cream is mild, non-abrasive, non-irritating. It soothes the delicate gum tissues and polishes the enamel, leaving it clean and lustrous. Guard your teeth and gums. Health, youth and beauty may depend upon it. See your dentist regularly. Begin the use of Squibb's Dental Cream today. 40 cents a large tube.

E. R. Squibb & Sons, New York. Manufacturing Chemists to the Medical Profession since 1858. © 1928

SQUIBB'S
DENTAL CREAM

Squibb's Milk of Magnesia promotes proper alimentation

The strength and energy we use up every day must be renewed if we are to remain at our best. And this renewal depends on alimentation. Squibb's Milk of Magnesia promotes proper alimentation by virtue of its twofold action. Its antacid quality helps counteract improper digestion. Its mild laxative action helps to relieve the system from the burden of fermenting food. At druggists, only 25c and 50c.

THE "PRICELESS INGREDIENT" OF EVERY PRODUCT IS THE HONOR AND INTEGRITY OF ITS MAKER

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The Greatest War of All Time—Man Against the Insects

(Continued from page 15)

as confront them in the United States to-day.

"Any farmer, anyone who has a little garden in the suburbs or a few fruit trees, knows that he can't get a perfect or a near-perfect crop without taking protective mechanical or chemical measures against the pests. When you put in a window screen, or tack up some mosquito netting, you are playing a defensive part in this warfare. When you buy fruit, vegetables, cereal products, or even a Christmas tree, you pay, indirectly, toll to the insect hordes, for the price includes the expense of protection against them.

"You will get a better idea of the meaning of what I have just said if you stop to realize that, annually, the manufacturers of wire screening sell thirty million dollars' worth of their product to American consumers! And the orchardists of California alone spend forty-five million dollars fighting insects!

"What is this warfare as a whole costing us? The figures are enormous. The Bureau of Entomology spends in the neighborhood of three millions a year in field work and in scientific investigations, to discover the best strategy to use against pests. But this sum does not include special appropriations to meet emergencies. A conservative estimate of the total cost is around sixty million dollars. Even so, the best way of estimating our losses is in the terms of lost labor. In dollars we figure the annual loss at two billions. In other words, every year, the damage wrought by insects nullifies the labor of a million men.

"Presently I want to tell you something about the ways insects have of fighting us and about our ways of fighting them. But first let me point out a few facts that have to do with the nature of this conflict as a whole.

"HOW many different kinds of insects do you suppose there are in the world? It is estimated that there are more than 2,000,000 species, of which only about 600,000 have been studied by scientists.

"How many insects (not species but individuals) do you suppose there are to the acre in our forests and meadow land? On the basis of studies made in the vicinity of Washington, it is estimated that on the average there are about 1,600,000 insects to the acre of forest floor and 13,500,000 to the acre of meadow land, where food is more plentiful!

"Even so, neither the number of species in all, nor the numbers of insects to the acre, gives a fair picture of the significance of insect life on the earth. Consider their amazing powers to multiply!

"Years ago, Huxley estimated that in the course of ten generations, supposing all the individuals to survive, the progeny of a tiny insect known as the aphid would 'contain more ponderable substance than five hundred millions of stout men, that is, more than the whole population of China.' Not long since, a scientist put this observation to a thorough-going test, watching the life cycle of the tiny cabbage aphid through a period of slightly more than a year.

"He found that from March 31st to August 15th, the aphid had twelve full generations, and each female had twenty-one young. Suppose that all these individuals had lived to October 2d, when sixteen full generations had occurred, how many would have been present then?

"The answer, obtained by a simple problem in arithmetic, is staggering—564,087,257,509,154,652! How much would they weigh? The answer is equally surprising. Since the aphid weighs on the average 1.4 milligrams, the 564-odd quadrillion aphids would total 822 million tons, or, reducing it to human terms, almost ten times the weight of the total population of the earth. Huxley's estimate, therefore, was far short of the truth. And the capacity of the cabbage aphid to multiply is only about half that of the melon or cotton aphid!

"I have conducted experiments which establish the fact that a single house fly which passes the winter safely in Washington may have six trillion descendants by the following September 1st!

"And these insects want what we want. They eat a proportion of everything we harvest, attack our stored food, destroy our clothing and buildings, affect all our domestic animals, and attack us personally. And, besides destroying our crops, they carry diseases from plant to plant.

"WHAT are we doing to hold them in check? In answering that question, I shall confine myself mainly to the pests of great economic importance.

"We have always had numerous native insects to fight, such as grasshoppers, chinch bugs, plum curculios, and potato beetles. They are not the ones of greatest menace, however. Our really dangerous enemies have come from foreign lands, usually by accidents of commerce—with imported plants, seeds, bulbs or other produce. We are now more or less protected against further accidents of this kind by embargoes and by inspection under government supervision of all plants and seeds admitted into the country. But already we have from a dozen to fifty foreign insects, each of which is costing us millions a year.

"Glance at this verbal map, and you will see what may be called the chief battle fronts in America's insect war:

New England	gipsy moth and brown-tail moth
Central States	corn borer
Cotton belt	boll weevil
Texas and Arizona	pink boll worm
Rocky Mountain District	alfalfa weevil
Northwestern forest area	bark beetle
Southern California	scale insects
Florida	scale insects and white fly
Pennsylvania and nearby states (New Jersey, Delaware, and recently parts of New York and Connecticut)	Japanese beetle

"Each of these insects requires a different sort of campaign. What the strategy of that campaign shall be is determined after a thorough, scientific study of the insect's life secrets. Suppose we take the gipsy moth as an example.

"One of the first things you discover on delving into the life secrets of the gipsy moth is this: Unlike numerous other moths, it does not spin its web in tree tops. It lays its eggs in clusters of about four hundred on trunks of trees (particularly oaks and elms), and in the crevices of rocks and old fences. Having passed through the winter as an egg, the caterpillar hatches the following spring, crawls up the trees and begins eating the tender young leaves. Eventually they turn into moths.

"NOW, the female of this species has well-developed wings, but she can not fly. Her body is too heavy. How then was it possible for the moth to spread so rapidly throughout more than four thousand square miles of New England territory? The moth had been studied for more than thirty years before the real answer to this question was discovered. Strange as it may seem, though the winged female moth cannot fly, the wingless caterpillars can fly.

"When small and light, the caterpillars have an abundance of fluffy hair. At the root of each hair is a tiny gas bag. By means of these bags they float on the air. Having spun themselves a bit of rope, they hang suspended from the tip of a branch until a wind comes along strong enough to break it and carry them perhaps a mile away. In that way they are broadcast.

"What if the moth should get into that rough and densely wooded area, the Adirondacks? The assumption is that it would go like wildfire—more rapidly than it spread throughout New England!

"So to-day we have what is known as the gipsy moth barrier zone, east of the Adirondacks and twenty-five miles wide, extending from the Canadian border to Long Island Sound. Here, in the fall, you see our scouts at work hunting for the egg clusters, which they kill with a daub of creosote. In the spring you see our crews out with a gigantic spraying outfit specially constructed for this kind of work. Through a hose a mile long it can throw a poison liquid, arsenate of lead, in a stream that reaches the top of a tree a hundred feet high before it breaks into spray. When the caterpillars eat the leaves covered with this poison they die. So, from year to year, their numbers are kept down. For the time being, the rest of the country is safe.

"But that is not the whole story: we are attacking the gipsy moth in another way. Bear in mind that half the insects of the world live on plants; the other half live on insects. Some insects are internal parasites in their early stages. And some are predatory, attacking, and devouring.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Now, when a foreign insect is introduced into a new environment, it tends to develop rapidly and become a great menace because, in the new country, it is free of the predatory or parasitic enemies that prey upon it at home. Study the gipsy moth in its native environment, and you will discover that ninety per cent of all the moths that hatch are destroyed by these natural enemies. In the United States these enemies did not exist, so we sent out hunters to find them. When found, we had to import them, breed them, and assist them in getting started.

"In Japan, we have found a number of enemies of the gipsy moth. One of them is a fly known as 'Schedius.' Millions of these flies have been raised in our laboratories and put out in colonies of ten thousand throughout New England, and to-day they are breeding rapidly and spreading. Another enemy of the moth brought from Japan is a tiny wasp known as 'Anatatus.' When an Anatatus comes upon a cluster of gipsy-moth eggs, it pierces each one with a sharp, sting-like thrust, and in this cavity of the larger egg lays its own much smaller egg. When the baby Anatatus hatches and begins eating, it consumes the contents of the shell! Other imported wasps attack the living caterpillars after they have developed and are feeding. One of these lays as many as a hundred eggs in the body of a caterpillar, which is later consumed by the new-born wasps.

"In America, we have many varieties of beetles, some of them warlike. Against the gipsy moth, they have been of no assistance, for the reason that they travel on the ground, while the gipsy moth caterpillars work in the trees. But there is in Europe a beetle that climbs trees. After some years of failure, this valuable fellow, 'Calosoma sycophant,' became quite at home in New England.

"And what an ally Calosoma has proved to be! It has flourished and multiplied prolifically. More agile than a monkey among the branches, it climbs New England's shade trees and eats its fill of gipsy-moth caterpillars day after day. In August, it goes to sleep for ten months, then wakes for another onslaught.

"UNDER ordinary circumstances, our allies, the so-called beneficial insects, cannot be relied upon absolutely to exterminate a pest. But we can depend upon them, under favorable conditions, to keep the numbers of a pest down to a comparatively harmless minimum. In one instance, however, American entomologists were astonished by the complete victory of a little insect from Australia over one of the scale insects of California.

"Do you know the nature of these so-called scale insects? They attack apples, figs, quinces, pomegranates, roses, and many other trees and plants; but those on orange and lemon trees are especially injurious. The so-called 'Fluted Scale' sinks its beak into the bark and sucks the sap, exuding a waxy substance through the pores in its back. This substance congeals and covers its eggs.

"Some decades ago, the Fluted Scale, or Icerya, appeared upon some acacia trees at Menlo Park, California. An insignificant creature in itself, resembling a small bit of fluted wax a little more than a fourth of an inch long, it took possession of those trees, swarming over them until the bark was completely hidden. They spread from orchard to orchard of oranges which were worth thousands of dollars an acre. They sucked the sap through their minute beaks until the trees became feeble, the leaves dropped, and a black fungus crept over the twigs. The fruit growers of California faced ruin.

"When government entomologists began their study of this insect's life history, they discovered that it was a native of Australia. There, it was not particularly abundant and was not a pest. So it was assumed that in Australia the Icerya had some natural enemy which kept it in check. This assumption proved correct, and the enemy of the Icerya proved to be a little beetle, black with red spots, known as the ladybird, scientifically, the 'Vadalia.'

"Packed in tin boxes, quantities of the little beetles were shipped to California, where they were liberated upon orange trees enclosed in gauze. With appetites sharpened by the ocean voyage, they fell upon the Icerya, devouring them. Then they began to lay eggs. In a few days these hatched into active, grublike creatures, which also began devouring scales right and left. In another month these grubs became beetles, and so the work of extermination went on!

"Each female ladybird lays on an average three hundred eggs. Assuming that half the larva from the eggs produce female beetles, then in five months a single ladybird becomes the ancestor of 75,000,000,000 other ladybirds, each capable of destroying innumerable scale insects. Thus, in less than a year from the time the first of these hungry Australian immigrants were released, the orange trees of California were again in bloom, resuming their old-time verdure. In five years there was hardly an Icerya to be found in the state!

"THE first object of a campaign against any insect pest is to bring about relief from great damage as quickly as possible. Hence, at the start, we usually resort to a variety of expedients, such as poison sprays, poison dust, chemicals that kill by contact, or even fire. Not infrequently, when we are called upon to find the quickest means of holding an insect in check we run into curious difficulties.

"As you doubtless know, the arsenical poisons are the ones most commonly used to destroy insects. But now and then we have to deal with an insect that will not eat leaves or plants sprayed with these substances. Recently, we were faced with that difficulty in dealing with the Japanese beetle, which was brought into the United States more than a decade ago with iris bulbs imported from Japan. Making rapid headway, it spread from a nursery in New Jersey to Pennsylvania and nearby states. As an adult beetle it menaces our apple, peach, and cherry trees. As a grub, it eats the roots of grasses, ruining lawns, putting greens and golf courses. In all, it attacks two hundred different plants.

"When our study of the pest began, in 1916, we assumed that it could be controlled by spraying with arsenate of lead the plants it attacks. But we soon discovered that, instead of eating the foliage so treated, it went to plants that had not been sprayed. How could we fool the beetle into eating enough of the poison to kill it?

"To answer this question, our experts made hundreds of experiments, and finally discovered that a small quantity of lead oleate of soap mixed with the arsenate of lead disguised the poison to a certain extent, so that a fair proportion of the beetles ate and were destroyed. Still, they were increasing in numbers, and additional measures had to be found.

"After numerous experiments, we discovered that geraniol, an oil of geranium and sassafras, was as pleasing to the beetle as cologne or lavender is to some people. When geraniol was sprayed over the plants, the odor carried by the wind, often as far as half a mile, would attract the beetles to them. In regions where they were prolific, billions would be drawn by the scent in the course of a few hours, literally covering the trees. It was then a simple matter to destroy them by spraying the trees with an extract of pyrethrum, which kills by contact.

"HOWEVER, the entomologist regards all such expedients as this merely as stop-gaps for emergency use. His real objective is to discover ways of combat that will do away with the necessity for the expensive spraying or dusting measures that have to be resorted to year after year. One of these permanent remedies I have already described—the use of predatory and parasitic insects. That is known as the biological method of fighting insects. Another, of equal importance, is the agricultural method.

"Frequently, when we study the life history of an insect that has become a pest, we discover that its enormous increase is due almost entirely to the way in which some particular crop is grown. In such a case, a modification in the method of growing or harvesting the crop is the surest preventive.

"Back in 1892, the boll weevil crossed the Rio Grande for the first time, entering the United States at the tip of Texas where the Rio Grande flows into the Gulf of Mexico. Having come from Mexico, where cotton grows wild, it got into a few fields near Brownsville. The first fields attacked were completely ruined. Spreading northward and eastward, the weevil alarmed the whole cotton world.

"As the first step, this Bureau recommended a plan for stopping the weevil where it was. We drafted a bill which proposed the suppression of cotton in the comparatively small areas already infested, and the absolute eradication of the weevil by doing away in that region, for a year or two, with any cotton upon which it might breed. Unfortunately, this measure, though approved by the governor of Texas, was not put into effect. Had it been, the weevil would have been wiped out at this stage.

"So far, our efforts to find effective parasitic enemies of the weevil have failed. At the start, efforts to poison the weevil also failed, partly for the reason that poison dust (arsenate of lead) failed to stick to the plant. We have now found a method of dusting cotton plants that is successful where it can be utilized. The dust is applied by airplane. Blown out by the propeller in a stream fifteen feet above the ground, the dust settles on the plant and sticks, owing, apparently, to

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Millions can't be Wrong

Join this Multitude of Happy Shavers—but Don't Switch till You Let this 10-day Test at Our Expense Prove Our Case to You

GENTLEMEN:

Rarely is a new product received with such acclaim as has greeted Palmolive Shaving Cream.

Literally millions who have tried it have been won from lesser methods. Most of them accepted our invitation to shave ten days "on us" before they made a switch.

That test does the business. That settles all doubt. After ten days of perfect shaves very few ever return to old methods. Won't you, too, give us a chance to prove what we have done for you? Just mail the coupon for your free test.

The 130th Formula Won

Palmolive Shaving Cream is a triumph of one of the world's greatest soap laboratories. Sixty-five years' experience stand behind that name.

When we first set out we sought the advice of 1000 men on what they thought a shaving cream should be. They told us four things—we added the fifth. But not until formula after formula had failed to satisfy in one way or another.

After 129 formulas were tested and rejected came the shaving delight you'll know when you get your free tube.

5 Remarkable Features

1. Multiplies itself in lather 250 times.
2. Softens the beard in one minute.
3. Maintains its creamy fullness for 10 minutes on the face.
4. Strong bubbles hold the hairs erect for cutting.
5. Fine after-effects due to palm and olive oil content.

Now Send the Coupon, Please

We take the risk—not you. We undertake to please you . . . to win you in ten shaves. Give us the opportunity to prove our case. The coupon is for your convenience . . . to prevent your forgetting. Won't you use it, please?

THE PALMOLIVE-PEET COMPANY, CHICAGO, ILL.

To add the final touch to shaving luxury, we have created Palmolive After Shaving Talc—especially for men. Doesn't show. Leaves the skin smooth and fresh, and gives that well-groomed look. Try the sample we are sending free with the tube of Shaving Cream. There are new delights here for every man. Please let us prove them to you. Clip the coupon now.

3880

35c

10 SHAVES FREE

and a can of Palmolive After Shaving Talc

Simply insert your name and address and mail to Dept. B-1456, Palmolive, 3702 Iron St., Chicago, Ill.

Residents of Wisconsin should address Palmolive, Milwaukee, Wis.

.....

.....

(Please print your name and address)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

some electrical phenomenon which takes place in the course of the dusting operation. When eaten, this dust kills not only the weevil but also the cotton-leaf worm.

"Shall we lose our campaign against the European corn borer as we temporarily lost that against the boll weevil? This conflict is only just beginning. It is now at a stage where the borer can be controlled by following the proper agricultural practice, just as we could have stopped the weevil when it first appeared at Brownsville.

"The borer was introduced into the United States in broom corn. In 1909 or 1910, ten thousand tons of the corn were imported in one shipment from Hungary and Italy. One large consignment went to Everett, Massachusetts, where it was stored in an old ramshackle building. The moths developed while the broom corn was in storage, found egress through crevices of the building, and laid their eggs on corn in nearby fields. Other shipments of that imported corn have been traced to Amsterdam and Buffalo, New York, and to St. Thomas, Ontario, and an outbreak of the corn borer has occurred at each of these places. It spread, and last year the most serious infestation of all was discovered in our Great Lake region on the very edge of the great corn belt, a menace to the staple crop of that whole territory.

"A small yellowish moth, with a wing spread of three quarters of an inch, it multiplies and spreads with great rapidity. Owing to the fact that it flies at night, it may exist for a time in great numbers in a farmer's corn without his knowing it.

"IT IS the larva of this moth which works the great havoc, tunneling the stalks, not only of corn but beans, celery, beets, rhubarb, and other products, including flowers such as chrysanthemums and gladioli. In sections of Ontario the borer has already ruined as much as seventy-five per cent of the corn crop; in our Lake region it has damaged the crop in a very few places twenty-five per cent.

"It is easy to foresee the losses that will ultimately result if the corn borer is not controlled. It will run into billions. Last year, Congress appropriated ten million dollars for use in checking the borer's spread this season. Nothing like a war of extermination could be attempted with even this large sum of money. It proved sufficient, however, to cover the expense of a gigantic clean-up campaign. One way of checking the borer is to destroy the stalks left standing after harvest, and all the debris. More than two million acres have been thoroughly covered in this way, with the farmers and representatives of the States and the Federal Government coöperating.

"Can we rely on such means as this to exterminate the borer? The answer is—"No!" A billion dollars might be spent, and that result would not be accomplished. Yet there is a comparatively simple way by which the borer can be subdued. We have learned that for seven months of the year the borer lives in the lower part of the cornstalk. Hence, there is a chance to get at it by a new agricultural practice in handling the crop.

"In the past, it has been the custom to cut the cornstalks high or not at all, and to leave them in the field throughout the winter. This affords the borer its chance to hibernate. The new method of cropping corn requires that the stalks be cut close to the surface of the ground, and either used in silos or destroyed; for when the stalks are destroyed the borer is disposed of.

"Will we do this? Machinery has already been designed for this new method of cutting the crop. The change means some trouble and expense, but amounts to little in comparison with the ultimate enormous losses if the borer is permitted to become a perpetual pest. If the new method is put into practice, either because our farmers see it as their salvation, or because the States require it, then the borer will cease to be a menace.

"I SHOULD like, at this point, to digress for a moment: In the Bureau of Entomology we have more than a hundred laboratories. It is impossible here to do more than indicate the vast amount of information, developed by our experts, about methods that the individual can use to protect himself and his crops from insect pests. Whatever your problem is you can obtain from the Bureau of Entomology, by asking for it, practical information that will assist you in meeting the difficulty in the cheapest and most convenient way.

"In case you find that some of your farm or garden crops, or your shade trees, are suffering from extensive and extraordinary injury, I will make this suggestion—act promptly! If possible, send specimens of the insects that have done the damage. If that is impossible, furnish leaves or portions of bark that have been injured. In this way, you will not only make it possible for the Bureau to advise you what to do, but you may enable it to recognize a pest that is new or unusual in some particular section.

"Sixty-five different diseases of men and domestic animals are carried by insects, including malaria, yellow fever, bubonic plague, cholera infantum, and typhus fever! In our cities, since the automobile banished the horse, we are troubled much less than formerly by the house fly. In the country, it still is a menace. Among the diseases which may be transmitted by the house fly are typhoid, diarrhea, dysentery, cholera, tuberculosis, diphtheria, and scarlet fever!

"In order to eradicate the fly, it is necessary to do away with its breeding places. Garbage should be kept covered until it can be burned or buried. Meanwhile, it should be sprinkled with kerosene or common borax. All foods should be protected, as flies carry micro-organisms of disease on their bodies, especially on their legs. Solid food is contaminated by their crawling over it, and liquids when they drink or fall into them.

"In our cities, the German roach is one of the most common pests, and may be a conveyer of typhoid, tonsillitis, and some other diseases. They spread disease by carrying the organisms on their feet and in their intestinal canals, disseminating these over foods, books, and other articles of daily use. Where plentiful, they appear at night after the lights are out, and overrun everything in the room. They can be quickly, cheaply, and completely exterminated by the use of sodium fluorid. As this powder is poisonous, care should be taken that it does not come in contact with food.

"The domestic mosquito breeds around houses in any small collection of water that may be present. The malarial mosquito may also be found breeding in such places; but it usually prefers the margins of ditches and lakes, especially where reeds and water plants are abundant.

"All buildings in places infested with mosquitoes should be screened. No water should be allowed to stand in containers around the dwelling. The grass should be cut short, in order that it may not serve as a hiding place. Low places in the ground should be drained. Cisterns and rain barrels should be screened, or kept covered with a film of oil, which prevents the wiggle-tails from coming to the surface to breathe.

"Reeds and plants around the edge of streams and lakes should be cut away, in order to allow fish, which feed upon the larvæ of mosquitoes, to gain access to them. In slow-running streams, you can use oil as a temporary measure to stop the breeding of mosquitoes.

"PERHAPS I am too optimistic about the outcome of this war between man and the insects. But happily, in our country, there is no pest of great menace against which we have not found measures, more or less effective. We know what to do and how to do it. But will we do it in time?

"Bear in mind that insects were at home on this globe millions of years before the human species existed. They are probably the most perfectly adapted of all creatures to survive under all sorts of conditions. All the higher animals and plants might be exterminated, yet some insects could survive.

"Why, if human beings were as well equipped for living on this planet as the insects are, some groups of people would be purely vegetarian and some purely carnivorous! Some would have appendages especially designed for grasping in a way that far excels the facility of the human hand! Some would have baskets for carrying things! And some, a special apparatus for breathing under water!

"Some insects live in wood, some in water, some in the ground! There is absolutely nothing that insects won't eat! The waters of Great Salt Lake are so alkaline that any other form of life appearing in them would perish; but there are insects which survive in them! We use kerosene to kill some insects; but there is one insect in California that lives and prospers in kerosene!

"And what cunning ways of concealment and of defense they have!

"Yes, we must keep in mind the cunning of this relentless foe. Much as we have been doing against it, we have not been doing enough.

"What we really need is information on all the fundamental facts of insect life. There should be scores of able men, with the most advanced technique, occupying themselves exclusively with the study of those things about insects which the economic entomologists have not as yet had time (nor the means!) to investigate thoroughly."

✣ ✣ ✣ ✣ ✣

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

The framed samplers forming the background are from the Whitman Collection

Background — Eighty-six years of making the finest candies, reaching back to sampler days, provide the background of experience and tradition. The success of the Sampler was not an accident. The Sampler's contents are the public's choice of favorite pieces from eleven of Whitman's packages famous since the beginning of the Whitman business in 1842.

Every piece is a selected favorite which insures the popularity of Whitman's

Sampler

© S. F. W. & Son, Inc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

RAZOR PULL Disappears!

when beards are softened this Small Bubble Way

A smoother shave, a quicker shave . . . is yours for the asking now. It's an amazing new type of lather that softens your whiskers in a scientific way

Men, it's a shave with a smile!

SKIN sensitive? Beard tough? Forget it, men.

Here's a new, quick way to shave that gets whiskers off clean and smooth . . . without razor-pull, sting or smart.

Already millions have adopted small-bubble lather. Thousands buy it daily. From coast to coast the news has spread like wildfire.

And now, to broadcast the good news even further, a unique test is offered. It's a seven-day trial that doesn't cost you a cent. See details in coupon below.

ORDINARY LATHER

Photomicrograph of ordinary lather surrounding single hair. Note how the large bubbles hold air instead of water against the beard.

COLGATE LATHER

Under identical conditions note the closely knit texture of Colgate lather. The small bubbles hold water instead of air against your beard.

Small Bubbles did it

No other shaving cream is like Colgate's. No other can offer you such unique results.

It is, we believe, the ultimate attainment in the science of beard-softening. A shaving cream based on the now proven principle that water, and not soap, is the real softener of your beard.

Thus Colgate lather is designed to absorb more water . . . to scientifically drench your beard with moisture right at the base, where the razor work is done.

It's a "small bubble" lather. For small bubbles hold more water. They carry it closer to the base of your beard.

The minute you lather up with Colgate's two things happen:

1. The soap in the lather breaks up the oil film that covers each hair . . . floats it quickly away.

2. Then billions of tiny, moisture-laden bubbles seep down through your beard . . . crowd around each whisker . . . soak it soft with water.

Thus your whiskers come off clean and smooth. No razor-pull. No stinging and smarting.

You've never had a shave like this before. You've never known such comfort.

Please don't take our word for all this. Make us prove what we say.

Compare Colgate's for seven days with the shaving cream in your bathroom now . . . we'll cheerfully stand the expense. Please mail coupon . . . now!

FREE OFFER, MEN!

Colgate & Co., Dept. 501-C, 595 Fifth Ave., N. Y.
Please send me FREE sample of Colgate's Rapid Shave Cream. Also sample of Colgate's Talc for Men.

Name_____

Address_____

A Mighty Little Woman But She's All Grit!

(Continued from page 16)

hair and dress, might have been Fifth Avenue born. It was "homey" in the little bungalow, with neighbors dropping in, the coffee boiling, and the ex-judge filling the place with laughter as he recounted tales of the "good old days."

"We had one doctor," he related, "who kept office in a room above the dance hall. Slept there on an old cot hidden behind a screen in one corner. One day I noticed that the whole bottom of the cot was covered with sheet iron.

"'Doc, what's that sheet iron for?' I asked.

"'It's armor plate,' he said. 'Got to have it. When the boys down-stairs get to shootin' it stops stray bullets that come up through the floor.'

"That's a fact," concluded the ex-judge, and his blue eyes twinkled.

HE BEGAN to tell me, in low voice, about Doctor McGraw. "All nerve," he said. "And I know nerve when I see it. She is alone in this county of less than two thousand people. News travels fast here, and bad news fastest. She daren't make a mistake!

"The Doc is alone here, as I said. If she's in doubt about a diagnosis, she can't call in an associate to help her out. It's up to her, and she's got to be right. Maybe she'll be twenty miles out, with no nurse, no assistant, no equipment such as your city doctors have available in every hospital. But a life is in her hands and she has got to act alone, ever alone. That takes nerve, my friend, and Doctor McGraw has got it."

The ex-judge gazed out of the window, far out over the endless hills he loved. "Of course, I may be prejudiced in her favor," he confessed slowly. "You see, she probably saved my boy's life."

"Thank you," smiled Doctor McGraw, and stepped softly into the room, for dinner was over. "There was a time, not so long gone either," she said, "when a motto and a hope—the hope that some day another would be able to say what you've said—were all that kept me going."

"What was the motto, Doctor?" I asked.

"'Commend him who with aid and encouragement of friends succeeds; but the man to be admired is the one who succeeds in spite of Hell!'" she answered.

She stood there, a mere slip of a woman with snow-white hair, though she is only in her forties. There were faint lines in her face that in themselves told a story. Almost from birth, her life had been one long fight against odds, and the fight had left its scars.

"'In spite of Hell!'" she repeated. "I read that motto one day on a card in the window of a Bible store in Lincoln. I was without money, hungry, blue, and discouraged. I couldn't buy the card, but I memorized the motto."

Harriet McGraw has needed such a motto.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

CHRYSLER—

THAT'S ALL YOU NEED TO KNOW ABOUT A MOTOR CAR

REGARDLESS of what you may intend to invest in an automobile—or what your demands may be in style, size and performance—you will find complete satisfaction in a Chrysler.

Because Chrysler has extended its extraordinary standards of performance, appearance, design, dependability and long life to all four of the principal price fields.

Today there are four distinctive Chrysler models—"52," "62," "72" and 112 h. p. Imperial "80"—in more than 40 body styles—covering the entire price field from $670 to $6795.

Every car that bears the Chrysler name is the product of that famous Chrysler Standardized Quality of engineering and precision manufacturing which from the beginning has pioneered and developed countless betterments for its cars of higher price and has applied them to its cars of lower price.

Under such a guarantee of superiority—there is none like it in the motor car industry—you can buy any Chrysler with full confidence that it represents supreme quality and value in its price field.

Compare the specifications—test the performance in any way you choose—you'll find a Chrysler, whether "52," "62," "72" or 112 h. p. Imperial "80," that will meet your needs and means better than any other car.

New Chrysler, "Red-Head" Engine—designed to take full advantage of high-compression gas, giving greater speed, power and hill-climbing ability, with increased fuel economy, is standard equipment on the roadsters of the "52," "62," "72" and all models of the New 112 h. p. Imperial "80." It is also available, at slight extra cost, for all other body types. For a reasonable charge it can be applied to earlier Chrysler cars now in use.

New Chrysler "52"—Seven body styles, $670 to $790. Great New Chrysler "62"—Seven body styles, $1065 to $1235. Illustrious New Chrysler "72"—Ten body styles, $1545 to $1795. New 112 h. p. Chrysler Imperial "80"—Fourteen custom body styles by Chrysler, Dietrich, Locke and LeBaron, $2795 to $6795.

All prices f. o. b. Detroit, subject to current Federal excise tax. Chrysler dealers are in position to extend the convenience of time payments. Ask about Chrysler's attractive plan.

CHRYSLER

"52~62~72~ 112 H.P. IMPERIAL 80"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Where the Big Ones Rise!"

SOME PLACE—far off the beaten track, there's a shimmering lake or a cold, rushing stream where the "big ones" lurk. You know the place!

Pack up your old kit bag—take a friend along in the chummy sidecar, and be on your way to a holiday crowded with happy, care-free sport.

The Harley-Davidson takes you wherever you want to go—comfortably, swiftly and economically. Upkeep? 3c per mile pays for gas, oil, tires, and all! Front and rear brakes, and other great features are built into the new 1928 models.

HARLEY-DAVIDSON MOTOR CO.
Dept. A. M. Milwaukee, Wis.

The Single—the famous Harley-Davidson solo mount that travels 80 miles to the gallon of gas. Priced at $235 complete, f. o. b. factory.

Prices as low as $310 f. o. b. factory, and your dealer's convenient Pay-As-You-Ride-Plan makes the Harley-Davidson easy to own. You'll enjoy a demonstration. Send coupon for catalog.

HARLEY-DAVIDSON Motorcycles

Mail the Coupon!

HARLEY-DAVIDSON MOTOR CO.
Dept. A. M., Milwaukee, Wis.
Interested in ☐ Twin ☐ Single.
Send catalog and complete details.

Name.....
Address.....
.....

Born in Iceland, the seventh daughter in a family that prayed for a boy, her parents immigrated to Canada when she was five. One week after their arrival the father died. The widowed mother took the seven girls on to Winnipeg, where friends were, and in a forlorn attempt at investment lost every penny she possessed. Then, in a slip on the ice, she fell and crippled herself, so that she could no longer work. There was nothing left for her to do but to scatter her children among whatever families cared to take them. Little Hrefna found herself in the home of an English lawyer.

"MY MAIDEN name was Hrefna Goodman," Doctor McGraw explained, "but because of the difficult pronunciation of the Icelandic given name, I soon became Harriet to everybody, and later I adopted it as my name."

The lawyer who took the child fully intended to adopt her, but he did not understand the Icelandic spirit. The Northmen settled Iceland, an independent and proud race, and Harriet had Norse blood in her veins. She rebelled at being pitied and called "a poor orphan." Small as she was, she noticed that she was treated as a servant. One morning, early, she stuffed her few clothes into a pillow slip and ran away, back to her mother.

The mother could not keep her. A tag was tied to the child, and with her pillow-slip valise she was shipped to a great-aunt down in North Dakota. The pillow slip and all its contents were lost in the journey, so Harriet McGraw arrived in the United States with only the clothing she had on her back.

A summer was spent with the aunt. Then an Icelandic immigrant family who "felt sorry for her" took the child for the winter. In spring, she was shipped back to Winnipeg to an older sister, who was working. At the age of seven, Harriet, as she had become, also went to work as the assistant to a chambermaid in an English home. Thus she supported herself until she was eleven.

"I was nurse to a child as old as I was," smiled Doctor McGraw. "I was 'bell-boy' in a high-class private hotel. I made beds, washed dishes, helped the cook, and waited on table. It was a hit or miss life. What schooling I got came second to the task of keeping a roof over my head."

Four of her sisters banded together, moved to Sioux Falls, South Dakota, and opened a home laundry. Harriet joined them and was given charge of a washtub. Two, three years of this followed—back-aching years, heartless years of drudgery. Then into the girl's life came her first ambition:

A Danish minister became interested in her plight. At his home, nights, he taught her the Danish language and to read the Danish Bible. He sent her to public school, and talked to her about God and of men who preached His gospel in far-away lands. He told of God-inspired courage and martyrdom that made the blood of the girl's Viking ancestors run hot in her veins. He dwelt on the nobility of sacrifice, and of service to mankind.

"I'm going to be a missionary, a sacrifice to God!" said the girl, who was now fifteen.

On to Minneapolis. Another minister saw her entered as a pupil in a denominational school. Then she went to Lincoln, Nebraska, to a second school, all the time earning her own way. She did domestic work in the mornings and evenings, and got up at two A. M. to study until work summoned her again. The preachers had fired her and she studied with burning eyes.

The training of a nurse was to conclude her missionary preparation, and Harriet went on to the Nebraska Sanitarium, at College View, as a student. There the unexpected happened that was to turn the whole trend of her life. She met and fell in love with John Kurtz, a fellow student of nursing who dreamed of becoming a doctor. Upon graduation from the sanitarium, they were married.

Kurtz had saved a little money. He took his bride westward and enrolled in the University of Colorado. For the first time since childhood, the young wife had a home and somebody to do for her. She forgot, for a month or two, everything but her happiness. Then, even more quickly than they had vanished, the clouds returned. Kurtz was taken ill with a fatal malady. Their little money melted away under a rain of debts and needs. Harriet went out to nurse, even while at home she nursed her husband, in an effort to hold man and home. The crash came a brief eight months after the wedding, when John Kurtz died.

She was lost for a time after that. It was as if the world had ended, she told me. But only sixty dollars intervened between her and starvation. She had to do something, and all there was to do was to resume her lone road where she had quit it. As a graduate nurse of the Nebraska Sanitarium she was entitled to a post-graduate course in nursing at a famous sanitarium in Battle Creek. She enrolled for the course, and to her surprise found that her doctor superior at Battle Creek was a woman.

"Why, you too may become a doctor if you will it," said the superior. "Doctors are missionaries, as well as preachers are. No profession demands greater self-denial and sacrifice."

The young widow's thoughts went back to distant Iceland. Her grandfather had been a doctor. Upon his death, she now remembered from chance words of her older sisters, her grandmother had taken up medicine and gone on with her dead husband's work. She was the descendent of a woman doctor and the widow of a man who would have been a doctor! And a seventh child! At last, the way into the future seemed indicated. She would do as her grandmother had done.

SHE was without money, but that was a trifling obstacle. When had she ever had money? Through a friend in Lincoln, Nebraska, and a Lincoln physician, she gained an appointment as head nurse in the City Hospital, at Lincoln. The wages were sufficient to pay her tuition into Lincoln Medical College. For her living, that first year, she practiced massage with private patrons, earning ten dollars a week. The second year she paid for her room and board by this means; in the final year of college at Lincoln she opened treatment rooms of her own, specializing in woman patients sent to her by local physicians.

At last, a qualified and certified Doctor of Medicine, she opened a little office on West

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Why changed motoring conditions demand a new margin of safety

"Oil"—and your $800 car

Why today's "average" car needs more than average lubrication

In 1920, the price of the average automobile was $1,281. Five years later the average price dropped to $878.

This 31.4% price reduction has crowded the highways with motor vehicles. And the majority of today's 20,000,000 cars are the new, less expensive models.

In today's automobile you get greater value per dollar than ever before. But you can't expect an $800 automobile to be made with quite the same precision, or of quite the same materials as one that costs twice as much.

Hence correct lubrication is far more important to the lower-priced car—the car which makes up the great majority today.

★ ★ ★

In 1920 Gargoyle Mobiloil was the best oil our 52 years' experience told us how to make—at that time.

Then the trend toward lower-priced cars became still more pronounced. Engine speeds were stepped up. Compressions were increased. Driving became faster. Winter driving increased yearly mileage. Congested traffic multiplied starts and stops.

Every one of these changes meant a new load for lubrication—for the $800 automobile even more than the costlier car.

Step by step we put a new and still greater margin of safety into Mobiloil—until finally we had the Mobiloil that lubricated the engines of Commander Byrd's plane on his flight to the North Pole; the Mobiloil that brought Lindbergh's engine through without a single slip on his flight from New York to Paris and from Washington, D. C., to Mexico City; the Mobiloil that carried the U. S. Army Fliers and Arthur Goebel successfully to Hawaii.

Today Mobiloil is used by more automotive engineers than any other three oils combined. And it is recommended in more automobile instruction books than any other three oils.

It will pay you to drain your crankcase now and refill with the correct grade of Gargoyle Mobiloil as specified on the Mobiloil Chart. Any Mobiloil dealer has this Chart.

YOUR guide—If your car is not listed here see the complete Mobiloil Chart at your dealer's and remember that . . .

182 automobile and motor truck manufacturers approve it!

The correct grades of Gargoyle Mobiloil for engine lubrication of prominent passenger cars are specified below. Follow winter recommendations in temperatures from 32° F. (freezing) to 0 F. (zero). Below zero use Gargoyle Mobiloil Arctic (except Ford cars Model T, use Gargoyle Mobiloil "E").

NAMES OF PASSENGER CARS	1927		1926		1925		1924
	Summer	Winter	Summer	Winter	Summer	Winter	Summer	Winter
Buick	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Cadillac	BB	Arc.	BB	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Chandler Sp. 6	A	A	....	....	....	....	....	....
" other mods.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Chevrolet	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.
Chrysler 60, 70, 80	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
" other mods.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	....	....
Dodge Bros. 4-cyl.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Essex	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Ford	E	E	E	E	E	E	E	E
Franklin	BB	BB	BB	BB	BB	BB	BB	BB
Hudson	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Hupmobile	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Jewett	....	....	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Maxwell	....	...	....	...	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Nash	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.
Oakland	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Oldsmobile	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Overland	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Packard 6	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	A
" 8	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Paige	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.
Reo	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Star	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	Arc.	Arc.
Studebaker	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Velie	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.
Willys-Knight 4	....	....	B	Arc.	B	Arc.	B	Arc.
" " 6	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	A	Arc.	....	. . .

GARGOYLE

Mobiloil

Make the chart your guide

VACUUM OIL COMPANY New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Detroit, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Minneapolis, Kansas City, Dallas

Other branches and distributing warehouses throughout the country

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

Mi Choice

The Gift Supreme

NOWHERE on earth is the famous Mi Choice gift package equalled in beauty, purity and quality. Truly, Mi Choice is the perfection of all package chocolates—the perfection of all gifts.

BUNTE BROTHERS Est. 1876 CHICAGO

Bunte WORLD FAMOUS CANDIES

Madison Street and hung out her sign.

"I nearly starved," said Doctor McGraw, and grimaced in memory of West Madison Street. "I probably would have starved had it not been for the fact that I was a graduate nurse."

"I was a failure in Chicago, for the simple reason that no sick people gave me a chance to cure them," she went on. "So, back I went to Lincoln, where my work as a masseuse had made me friends. Too, one of my sisters was there. On her endorsement, a bank loaned me fifty dollars, with which I paid for my Nebraska certificate and the advance rent on a little room in O Street. The room became my office."

One friend loaned her a chair and another a couch. These two articles constituted the "office" furniture, and the couch became a bed at night. For months it was the experience of West Madison Street over again—no patients. The sight of that bare office drove away what few patients that came.

"My friends were good; but they, too, had no money, at least none to spare me," said Doctor McGraw. "The most they could do was to invite me to their homes for meals. Ethics forebade me to go out, as a business solicitor does, and I dared not advertise, for the same reason. All I could do was to sit and wait, and hope. I did more than merely hope—I prayed to God to help me to a chance."

It was on one of these days that she paused before the window of the Bible store. She was wandering aimlessly, dejected and discouraged, too proud to subsist longer at the tables of her friends. It was a dreary, chill day, and in her worn coat she made a sorry figure before the window. Idly she began reading the motto cards on display.

". . . But the man to be admired is the one who succeeds in spite of Hell!" she read, and read it again.

She transposed it, making man to read woman. The card suddenly seemed aimed right at her. Her head went up, and now she recalled the words of one of her college professors at graduation: "What you do in the world will be dependent upon the quality of the stuff that is in you. Don't rely on friends; don't trust to luck. Face this job ahead, depending only on yourself!"

SHE went back to her room and prayed, not for help but for courage. She was still praying when there was a knock at the door, and a moment later an old friend stepped into the room. To her astonishment, he placed one hundred dollars in cash in her hand.

"Fix up the place," he said. "Get some decent furniture in here, so it'll look like a doctor's office. And don't worry about the money or where it came from. Pay it back when you can."

The woman buried her face in the money, and cried and laughed together. She believes to-day as certainly as she believes in life that the friend was God's answer to her prayer.

The tide turned after that in Lincoln. Shortly she was able to move to a better office. Patients began to fill her waiting-room as, in Lincoln and for miles about, folks began to hear of "the little woman doctor." Sandwiched in with her work, she kept up her studies. In the ecstasy of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

"Teeth sound, a feeling of freshness and cleanliness,"

